So far from agreeing with the Senator, that what he calls bank credit is so much real capital added the country, I hold the opposite—that banks do not add a cent of capital, or credit. Regarded strictly, the credit of banks is limited to the capital actually paid in. This usually is the only sum for which the stockholders are liable; and, without what is called banking privileges, they would not have a cent of credit beyond that amount. But the capital subscribed and paid is not created by the banks. It is drawn out of the general fund of the country. Now, I ask, what constitutes its credit beyond capital? In the first place, and mainly, it is derived from the fact that both General and State Governments receive and treat bank notes as cash, and thereby, to the extent of their fiscal action, virtually give them the use of their credit. It is an existing credit, belonging to them exclusively, and is neither created, nor increased, by permitting the banks to use it. In the next place, the deposites with the banks, both public and private, add a large amount to their credit; but this again is either the property or credit of the Government and individuals, which they are permitted to use, and which they neither create nor increase. Finally, notes and bonds, or other credits discounted by the banks, made up their credit, which are neither more nor less than the credit of the drawers and endorsers, on which the banks do business. They take in the paper or credit of others, payable at a given day, deduct the interests in advance, and give out their own credit or notes, payable on demand, without interest; that is, the credit of their own paper rests on the credit of the paper discounted, or taken in exchange, which credit they neither create nor increase. In a word, all their credit beyond the capital actually paid in is but the credit of the public, or individuals, on which, by what is called banking privileges, they are permitted to do business and make profit; and so far from creating credit or capital, they in fact add not a cent of capital or credit to that which previously existed.

But the Senator next tells us that there is three hundred millions of banking capital in the Union, and that it is real bona fide solid capital, as much so as the plantations of the South. This is certainly news to me. I had supposed that this vas amount was little more than a fictitious mass of credit piled on credit, in the erection of which but little specie or real capital was used; and that, when a new bank was created, the wheelbarrow was put in motion to roll the specie from the old to the new institution, till it got fully under way, when it was rolled back again. But it seems that all this is a mistake; that the whole capital is actually paid in cash, and is as solid as terra firma itself. This certainly is a bold assertion, in the face of facts daily occurring. There have been, if I mistake not, four or five recent bank explosions in the Senator's own town, in which the whole vanished into thin air, leaving nothing behind but ruin and dessolation. What has become of that portion of his solid capital? Did the Senator ever hear of a plantation thus exploding and vanishing? And I would be glad to know how large a portion of this three hundred millions of solid capital will finally escape in the same way? A few years may enable us to answer the question.

The Senator next, by way of illustration, undertook to draw a distinction between bank credit and Government credit, or public stocks, in which he was not very successful. It would be no difficult task to prove that they both rest substantially on debt, and that the Government stock may be, and is, to a great extent, actually applied in the same mode as bank credit in the use of exchanges and business. It, in fact, constitutes, to a great extent, the very basis of banking operation; but, after having occupied the Senate so long, it would be unreasonable to consume their time on what was introduced as a mere illustration.

The Senator next undertook to prove the immense advantage of banking institutions. He asked what would be done with the surplus capital of the country, if it could not be invested in bank stocks? In this new and growing country, with millions on millions of lands, of the best quality, still lying unimproved; with vast schemes of improvements, constantly requiring capital; with the immense demand for labor for every branch of business, the last question I ever expected to hear asked is that propounded by the Senator. I had supposed the greater difficulty was to find capital, and not how to dispose of it, and that this difficulty had been one of the main reasons assigned in favor of the banking system.

The next benefit he attributes to the system was the vast amount of lands, which had passed out of the hands of the public into that of individuals of late, which he estimated, during the last three years, at thirty-six millions of acres, forming a surface equal in extent to England, and which he stated would rise in value greatly, in consequence of their passing into private hands. That this immense transfer has been effected by the banks, I admit; but that it is to be considered an advantage to the country, I certainly never expected to hear uttered any where, especially on this floor, and by one so intelligent as the Senator. I had supposed it was infinitely better for the community at large, and particularly for those not in affluent circumstances, that the lands should remain in possession of the Government than of speculators, till wanted for settlement; and that one of the most decided objections to our banking system is, that it becomes the instrument of making such immense transfers, whenever the currency becomes excessive. This is a point not without interest, and I must ask the Senate to bear with me, while I pause for a few moments to explain it.

The effect of an expanding currency is to raise prices, and to put speculation in motion. He who buys, in a short time seems to realize a fortune, and every one is on the look-out to make successful investments, and thus prices receive a constant upward impulse, with the exception of the public lands, the price of which is fixed at $1 25, excepting such as are sold at public auction. The rise of other landed property soon creates a new demand for the public lands; and speculation commences its giant operations in that quarter. Vast purchases are made, and the revenue of the Government increases in proportion to the increased sales. The payment is made in bank notes, and these pass from the land offices to the deposite banks, and constitute a large surplus for new banking facilities and accommodations. Applicants from all quarters press in to partake of the rich harvest, and the notes repass into the hands of speculators to be reinvested in the purchase of public lands. They again pass through the hands of receivers, and thence to the banks, and again to the speculators, and every revolution of the wheel increases the swelling tide, which sweeps away millions of the choicest acres from the Government to the monopolizers for bank notes, which, in the end, prove as worthless as the paper on which they are written. Had this process not been arrested, by the deposite act of 1836, and had the banks avoided an explosion, in a short time the whole of the public domain, the precious inheritance of the people of this Union and their descendants, would have passed through the same process with the thirty-six millions of acres which the Senator so highly commends. What took place then will again take place, at the very next swell of the paper tide, unless, indeed, this bill should become a law, which would prove an effectual check against its recurrence.

The Senator next attributes our extraordinary advance in improvement and prosperity to the banking system. He puts down as nothing our free institutions; the security in which the people enjoy their rights; the vast extent of our country; and the fertility of its soil, and the energy, industry, and enterprise of the stock from which we are descended. All these, it seems, are as dust. The banks are every thing, and without them we would have been but little advanced in improvement or prosperity. It is much more easy to assign our prosperity to the banking system than to prove it. That in its early stages it contributed to give an impulse to industry and improvement I do not deny; but that, in its present excess, it impedes rather than promotes either, I hold to be certain. That we are not indebted to it for our extraordinary advance and improvements, wholly or mainly, there is an argument, which I regard as decisive. Before the Revolution, we had no banks; and yet our improvement and prosperity, all things considered, were as great anterior to it, as since, whether we regard the increase of population or wealth. At that time, not a bank note was to be seen, and the whole circulation consisted either of gold and silver, or the colonial paper money, which all now, and especially the Senator, considers so worthless. Had the Senator lived during that period, he might, with equal plausibility, have attributed all the improvement and prosperity of the country to the old colonial paper money, as he now does to the banks; and have denounced any attempt to change or improve it, as an overthrow of the credit system, as warmly as he now does the separation of the Government from the banks. I tell the Senator that the time is coming, when his present defence of the banking system, as it is now organized, will be considered as extraordinary as we now would regard a defence of the old and exploded system of colonial paper money. He seems not to see that the system has reached a point, where great changes are unavoidable; and without which, the whole will explode. The state of its manhood and vigor has passed, and it is now far advanced in that of decrepitude. The whole system must be reformed, thoroughly reformed, or it must perish in the natural course of events. The first step towards its renovation is the measure he denounces in such unmeasured terms—the separation from the Government; and the next a separation between discount and circulation. The two are incompatible; and so long as they are united, those frequent vicissitudes of contractions and expansions, to which bank circulation is so subject, and which is rapidly bringing it into discredit, must continue to increase in frequency and intensity, till it shall become as completely discredited as continental money.

The Senator seems not to be entirely unaware of the danger to which the system is exposed from its frequent vibrations and catastrophes. He tells us, by way of apology, that had it not been for the Specie circular the present catastrophe would not have occurred. That it hastened it, I do not in the least doubt; but that we should have escaped without it, I wholly deny. The causes of the explosion lay deep, far beneath the circular, and nothing but the most efficient measures, during the session immediately after the removal of the deposites, could have prevented it. That was the crisis, which, having passed without doing any thing, what has since followed was inevitable. But admitting what he says to be true, what a picture of the system does it exhibit! How frail, how unstable must it be, when a single act of the Executive could bring it to the ground, and spread ruin over the country! And shall we again renew our connection with such a system, so liable from the slightest cause to such disasters? Does it not conclusively show that there is some deep and inherent defect in its very constitution, which renders it too unsafe to confide in without some radical and thorough reform?

The Senator himself seems conscious of this. He entered into the question of its expansions and contractions, and suggested several remedies to correct an evil, which none can deny, and which all must see, if not corrected, must end in the final overthrow of the system. He told us that the remedy was to be found in the proportion between bullion and circulation, and that the proper rule to enforce the due proportion between the two, was, when exchange was against us, for the banks to curtail. I admit that the disease originates in the undue proportion, not between bullion and circulation, but between it and the liabilities of the banks, including deposites, as well as circulation, (the former is even more important than the latter,) and that the remedy must consist in enforcing that proportion. But two questions here present themselves: what is that due proportion? and how is it, under our system of banking, to be enforced? There is one proportion which we know to be safe, and that is, when for every dollar of liability there is one dollar in bullion or specie; but this would bring us back again to the old, honest, and substantial Bank of Amsterdam, so much abused by all the advocates of banks of discount. If that proportion be transcended—if we admit two, or three, to one, to be the due proportion, or any other that would make banking more profitable and eligible than the mere loaning of money or other pursuits of society, the evil under which we now suffer would continue. Too much capital would continue to flow into banking, to be again followed by the excess of the system, with all its train of disasters. But admit that such would not be the fact, how are we to compel the twenty-six States of this Union to enforce the due proportion, all of which exercise the right of establishing banks at pleasure, and on such principles as they may choose to adopt? It can only be done by an amendment of the Constitution; and is there any one so wild and visionary as to believe that there is the least prospect of such an amendment? Let gentlemen who acknowledge the defect, before they insist on a reunion with a system acknowleged to be exposed, as it now stands, to such frequent and dangerous vicissitudes, first apply a remedy and remove the defect, and then ask for our co-operation.

But the Senator tells us that the means of enforcing the due proportion is to be found in the regulation of the exchanges, and for this purpose the only rule necessary to be observed is to curtail when exchanges are against us, and, as a counterpart, I suppose, to enlarge when in our favor. How much dependence is to be put on this rule, we have a strong illustration in the late catastrophe, under which the country is now suffering. The exchanges remained in our favor to the very last; and before the rule, on which the Senator so confidently relies, could be applied, the shock was felt and the banks ingulfed; and this will ever be the case, when preceded by a general expansion in the commercial world, such as preceded the late.

The cause of that commenced on the other side of the Atlantic, and originated mainly in the provisions on which the recharter of the Bank of England was renewed; which greatly favored the extension of banking operations in a country which may be considered as the centre of the commercial system of the world. The effect of these provisions was a depreciation of the value of gold and silver there, and their consequent expulsion to other countries, and especially to ours, which turned the exchange with England in our favor; and which, in combination with other causes, the removal of the deposites and the expiration of the charter of the late Bank of the United States, was followed by a great corresponding expansion of our banking system. The result of this state of things was, a great increase of the liabilities of the banks, compared with their specie, in both countries, which laid the train for the explosion. The Bank of England first took the alarm, and began to prepare to meet the threatened calamity. It was unavoidable, and the only question was, where it should fall. The weakness of our system, and the comparative strength of theirs, turned the shock on ours, but of the approach of which, the exchanges gave, as I have stated, no indications almost to the last moment. And even then, so artificial are exchanges, and so liable to be influenced by other causes, besides the excess of currency on one side and the deficit on the other, after it began to show unfavorable indications, we all remember that a single individual, at the head of a State institution, I mean Mr. Biddle, by appearing in New York, and bringing into market bonds on England, drawn on time, turned the current and restored the exchange. All this conclusively proves, that when there is a general expansion (the most dangerous of all) exchanges gives no indication of the approach of danger, and, of course, their regulation, on which the Senator relies, affords no protection against it.

I might go further, and show that at no time is it to be relied on as the index of the relative expansion or contraction in different countries, and that it is liable to be influenced by many circumstances besides those to which I have alluded, some of which are fleeting, and others more permanent. It presupposes the perfect fluidity of currency, and that it is not liable to be obstructed or impeded by natural or artificial causes in its ebbs and flows, which is far from being true, as I have already shown in the instance of Mr. Biddle's operation preceding the late shock. In fact, it may be laid down as a rule, that where the currency consists of convertible paper, resting on a gold and silver basis, the small portion of specie which may be required to uphold the whole has its fluidity obstructed by so many and such powerful causes, as to afford no certain criterion of the relative expansion of the currency between it and other countries, and, of course, afford no certain rule of regulating banking operations. The subject is one that would require more time to discuss than I can bestow on the present occasion; but of its truth we have a strong illustration in the state of things preceding the late shock, when, as I have stated, the exchanges remained favorable, while the vast amount of our imports, and the unusual character of many of the articles imported, clearly indicated that our currency was relatively greatly expanded, compared with those countries with which we have commercial relations.

To correct the defects of the system, the Senator must go much deeper. The evil lies in its strong tendency to increase; and that again, in the extraordinary and vast advantages which are conferred on it, beyond all other pursuits of the community, which, if not diminished, must terminate in its utter destruction, or an entire revolution in our social and political system. It is not possible that the great body of the community will patiently bear that the currency, which ought to be the most stable of all things, should be the most fluctuating and uncertain, and that, too, in defiance of positive provisions in the Constitution, which all acknowledge were intended to give it the greatest possible stability.

SEPARATION OF GOVERNMENT FROM BANKS.

SPEECH OF MR. ALLEN, OF OHIO,

In the Senate of the United States, February 20, 1838.

—The Independent Treasury bill, and the substitute for it submitted by Mr. RIVES, being under consideration,

Mr. ALLEN rose and said:

This Government is but forty-nine years old. It is, Mr. President, your junior, and that of many members of this body; but, short as has been its duration, it has already experienced the most extraordinary political phenomenon which has ever occurred in human affairs. In May last, the nation was at peace with all mankind. The several departments of the Government, all the organs of its various powers, were performing their usual and appropriate functions. The public revenues had swollen into a surplus beyond the public necessities, of forty millions of dollars. The people were contented, prosperous, and happy. We were threatened neither with invasion from without nor insurrection within. All confided in the public security; all quietly reposed upon that confidence. And yet, in one night—in one moment, as it were—the Government was suddenly struck down, and the whole frame of society convulsed and disjointed by the shock! The laws were rent asunder, the revenues seized, the Government left without a dollar, and the labor and property of the whole people without a medium or standard of value. Then, and then for the first time, was it discovered that there existed in our midst a power independent alike of the Government and of the people, responsible to neither, and triumphant over both.

Many a time, sir, in the history of our race, have civil institutions been hewn down by the sword; many a time have they been effaced from the earth in the desolating sweep of human passions; many a time have they worn out by the friction of their own parts, or decayed and wasted away with age; but never, until May last, was a Government arrested in its action, and brought to a solemn stand, by a power wielded not by a foreign enemy, nor by the Government itself, nor yet by the people over whom it extended. And now, sir, what do we behold? We see this power, concentrated, embodied, organized, animated by a spirit of rapine and conquest; and having advanced to the Capitol over obligations broken, rights violated, laws infracted, authority defied, we now behold it standing incarnate upon the floor of the Senate, to demand a surrender of the affairs of the Republic into its own exclusive custody. Yes: and if this demand be not complied with; if the people will not agree to pay an eternal tribute to the banks; if they will not abandon the Government of themselves, and submit to the rule of these monopolies, with what are they threatened? They are threatened with a punishment, "compared to which all the calamities of a war with the most potent nation of the globe, would be a blessing." Such are the forebodings, such the language, of the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY.]

That the freemen of this land, acting through the Government of their choice, should refuse to deliver their present, and to mortgate their future, revenues to a league of private corporations—to corporations which have already betrayed them, which have conspired together, seized the public treasure, and still stand out in barefaced rebellion against public law; that such should be the honest obstinacy of the nation in resisting these demands, is a conduct "unaccountable, monstrous, criminal," in the judgment of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER.]

This Government shall be compelled to receive, through all coming time, nothing for its revenues but the due-bills of banks—of banks which have refused, in advance, to pay those bills. It shall deliver the bills, when received, back to the very same banks, as a fund for their private traffic. It shall levy, for the use of these corporations, an everlasting tribute upon the country, and thus reduce the people to the mercenary dominion of banks and bankers. These things must be done in quiet, and under color of law; or, if not so done, the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. RIVES,] foresees their future fulfillment through a breach in the Constitution, and in the form of a National Bank.

Such are the demands, such the forebodings, such the substitute—a measure, the first principle and inevitable tendency of which is essentially revolutionary. It is nothing less than a demand of the public revenue, now and for ever, made by the banks as a political right; and that demand is expressly predicated upon the assumption, that the Constitution is theoretically and practically incompetent to effect the ends of Government. The substitute assumes, and its mover declares, that the present officers, though chosen by the people, are, and that all other citizens who hereafter may be chosen by their countrymen to administer the Government, necessarily must be, too ignorant or too corrupt to take care of the public revenue. We are, therefore, required to go beyond the Constitution for agents not selected by, nor responsible to, the people. And why is this to be done? Why should not the people be trusted to appoint their own agents to take care of their own money? For, after all, this is the real, the only question. The question is, who shall exercise the elective power of this Government? Shall the people, or shall the banks, appoint the men to be charged with our public affairs? Shall those who hold the public money be responsible to the public? To this question, the substitute answers, that the banks shall, that the people shall not, exercise this power. It says to the people, "the banks are more virtuous, more intelligent than you; they will appoint officers to take care of your money more worthy of your confidence than any selected by yourselves. You raise the revenue by your taxes, but you have no right to regulate its custody; you must trust to the honor of banks, in which, though they have once betrayed you, you must again confide; and turn your suspicions upon your own officers, who, though elected by yourselves, and thus far faithful to their trust, may yet deceive you." Such, sir, is the language which this substitute speaks to the people; such is the charge against their integrity, their virtue and intelligence; such the attack thus openly made upon the sovereignty of the people—upon the representative principle, the only principle which can, for a single hour, sustain this Government.

Thus, sir, we have the grounds of this contest distinctly marked out. Let no man mistake his position—let none waste his energies upon a delusive issue—let none be beguiled by the deceitful outside this controversy has assumed—let none suppose it a mere question of currency and finance. No: it is a struggle, not between two systems of currency, but between two forms of Government. Privilege, paper, and oppression, stand arrayed on the one side, against liberty, labor, and property, on the other. The revolutionary struggle for separation from the throne of Great Britain, was not more essentially a strife for independence and freedom, than is this to dissolve the connection which renders the Government basely subject, and the people basely tributary, to the banks. In this contest, (I speak it with a sigh for the weakness of our nature,) the contending elements are but too fatally matched. Each power acts with the concentrated energy of organization. One, the organized Government of the people, prompted to defence by the love of liberty; the other, an organized league of monopolies, fired in the assault by the hope of conquest and the prospect of plunder. Though apparently temporary, the struggle will be long and arduous; and, whatsoever may be the result, that result will blast or confirm the happiness of the present, and the hopes of many a succeeding, generation.

Sir, the events of the last century have wrought an amazing revolution in the social condition of man. The sword had ever been the great oppressor and plunderer of the world, but that sanguinary agent of conquest and crime has now lost most of its terrors, and physical force yielded to the ascendancy of moral power. Human liberty, nevertheless, still finds an antagonist; and it remains for this generation and for this country to determine whether organized fraud can be made to take the place of the sword in the oppression and plunder of mankind.

Our political institutions were framed with reference to this momentous question, and the maturest wisdom was exerted to guard them against the intrusion of an enemy more dreadful than the sword, because more subtle in its action, and more intense in its grasp. The framers of the Constitution knew that political power was neither more nor less than the control of one man over another; that, amidst the necessities of human life, control over the labor, the property, and the subsistence of man, was control over the man himself. They knew, too, that the natural disparity in the capacities, energies, and dispositions of men, unaided by political discriminations, was insufficient to destroy that equality of condition so essential to the safety of each, and to the common happiness of all.

Upon these high elementary principles the Constitution was based. Throughout the whole frame of our system, embracing both the State and Federal Governments, the people are viewed as an aggregate of individuals equal to each other, not as an association of classes and orders. Property is treated as an object of acquisition equally by all, not as a subject of monopoly or exclusive appropriation by any. Rights, only, are recognised: privileges, discarded. The contrivances which in other countries had been devised to classify the community, and graduate the scale of dependent orders, were rejected as incompatible with civil liberty. Titles of nobility, all the machinery of entails, perpetuities, and primogeniture, being thus rejected, our ancestors put the Government in motion, believing, as they sincerely did, that man, and the proceeds of his toil, were forever secured against pillage and oppression.

Such, in the begginning, were our institutions—such then was the condition of our country. But, sir, a power antagonist to these principles was soon transplanted from the British monarchy into our system—a power which has silently incorporated itself with our social economy, inverted the natural action of the Government, and now threatens its total subversion.

By common consent, the whole civilized world had set apart a particular species of property as the representative standard of value for all other property. Such were precious metals, gold and silver, which, after receiving a fixed form and the stamp of public authority, had, by way of eminence, been denominated money. When the Constitution was adopted, commerce had supplied our people with an amount of this money equal to their necessities; and, in addition to this, they had enjoined it as a duty upon their own Government, to adapt these metals to the public use, by regulating their form and value. This was done, and for a time all was well. But, from England, the banking system was transplanted upon our shores. By its agency, individuals were enabled to withdraw from the public use the whole metallic medium, and to retain it as a monopoly in their own hands. The means, as well as the privilege, of accomplishing this object, were conferred as gratuities by arbitrary legislation. Under these legislative acts, called charters, they assumed the name of banks, proceeded to issue their private credit in the form of due bills, which being thus made by law nominally equal to money, went forth to fill the void left in the community by the withdrawal of the precious metals.

Such was the fatal entrance of the paper or banking system upon our soil. It came as a tax-gatherer from that country to which our fathers had refused to pay taxes. It came immediately after our Revolutionary war, and its advent was the beginning of a counter revolution. It came fraught with monopoly, privilege, and perpetuity—principles in direct hostility to those upon which this Government stands.

And thus, sir, whilst the Constitution requires Congress to coin metallic money for the use of the country, and to regulate its value, the banks are authorized to annul the action of the Government, by withdrawing that money from the people, and substituting in its stead a paper medium, whose value it is impossible to regulate. Every citizen has a constitutional right to demand gold and silver in payment of his debts, because the Government is bound to coin these metals for the debtor; yet the banks have made it impracticable for the creditor to exact, or for the debtor to pay, any thing but paper. The Constitution seeks to secure the people against taxation, except with their own consent, for the use of Government, and in proportion to their representative influence; but the paper system levies an enormous tax upon them against their will, in unequal proportions, and for the exclusive benefit of the banks. All perpetuities are forbidden, yet moneyed corporations have arisen among us, with power to renew and perpetuate themselves by the threat of public ruin as the penalty of their discontinuance. Privileged monopolies, tending to enrich the few to the oppression of the many, by destroying the co-equal distribution of labor and its proceeds, were carefully excluded from our political system; but, notwithstanding this, companies have been chartered with authority to monopolize that species of property called metallic money—the only property which the Government is required to prepare for the use of the people—property with which they cannot dispense, and with the monopoly of which these corporations are enabled to control all other property, and the labor of the whole people. And thus, though the Constitution secures to the citizen his property inviolate, so that its quantity cannot be diminished but for the public use, and upon the payment of an equivalent, the banks are permitted to diminish, at will, the value of every man's lands and goods, by varying the amount of their discounts.

These things, deeply and vitally affecting the well-being, the very subsistence, of every man in the Republic, the banks are permitted to transact, not in the wholesome presence of the people, not in the light of day, but in darkness and in secret, between the walls of subterraneous caverns. And this is allowed in a country whose constitution and laws carry responsibility along with every act of power that may, in any degree, affect the public interests, subject the conduct of the most subordinate officer to the general scrutiny, and inflict penal justice upon every delinquent.

Sir, the privileges thus conferred upon these combinations of men called banks—the privilege of monopolizing the whole traffic in the precious metals—of withdrawing those metals from the use of the public—of issuing their due bills as the sole currency of the country—bills which are but the counterfeit of the money they purport to represent—bills which, for the most part, constitute a species of credit founded, not like that of individuals, upon actual property, but upon an arbitrary credit, created by acts of arbitrary legislation, and forced upon the people as the representative of things that do not exist—the privilege of monopolizing the faculty of loaning money—of loaning their credit as money—of compelling every citizen to exchange his for their credit, with a premium for the exchange—of increasing and diminishing their loans at pleasure, without notice to the community. These mighty privileges concentrate a mass of power, such as never existed in any other country, and never can be concentrated in any other form than that of the paper system. Such a system must forever act with a tenfold force upon the people of a free Government, because such a Government is, in its social structure, necessarily too feeble, and exerts too little control over the citizen and his property, to protect him against a power holding in its own hands the value of his labor, and the measure of his subsistence; for, after all, man must, in the nature of things, ultimately yield to that power which bears most directly and steadily upon him. The necessities of life leave him no means of resisting a power that determines, at pleasure, the quantity of his daily bread.

And now, I ask, what monarch, what Government, in any age or country, ever possessed a power over the labor, the property, the subsistence of the people, over their domestic comforts, their social happiness, so arbitrary, so irresponsible, so omnipotent, as that which the banks of this free country now hold over this free people? But are we free, can we feel that we are freemen, whilst there exists in our midst a despotism of chartered companies, changing our social condition from day to day, at its own pleasure, for its own benefit?

Sir, one of the essential elements of freedom is the security for the future which we have in the present. Your paper system deranges the whole community by a single act. It throws out a hundred millions of loans to-day; it withdraws them to-morrow; and a revolution in property is accomplished. The honest citizen retires at night with the accumulated proceeds of his toil around him; he rises at morn in bankruptcy and despair. The banks have reduced the circle of their favors, and his property has been sacrificed upon the scale of depreciation caused by the curtailment. The third day comes, and he is once more stimulated into life and hope by the returning tide of bank facilities: the fourth day he is replunged into beggary by bank contractions. Thus, by these alternations, the cheerful prospect of improving his condition by regular labor is blasted for ever. He is left to beat about in the feverish void between the extremes of hope and despondency. And, sir, that restless irritation of the public mind which is hourly putting at hazard the repose and the neutrality of the country, is among the natural effects of these sudden and frequent transitions in the circumstances and fortunes of men.

But, Mr. President, the powers and privileges of the banking system, vast and direful as are now their effects upon the social circumstances of the people, are destined, if not arrested, to become still more so, by bearing down the Government of the country, and erecting in its stead, a cold, sordid, mercenary despotism. The progress of the system towards this end has been silent, but steady, direct and rapid. Already I have shown its power over property and labor, and, through them, over men, by its connections with our whole domestic economy. But its more immediate influence upon our political institutions remains yet to be seen. This influence is exerted, first, upon the mass of the people before they have delegated their power, and again, upon their agents, after the delegation is made.

Banks derive their being from legislation. They are of political origin. They sustain and perpetuate themselves by re-acting upon the source of their existence, and therefore necessarily become an element of political power. Every new one increases the strength, and guarantees the perpetuity of those that preceded it; and all unite, still further, to augment their number. Each is a monopoly as against the community, the common object of spoliation, but all stand upon a level with regard to each other as co-agents in plunder, and co-equal recipients of its spoils. Among themselves, they are not beings of a distinct existence, but cohesive parts of a system, with all the functions of a complete and powerful organization. The Pennsylvania Bank of the United States is the centre of the system, because that is the member in which the greatest power is accumulated, and which stands in the region where the payments of the continent are made. To this institution, therefore, all the parts of the system are attracted by a gravitation as infallible as that which draws the waters of the West to the Gulf of Mexico, or holds this Capitol to the earth. By dispensing its influence throughout all the channels of political power, and re-acting steadily upon the legislation of the country, the system has, within less than the half of a century, strengthened its grasp, and enlarged its orbit, till it now comprehends eight hundred banks, with a capital of three hundred millions, a circulation of a hundred and twenty millions, and a mass of loans amounting to near five hundred millions of dollars. This frightful power is concentrated, nominally, in the hands of about ten thousand officers of banks, but really in those of a single man, who, as president of the central member, controls, by his solitary will, the whole machinery of the system.

But in what manner has the system thus re-acted upon legislation, the source of its existence? What human agency has it employed thus to enlarge and perpetuate itself, and what is the extent of that agency? In reply to these questions, ten thousand bank presidents, directors, cashiers, clerks, counsellors, and attorneys, stand forth to our view. They are followed by an army of at least seventy-five thousand stockholders, whose rear is covered by a train of dependants indefinitely long. But if these numbers of men are great, what shall we say when we see still advancing the multitudinous host of borrowers, with their dependants, and all these to be succeeded by a swarm of impatient expectants? When the banks suspended payment, their loans and discounts verged close upon the sum of five hundred millions of dollars. This amount, if loaned for a single year, in the proportion of one thousand dollars to a man, would embrace five hundred thousand men; if loaned, in the same proportion, for six months, it would reach one million of men; and if loaned for the usual period of ninety days, then the bank borrowers, in a single year, would number two millions of individuals—a number far transcending the entire voting population of the Union. But these institutions distribute not their favors so equally as this. If, however, they do not bring the influence of their loans to bear directly on all this multitude, they advance far towards effecting that object, indirectly, by applying their money only to those who, from their influence in society, can control most of the rest.

And now, I ask, who are the men that compose this amazing concourse of bankers, stockholders, borrowers, and dependants? Where are they to be found? Are they among the humble citizens, doomed, by the necessities of life, to toil in obscurity? Are they to be found in the field or in the workshop? No, sir, no; they are to be found in the shade of summer and in the sunshine of winter; they are to be found amidst this forest of banks that overshadow the cities, towns, and villages, of the Republic. There they are; and there, at this very moment, they may be found, crouching in servile submission to these institutions—defending their frauds, the most stupendous that ever were committed—defending their open rebellion against public law, and reviling the Government of their country, and the friends of that Government, with all the bitterness of mercenary malice. Firm, sir, must be the heart of that man, and strong must be his nerve, who dares to complain of the oppression of the banks—who dares to lift the voice of patriotic warning to his countrymen. Stern must be his soul, and indomitable his fortitude, before he presumes to rebuke the power of the banks—a power which has already coiled around the sacred forms of the Constitution, which is day by day increasing the intensity of its pressure, and strangling public liberty in its folds.

I ask, again, who are these men, and where to be found? True it is, that many of them are citizens good and valuable—but true it is, also, that they are, in the general, men who live by devices, by traffic and speculation. They are congregated in towns and cities, where banks dispense their favors, and where they combine to defend all the injustice of the dispensing power. Thus, each one of these delinquent corporations stands securely in the midst of a faithful garrison. Let an injured citizen utter a word in complaint of his wrongs, and in a moment he is denounced, his character assailed, and his influence impaired or destroyed. Let a public journal print but an unfriendly line, subscriptions to the paper are immediately withdrawn, advertisements discontinued, and the affrighted printer persecuted into submission or beggary. Thus, that loud sentinel, the Press, intended as it was to sound the alarm on the first approach of danger, is subsidized by favors, or silenced by intimidation. If it speak at all, it must speak only in praises to the banks and in treachery to the people.

Among this crowd of clamorous dependants are found a thousand bank attorneys—men whose professional connections with the community, whose habits of public speaking, give them a disproportionate influence over the public mind. They, one and all, stand forth, in aid of subsidized presses, to justify whatever enormities these corporations may commit against the people, and to ascribe all the crimes of banks to the Government of their country.

It is thus that the powerful influences which contribute to mould and direct the passions and opinions of towns and cities, are arrayed on the side of the banking system; and it is thus, also, that towns and cities, through the intercourse of business and the agency of the press, contribute so powerfully to mould and direct the passions and opinions of the whole country.

Is it, then, wonderful, that a system which has prostituted and purchased into its service so much of the intellect, which has combined in its support so many of the active elements, of society, should have assumed a despotism, almost absolute, over the public judgment, and laid the country under tribute, even with the country's consent?

And yet, sir, notwithstanding all this, the control of banks over property, over labor, over the very subsistence of the people, notwithstanding their domination over such a multitude of men, whilst power yet abides in the mass, there would still be hope for public liberty, if that power remained uncorrupted when delegated to public agents; for this is the point where the attack is most direct and fatal. The representative principle is the vitality of the Government; and its corruption puts an end to civil liberty. Are we, then, exposed to danger in this direction? Has bank influence reached the public functionaries? Has it contaminated power in their hands; bent them from the line of duty? And have they rewarded the generous confidence of the people with treachery to their dearest interests? I ask these questions; and now, sir, who stands ready with a negative answer? Will it, can it, be denied, that the banking system has, from its very beginning, enlarged and perpetuated itself by re-acting constantly upon the legislation of the country? Look throughout the Union, with what assiduity bank presidents, stockholders, lawyers, borrowers and dependants, are pressed upon the public favor as candidates for all offices, legislative, executive, and judicial. And what, sir, has been the result? How many of these men, thus controlling banks, or controlled by them, thus directly interested in, or personally dependent upon them—how many are seen in the Legislature of every State? Who will say that these men, interested as they are in bank profits against the people who pay them, do not constitute at least one-third, and often a half, of every legislative body? Who will deny that these legislators, faithless to the sacred trusts confided to them, regardless of the public welfare, and mindful only of their own interests, have ever combined, and still do combine, to multiply the privileges, to diminish the responsibilities, and to increase the profits of the banks?

The fundamental laws of the Union, and of the States, have sought to guard public men against temptation and impurity, and thus to secure fidelity to the people, by express provisions. In most, if not all, of the States, men are ineligible to offices created by their own agency, as members of the Legislature; and the officers of the General Government, one and all, are disqualified to sit in the legislative bodies of the States. And yet, in a country so jealous, so vigilent of its freedom, what is the practice universally prevalent, where banks are concerned? Do we not see members of the Legislature, who are already interested in or dependent upon banks already established, conspiring among themselves, as well as with others, to charter new institutions, to incorporate themselves by name, and thus to levy money, for their own use, by their own acts, upon their own constituents?

But is this all? Are the corrupting influences of banks to be found only in legislative bodies? No; the Executive departments of the States are equally exposed. Bank presidents, directors, stockholders, lawyers, and borrowers, may be seen in the persons of Governors and other officers, throughout all the gradations of executive and ministerial authority.

But if the influence of the banking system be fatal to the honest exercise of legislative and executive power, what are we to hope when it falls upon the inviolable ermine? for there it has fallen, and there it has left a stain of impurity broad as the face of the Union. Banks know, full well, the value of a friend at court. They know who are to expound their charters; to limit, or extend, by mere opinion, their powers and privileges; to probe or conceal, to punish or connive at, their frauds and delinquencies. This they understand, and bank officers and dependants are, therefore, converted into judges, or judges converted into bank officers and dependants. In either event, the result is the same to the people. And thus it is that the public law of this great and glorious country, instead of emanating from its freemen, is often both made and administered, in their very presence, by the agency of banks, which are themselves but the creatures of law.

Sir, it may be assumed as a political axiom, founded in the nature of our social being, that, in a popular Government, every considerable division of the community, whether based upon distinct interests, abstract principles, or upon the diversity of human passions, will, if it admit of a separate organization, ultimately become partisan in the struggles for political power. The banking system is such a division; it is so organized, and has openly assumed all the attributes of a partisan. But so comprehensive, so vast, are its powers, that instead of being merely secondary, it has itself become the primary basis of such a party. Instead of being attracted by other interests, it has drawn those interests to itself; and thus the politician is rendered subordinate to the banker, and the public welfare an object subordinate to the welfare of the banks. Sir, is the fact doubted? Then look back through the last eight years; look over the face of the country at the present moment; look through both Houses of Congress; look to the measure now pending in the Senate. What is, what has been during all this time, the controlling influence, the very life and soul, of the Opposition? Has it not been, is it not now, the influence of banks alone? And who are they that devise the measures and direct the energies of that party? Are they not bankers, or the agents, attorneys, and dependants of banks? For what is the struggle protracted? Is it not for the interests of banks? and is not their triumph the great and primary object?

Yes, in all the conflicts of mankind, the power which pays the troops will forever control their movements, and appropriate the benefits of victory. From the first day that the late President advised the discontinuance of the Bank of the United States, that institution, as the central member of the banking system, has struggled to coerce the American people to deliver up their Government into the hands of its lawyers and dependants. And even now, while I am speaking, this, with its eight hundred confederated banks, after having thrown off all the restraints of law, stand forward still claiming the empire of the country, and demanding the public money, in advance, to aid in establishing that claim. And, sir, in what spirit are these frightful pretensions of the banks put forth? What language have we heard? What passions have we seen displayed upon this floor? Have we not heard the same bitter invective, seen the same infuriated passion, which has ever characterized this mercenary warfare upon the Government and the people? In what language, in what spirit, in what manner, have we heard the late President of the United States spoken of by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY?] We have heard that illustrious citizen, though retired to private life, though in no man's way to power, though worn down with age, and standing upon the very verge of the grave; yet we have heard him denounced in the councils of his country—that country which he has served, and saved by his serving; yet even here we have heard such a man denounced as though he were the worst of traitors still prosecuting treason. Napoleon is declared to have been his object of imitation—and why? Did President Jackson usurp the Government? Did he slaughter three millions of his countrymen in attempting the subjugation of the earth? And is he now chained, for his crimes, to a desolate rock in the midst of interminable seas? Or if not so, why not? Why is he suffered to go at large? Why to live in safety, unguarded by power, unawed, unoffended by man? No, sir, his only crime is that of having secured the liberties of his country, by arousing the noble spirit of his countrymen against the sly and insidious attacks of a low, stupid, pilfering despotism. If he be guilty, who is innocent? Are the freemen of this land not as criminal as he?—they who, without flagging for a single moment, stood by him to the last?

But, sir, who is this man thus charged? Who was he? He was an orphan boy, poor and friendless. And yet, by the energy of his character and the force of his genius, he has made the entire cycle of public honors in the first country on the globe; and now, at a goodly old age, he reposes within the peaceful precincts of his beloved Hermitage, with a heart still pure, a judgment unimpaired, and a character still victorious over malice and defamation. That motley rabble of British mercenaries with arms in their hands, of British stipendaries with charters in their pockets, of political wranglers and declaimers, who made up the brindle faction of his country's enemies and of his persecutors, have served only to mark by their fall, one by one, the dates and space between the successive victories of truth, genius, and virtue, over their antagonist principles. There the old man stands, the private citizen, in the furrowed fields of rural life, his venerable form presenting the very incarnation of triumphant patriotism. His fame is fixed, and will for ever remain as immutable to the touch of hostility, as are the fixed laws of truth to the assaults of falsehood. You, Senators, who are his friends, need no longer be concerned on his account. His character is now safe in the public affection; and when he shall have passed down the steep declivity of his remaining days, his grave will be walled around by the hearts of his grateful countrymen, against that vampire spirit that would violate the tomb to glut upon his blood.

And now, sir, having been thus forced into a digression by the injustice done to an absent man upon this floor, I return to the matter before us.

It has been said that the Bank of the United States was never so powerful, because it had been prostrated by President Jackson. But this is an assumption not sustained by the fact. For although the President and people were united against it; although it had violated its charter, spurned the authority of Congress, refused to be examined, leagued with politicians, subsidized some, flattered the ambition of others, and made panic after panic to subdue the spirit of the nation, yet does it stand; and though black with these its notorious offences, it still claims the Government of the country. Yes, sir, it stands, as before, the central power, controlling the paper system throughout. What change has been made in any particular, excepting in the source of its charter? And how has even that change been effected? Was it by the agency of Congress? No, but by that of the people through the Executive veto; for when or where did such an institution ever want influence to obtain a recharter through a legislative body? And why, sir, is this the case? Is it not because these institutions re-act, as I have already said, upon their legislative creators? The bank was actually rechartered, so far as legislative action could effect it; but under what circumstances this was accomplished, the ever enduring records of Congress will show. Before, however, I proceed to exhibit these records, in evidence of the private relations subsisting between the bank and many members of the Congress which passed the renewal of its charter, I will read a precedent for this scrutiny into the bank connections of public men.

On the 31st of March, 1834, (it was the panic session,) this resolution was submitted by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] passed this body, and was afterwards satisfactorily responded to by Mr. Taney, then Secretary of the Treasury:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report to the Senate what amount of public money is now on deposite in the Union Bank of Maryland; when and on what account it was deposited; and also whether any Treasury drafts, contingent or other, have been, during the month of March, 1834, furnished to the said bank, or at any time heretofore to the Bank of Maryland, for any, and what purpose. And that he likewise report what amount of stock in the capital of the said Union Bank was held by R. B. Taney, Esq. when the said bank was selected as one of the banks to receive, in deposite, the public money; and what amount of the stock he now holds."

Such was the resolution; such were then that Senator's suspicions against the purity of the very banks to which he now wishes to commit the revenue; and such then his determination to probe the bank corruptions of public men. If, therefore, these supposed connections of the Secretary with a bank selected by him as a depository of the public money, were deemed so perilous to the honest discharge of his official duties as to demand investigation, it cannot be improper or unwise to inquire into the private relations which the Bank of the United States contracted with the members of Congress, of whom it was asking a recharter. But, sir, should any man feel agrieved by such an exposure, he must ascribe his misfortune to the Senator from Kentucky, who first began this inquisitorial purgation.

In 1834, (it was the panic session,) a majority of this body being in favor of the bank, instructed the Committee on Finance, which was also favorable, "to investigate the affairs and conduct" of that institution; and that committee made, through Mr. Tyler of Virginia, a report upon facts furnished by the bank itself. What, then, are the facts thus furnished and thus reported? Here they are presented in words and figures, giving day and year, with all the distinctness and accuracy of the tabular form. The table suppresses the names, but exhibits the number, of the members of Congress who obtained loans of the bank, and the amount obtained, from 1826 to 1834. Now, sir, let the Senate and the nation bear it in mind, that it was in his message at the opening of the session of 1829–30, that President Jackson announced his objection to the renewal of the charter. From that moment, the renewal became the subject of political strife; and let it never be forgotten, that it was through Congress the bank was to pass, or die. Few, if any, of the members were merchants whose business required large advances of money. But if such advances were necessary, why were they not obtained from the six or eight hundred local banks, some of which were standing in the State, the district, and even at the very door of almost every member? Why did members pass all these, and apply for loans to the only bank upon whose life or death they were required to decide? But is this the fact? Can it be possible that public men could ask private favors from an institution which, at the same moment, was asking public favors of them? And will it be believed, that both parties, regardless alike of their obligations to the country and of the opinions of the world, gratified the desires of each other in every particular, and to the full limit of their mutual powers? Yes, this table answers these questions; and, if I mistake not, the answer will astound this nation. It shows, that in the very first year of the bank contest—the year of 1830—the bank loaned one hundred and ninety-two thousand one hundred and sixty-one dollars to fifty-two members of Congress, that, in 1831, it loaned three hundred and twenty-two thousand one hundred and ninety-nine dollars to fifty-nine members; that, in 1832, it loaned four hundred and seventy-eight thousand and sixty-nine dollars to forty-four members; that, in 1833, it loaned three hundred and seventy-four thousand seven hundred and sixty-six dollars to fifty-eight members; and that, in 1834, it loaned two hundred and thirty-eight thousand five hundred and eighty-six dollars to fifty-two members.

Thus it was, that during the five years of the contest, ending with the panic session of 1834, the Bank of the United States, struggling for a renewal of its charter, distributed in loans, one million six hundred and five thousand seven hundred and eighty-one dollars, to two hundred and sixty-five members of Congress. This enormous sum, greater than the aggregate salaries of all the members of both Houses of Congress during the same period of five years—a sum equal to one-fifteenth part of the whole annual revenues and expenditures of the Federal Government—this sum was thus bestowed, as accommodations, by the bank, at a time of pretended pressure, upon the very men of whom it was asking a charter—a charter, which, if granted, would enable the bank to levy millions in tribute, year after year, upon their constituents.

Sir, these things may have all been innocent. It may be that the additional half million of dollars thrown, as facilities, into the two Houses of Congress by the bank, in 1832—the very time when its recharter was pending and passed—it may be that the large amount, still in addition, thrown in whilst the question of restoring the deposits was pending, in 1834—it may be, that these great and well-timed favors, bestowed by the bank upon men whilst sitting in judgment upon its life and its claim to the public revenue—it may be, that these things had no other effect than to make the recipient members better patriots, more devoted to the public interests, less intent upon their own, and more impartial actors in the contest between the people and the bank. These loans may have been harmless, these men uncorrupted. I know not one, by name, who received these moneys, for their names are suppressed in the report of the committee. I speak not, therefore, to criminate or wound the feelings of any one. But, sir, I know the nature of man; I know that coming to Congress changes him not for the better; I know that gratitude for favors is a principle of that nature; I know that obligations are thus created which the human heart is bound to acknowledge, and the human mind finds it hard to disobey. These things I know; and I know, too, that public liberty can never be safe whilst public men are exposed to such temptations. It is for these reasons, sir, that I stand up this day, not only as an American Senator, but in the still prouder attitude of an American citizen, to warn my countrymen of a danger which I most solemnly believe now threatens the purity and safety of their Government.

But, sir, is this all? Were there no other influences but the facilities of that bank exerted upon the members of Congress during the contest? Were there no other relations subsisting between the members and the bank, but those of borrower and lender? How many of its lawyers and stockholders occupied seats in this Capitol? How many men sat here who were the lawyers, stockholders, and borrowers of the numerous local banks which had petitioned for the recharter of the Bank of the United States, because interested as part of the same system? How many such men were to be found in the several legislatures, bending the influence of whole States to bear upon this cardinal object? And now, sir, I put the question, if that institution, alone, had, pending the struggle, such a number of its attorneys, stockholders, and borrowess, in the two Houses of Congress, how many of such agents and dependants may this, with its league of eight hundred local banks, be supposed now to have under this roof—now, when all these corporations are making a united effort to grasp the public revenues?

Sir, I again say, that members standing in such relations to the banks, even at a time like this, may still be innocent; they may be uninfluenced by bank emoluments in deciding the question of rewarding banks with the profitable use of the public money. All this is possible; but "lead us not into temptation" is, nevertheless, a part of that prayer which is the inheritance of our race.

If, in the administration of justice, the slightest interest in the result disqualifies men to testify or sit in judgment; if the parties litigant are forbidden even to speak in private to a juror, what would be thought of that judge or juryman, who, pending a trial for life, character, or property, should ask and obtain, from one of the parties, the private favor of an enormous loan? Or if the partner or attorney of one of the litigants were found upon the bench, or in the array of the jury, would not such offending judge or juryman incur and deserve as well the public odium as the penalties of public justice? And if, sir, such securities are necessary to the honest administration of law, are they not still more so to guard the purity of the law making power?

Sir, members of legislative bodies should be the last men in this nation to form private connections, or contract obligations, with banks, because they are the men of whom these institutions are constantly asking public favors. If, however, they will do so, regardless of the indelicacy of incurring such obligations, they have no right to evade detection, or to complain of exposure. For what is the course which they pursue, towards other citizens less exposed to corruption, and fully as likely as themselves to resist it? What do we hear, in both Houses of Congress, from day to day, through every session? Do we not hear all officers of Government indiscriminately denounced—denounced as dishonest partisans, corrupted by salaries for which their whole time and labor are bestowed in the public service? More than eleven thousand citizens are employed as postmasters; and although a large, if not an equal, proportion, of the number, are known to be hostile to the party in power, yet we have heard them, one and all, proclaimed to be unprincipled wretches, prostituted into the service and support of a corrupt administration. And now, sir, who are these officers, and what is the amount of those salaries with which they are thus corrupted? Nine-tenths, at least, of the entire number, are farmers residing at cross roads, or mechanics, or inconsiderable merchants, in the little villages, where they are induced to accept of the offices solely for the accommodation of the citizens in the neighborhood. For, in most of these cases, the whole salary received by the officer falls short of twenty dollars a year. But in this calculation I will leave nothing to conjecture; I will speak from the facts and the figures, as found upon the records of the Post Office Department. What, then, is the result?

On the first day of July, 1837, there were, in all, eleven thousand seven hundred and seventy postmasters; and the aggregate salaries paid to the whole, during the preceding year, amounted to eight hundred and ninety-one thousand three hundred and forty-three dollars. Thus, the aggregate amount divided by the number of officers, will show the average annual salary of each to have been but seventy-five dollars and seventy-three cents. And yet, sir, these humble citizens, who thus give their services to the public for a compensation so trivial as this, are denounced in their absence, denounced in the councils of their country, denounced with bitterness and ferocity, as basely prostituted by such salaries as these; and that, too, by members of Congress, who are themselves receiving, for less than half of their time, an average of fifteen hundred dollars annually of the public money. Yes, this is done; these denunciations are poured forth by the very members who, not content with the ample amounts drawn by themselves from the public Treasury, are daily asking, and daily receiving, thousands on thousands in loans from banks, whilst they stand in their places, voting in return to these corporations the custody and the use of the whole revenues of their country. It is in vain, sir, for men who so unjustly, so cruelly revile others for such causes as these, to expect to elude suspicion, whilst exposed themselves to temptations so much more powerful. No: the American people will judge; they have a right; it is their duty to judge, between the delinquency of the accused and the criminality of the accuser. They will judge, and correctly, too, who are the most exposed to corruption, who most likely to yield: the postmasters, with such salaries as these, living in the pure air of the remote interior, among the people themselves; or the men who, withdrawn from the people, stand here, amidst the impurities of the Capitol, reciprocating public for private favors with the banks.

And here, sir, in passing from this view of the subject, I will only remark that, if the liberties of the country are ever overthrown, it will be by corruption; and that if corruption ever strikes into our system, to a fatal degree, it will begin and end in the legislative department. This apprehension is authorized by history, and arises from the fact, that whilst a legislative body is necessarily so small that a majority of its members may have each an individual interest in measures adverse to the general interests of the community, such a body is yet so large that the individual responsibility of each member is weakened and obscured in the crowd. It is between these extremes of great interests and little responsibility, of great temptation and little danger, that corruption strikes; for detection is ever difficult, and impunity probable, when crime comes in organized masses.

If, Mr. President, the tendency of the banking system to exert unwholesome influences over legislative bodies, and if the exposure of those bodies to such influences were not already apparent, these facts might be clearly demonstrated by the extraordinary changes in the relations of public men since the bank contest began. The great body of the people have stood immovably opposed to a National Bank, and as invariably favorable to a reformation of the whole banking system. And yet how numerous are their public agents, who, after their elections to Congress or the State Legislatures, have shifted their ground upon all these questions? But where have they gone? What has been the result of these changes? How few who were friendly, have become unfavorable to banks? How many who were opposed have become friendly to them? Upon the known principles of the human mind, when acting beyond the sphere of adventitious influences, it might be supposed that these changes, for and against, would, in some degree, have counteracted each other. Has such been the fact? No, sir: the betrayed Democracy of the Union feel, and will never forget, that these changes in the course of their public agents have been almost uniformly against the country, and in favor of the banks. And why this strange coincidence? Is it because the conduct of these institutions has been such as to induce a belief in their purity and innocence? If so, why has the same conduct tended only to strengthen in the minds of the people themselves, the opposite conviction? No, sir, no: there can be but little, there can be no difficulty, in solving the secret. Scarcely a man, of all the deserters from the Democratic ranks, leaves behind him a doubt as to the place of his destination. When he goes, no reward is necessary to his detection. He is to be found in the vault of a bank—there is the attraction, and to that point he gravitates.

The Senator from Virginia, [Mr. RIVES] in the zeal of his opposition to the bill before us, has been pleased to attribute the present condition of the banks to "the hostile action of the Government"—to "the Treasury order." I regretted to hear such a charge from such a source. That Senator has long been a member of the party to whose agency he now ascribes these criminal results. We had a reason to hope, and a right to believe, that his opposition to the measure would be that of a friend dissenting with regret; not such an opposition as might be expected from one eagerly seizing an occasion to criminate his old associates, or from an enemy venting the rage of veteran hostility. This language is the more to be regretted, because, whilst it is rendered doubly painful by the sincerity of former friendships, it seems to spring from a conviction that those friendships may never be renewed. Had the Senator but gently chided his friends for what he supposed to be the impolicy of the pending measure, had he uttered but the counsels of mild admonition, he would then have evinced an unchanged temper of mind, rendering the probability of his future co-operation more than an equivalent for his present opposition. If, however, he could not, in sincerity, do this; if he has fixed his purpose to depart for ever, in spite of all the associations which formerly bound him to the Democracy of the Union; if such be his destiny, then not a syllable remains to be pronounced by his ancient friends but the melancholy word—Farewell!

——"A word that must be, and hath been;
A sound which makes us linger; yet, farewell."

This bill, sir, is assailed as a new source of Executive patronage, and the Senator from Virginia sees in its provisions nothing but the frightful spectre of political corruption. I admit the general tendency of patronage to corrupt; and yet that Senator might have given at least one example where it had been bestowed with no meagre liberality without corrupting the fortunate object of Executive bounty. But what is patronage, and to what extent is it sought to be increased? It is the means of acting upon men by rewarding their favor; and the bill creates but about twenty-five additional officers, with inconsiderable salaries. Thus it is, that this patronage, which cannot extend to thirty individuals—a number less than the one-hundredth part of those who may be reached and controlled by the patronage of the smallest bank in the Union; this patronage is denounced as dangerous, by the very men who are now seeking, by their amendatory substitute, to arm the Executive with the whole banking system of the country; with an absolute power over the whole currency; over the property, the labor, and the very subsistence of the entire body of the people! Can men who are struggling to confer powers so omnipotent as these, be sincere in their apprehensions of danger from the paltry patronage created in the bill?

But the first of the two principal features of the bill incurs the hostility of the Senator from Virginia, as affording insufficient security for the safety of the revenue. What, then, is this feature? It provides that the sworn and responsible officers of Government—they who have always collected the public dues—shall, aided by a few others named in the bill, continue to collect them; shall keep them safely till appropriated by law; shall give ample security; shall not use or loan a dollar; all upon the penalty of their bonds, of imprisonment for years, and of eternal degradation as men. Thus all the safeguards that can impose restraint on human agency are provided; and if these are insufficient—if pecuniary and corporeal terrors, with the certainty of personal debasement—if all these afford no guarantee for the rectitude of human conduct, then man can no longer confide in man, and all popular government must end. Why, if officers cannot be trusted with the care of the revenue for a week or a month, till drawn for the public service, why trust them with its collection in the first instance? and why trust other officers with its final disbursement? If agents appointed by the people, from among the people, to transact the affairs of the people, and responsible to the people, are unworthy of the people's confidence; and if, also, bank agents, appointed by banks, interested in banks, and responsible only to banks; if such men are alone worthy to be entrusted with the public income, why not give them its collection and disbursement? Why not deliver all public property to them—place them over your fleets and armies—give them, in a word, the government of your country? No, sir, these apprehensions for the safety of the national treasure, in possession of the sworn and responsible officers of the Government, cannot be sincere, without gentlemen solemnly believe the representative principle of the Constitution radically impotent, without they deem revolution plainly inevitable, and therefore desire to substitute the banks for the people as the source of political power. For, how can men, who believe the Constitution adequate to all the ends of Government—how can they look the country in the face, and declare the revenue more safe in the hands of banks, expressly authorized by law to use it, than in those of officers positively forbidden to touch a dollar, under the penalty of forfeiture, imprisonment, and dishonor? From what part of the conduct of banks and bankers, is such a conclusion to be drawn? Is it from the fact that they have already seized millions of your funds, placed for safety in their vaults—that they still retain them, and now demand of Government its future revenues, as the sole condition upon which they will pay their debts either to the Government or the people? Is it for these reasons that banks are again to be trusted?

To this feature of the bill, however, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEBSTER] urges another and a very different objection. He is alarmed at the strong boxes, the bars, and the bolts—the very means intended to increase the security of the public money. These cumbrous fixtures of Gothic barbarism offend his taste, affright his fancy, and shock, most deeply, his nervous sensibility. And yet that Senator can contemplate all the parts of this dreadful apparatus without terror or emotion, if it be but found in the vault of a bank. In such a cavern he seems composed and at home; there, in that subterraneous abode of all honesty and of all innocence, his imagination can rove, unappalled, through the chilled darkness and the dense vapor, and catch, and hang, and lounge, and repose, upon bars, and bolts, and locks, and hinges, swinging the ponderous door to close the iron entrance. His fright in the one case is equalled by nothing but his courage in the other; and if, in the one instance, his respiration is difficult, in the other, he "breathes deeper and freer."

Yes, it was the Treasury order, the hostile action of the Government, that brought the banks to the ground, by impairing the public confidence. Such is the charge, but what is the fact? All are aware that, until within the last few years, no bank ever dared to discount beyond the aggregate of its capital and deposites. What, then, was the case at the time of suspension? The Treasury order had long been issued; and yet, in the face of that order, and in defiance of its effects, the banks had discounted a hundred millions of dollars beyond the united total of their capital and deposites, both public and private. Such, sir, was then the public confidence, and such the imbecility of the order, that the banks were able thus to levy an extra tax upon the people, equal to the interest upon a hundred millions of ideal capital—a capital existing no where, based upon nothing but the incautious credulity of the country. And now, sir, the banks having expanded their discounts, and with them expanded the public confidence, until the very excess of that confidence has laid the whole system in ruins, we are told, told to our faces, told in the presence of these facts, that the system caved in under the pressure of the Treasury order! This we are told with the bank tables before us, and whilst these tables exhibit an expansion of loans and discounts, after the promulgation, and in despite of the order, such as the banks of no other country, nor our own banks at any former period, ever dared to attempt.

No, sir, the explosion of the banks was natural and inevitable. The Treasury order neither quickened nor retarded the catastrophe. Its only effect was to break the violence of the shock, and to circumscribe the extent of the ruin. The connections of the banks, instead of being confined within the circle of commerce and trade, had become so universal and intense with all the parts of society, as to compel men to silence their own apprehensions, and to express confidence, which they did not feel, in the solvency of the system. The supervisory control of public opinion was withdrawn; the system, therefore, acknowledged no responsibility to law, because no law could be enforced against it. It had grown beyond its natural limits, without the power of receding; and from the moment that it passed the point where public vigilance gave way to public credulity, the system was hurried on to its fall by its own momentum.

Well, the banks are prostrate, the public confidence is withdrawn, and now what remains to be done? We are told that this Government, though without power to control them, without authority to interpose in their affairs, must, nevertheless, restore that confidence by law—restore it, first, by receiving their bills as money, and then returning those bills for the use of the banks. Thus the Government is asked not only to bestow its own confidence upon these corporations, by receiving bills as money known to be worth less than money, and by depositing its funds for safety in banks known to be unsafe; but it is likewise asked to compel the people to acknowledge the solvency of institutions admitted to be bankrupt. And, sir, this confidence of the Government, and of the country, is demanded for the banks by the very same men who are proclaiming to the people that they should repose no confidence in the Government itself, or in their own virtue and ability to select the officers of Government. But what act of Congress, or of the Executive, could restore public confidence in these institutions? None, sir, none: the minds of freemen are not the subjects of legislative coercion; their judgments will never be forced by law upon falsehood in the very presence of opposing truth. You may declare the confidence of Congress in the solvency and honesty of all these corporations, but such a declaration will neither be true nor effective; and, if it could thus control the public judgment, as is asked and expected, it would be a legislative fraud upon the people, and an act of deliberate treachery to the country.

The second and last cardinal feature of the bill before us:—what is it, and what does it propose? Does it propose, as has been assumed in debate, an immediate collection of all the revenue in metal? No: it provides for the receipt, after one year, of one-sixth part only in specie, and then a proportionate annual increase of metal for the six succeeding years; after which, no notes are receivable. This, with the deposite feature, constitutes the whole of the bill called the Sub-Treasury; and it is for such a bill that the substitute has been submitted by the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. RIVES.]

And now, what are the features and principles of this substitute?

It first assumes that there are two currencies in the country, one better than the other; that the people and the Government are two separate and hostile bodies; and that the latter seeks to appropriate to itself the better currency, and to force the less valuable upon the former; and having assumed such to be the facts, and such the design of the Government, the substitute then proceeds to defeat this design, by forcing the inferior currency on both Government and people. Well, sir, metallic money is admitted, the world over, to be the only standard of value for labor and property. If, therefore, it be true, that paper is less valuable, then that fact is a reason conclusive, not only against its receipt as money by the Government, but also against the banking system itself, by which such paper is imposed upon the community.

But how stands the other proposition, so repeatedly urged by the mover and by the friends of the substitute? Is it true that the people and the Government are distinct and hostile bodies? It will be admitted, I presume, that the men of America, acting through their State agencies, created the Government; it will not be questioned that they elect its officers, supply its revenues, and prescribe its policy; nor will it be denied that they, the men, are, in fact, the Government itself. What, then, does the Senator from Virginia mean by the term people, as a body distinct from, and hostile to, the Government? I will seek his meaning in the tendency of his argument, and in the character of the authority he pressed into his service.

That Senator, sir, has commended the genius, and invoked to his aid the opinions of Mr. Burke. I, too, acknowledge, in many respects, the just authority of that transcendant intellect; nor do I withhold from the memory of the man that sacred respect which is due from an American to the memory of one whose life and actions, though an Englishman and at home, had a bearing upon the Revolutionary struggle of our fathers, by no means unfriendly to its success. But still, the writings and sentiments of Mr. Burke were those of a monarchist. He had been reared amidst, and died devoted to, the monarchical system of Great Britain, and of Europe. If his objections to the abuses of that system were great, his fears from its overthrow were yet greater; and it cannot be disguised that, as he declined in the vale of years, his mind took refuge in those very abuses, from the terrors of the French revolution. It was then that he sought to check those liberal principles to which his earlier life had been devoted; it was then, when the insurgent spirit and rising power of an oppressed people threatened the very existence of monarchy; it was then that he came forward as a politician and as an author, to repress that spirit, and resist that power. The same philosophical temper of mind which rendered him timid as a statesman, amid the convulsive action of masses, ultimately led him in search of some abstract principle upon which to rest his opposition to all popular movements. It was then, and with this view, that in his works on the French Revolution, and in his celebrated "Appeal from the new to the old Whigs," he laid down and enforced the principle, that men, told by the head, are not, in a political sense, the people of a country; but that fixtures, corporations, orders, and classes, being distinct parts of the general mass, and founded upon prerogative, privilege, perpetuity, and property, that these, taken together, constitute "the people," or the nation. Thus, in his creed, the natural man, the individual citizen, is annihilated as a constituent element of the nation or the people, and the artificial combination substituted in his place—a principle, the exact opposite of that upon which this Government, with its freedom, stands. And yet, sir, it is upon this principle of Mr. Burke that the discrimination is here sought to be made between the Government and the people. It is here, in the Senate, that the same combinations, orders, banks, and corporations, resting upon the same separate interests, the same privileges and immunities, stand forth claiming to be "the people" of this country, and asserting a right to its Government. We can now understand what is meant when gentlemen of Mr. Burke's school speak of "the people." We may know that corporations, that banks, not individuals, are intended; we may know that this principle, for proclaiming which Mr. Burke was publicly expelled from the liberal party of England, now lies at the foundation of a party in America.

But to the substitute. What are its features, what its principles? They are few, and by no means novel. It prososes no project yet to be tested by experiment, but one which experiment has already shown to be impracticable. It proposes the former State bank deposite system, in full view of the ruins of that system. Bank notes are again to be received, to be received as equivalent to money, though the very discrimination which constitutes the essence of the substitute, implies that they are not so equivalent. The public treasure is to be placed, for safety, in banks expressly authorized to render it unsafe, by applying it to their own use, as they have done millions still withheld from the Government. Such are the favors proposed as bounties to the banks for the resumption of specie payments—for complying with their obligations—for paying their debts—for ceasing to resist the law; such is the reward to be offered by Government to bribe rebellion back into obedience. And now, sir, I ask, in what will the resumption of specie payments, under the provisions of this substitute, benefit the Government, when, by the substitute itself, the Government solemnly contracts with the banks not to demand specie, but to receive, exclusively, the very notes it now rejects? The Government now refuses to receive them for no other reason than because the banks now refuse to pay them—and yet, the Government is required to receive them, in future, under an express stipulation that they are not to be paid. For if Government is compelled, by law, to receive notes, good faith, in the execution of the law, forbids their presentation for payment. And thus, instead of inducing resumption, this measure proposes, in effect, to legalize and perpetuate suspension, so far as Government is concerned, and to the full extent of its revenues. That such will be the effect, does any man doubt? Then test the question by extending the principle. Suppose the whole community should make the like contract with the banks; should agree that, for an indefinite series of years, their bills should be received as money, and thus incur the obligation, in good faith, not to present them for redemption. In such a case, would the banks keep a silver dollar on hand? Would they have use for one? And would not the suspension be universal and eternal—and that, too, under the plighted faith of the public? What, sir, is the language of the substitute? It says to the Government—Take the notes of banks; do not present them for payment; express this your confidence in them; the people will follow your example; they will do the same; no specie will then be drawn; the banks can then resume; we shall then have a currency mixed of paper and of metal, and all will go well. But, sir, what resumption? What are the banks to resume the payment of? Who is to ask for payment, and "whence is the metal to come which is to enter into the circulation?" How are these thing to be done, if both Government and people are to receive nothing but notes, and never to ask their redemption? No, sir, the only security for the banks themselves, and for the community against bank excesses and impositions, consists in leaving every one, Government and all, free to receive, to reject, or to present their notes at pleasure for payment. This being the fact, there will always exist a modified confidence in the solvency of banks that are solvent, which, whilst it is sufficient to sustain their circulation, will yet be so distrustful as to excite in them the apprehension of a run upon the appearance of any indiscretion on their part, and thus impose all the safeguards of which such institutions admit. To absolute and unqualified confidence, they are not entitled. Human experience forbids such confidence to be bestowed on any man, or combination of men, whose agency is to affect the well being of others. Government itself, the responsibility of all public functionaries, rests upon a degree of distrust in the public mind, sufficient to excite vigilance, and to detect delinquency.

Again, sir, what is the substitute but a covenant with the banks, by which the Government is to give them a credit, indefinite as to time, and limited in amount only by the total of its income? And this credit is to be given to the only species of debtors whose responsibility is always uncertain, whose security is never sufficient, and against whom it is impossible, in the nature of things, ever to enforce the laws of the country. For is it not manifest, from all past and present experience, that these institutions have become so connected with the whole machinery of society, so interwoven with the very texture of our social economy, as to defy the enforcement of legal obligations, and to compel their creditors, Government, and people, to temporize with and to coax them into compliance with those obligations? Why was the extra session of Congress called? Was it because the Government had no money? No, but because the banks had the money of the Government, and refused to pay it. Was the Government thus arrested in its action, and compelled to resuscitate itself by a forced loan from the people?—was this the case, because it had no revenue, and because there existed no specie in the country? No, but because the banks had possession of its revenues, and because their vaults withheld the specie from all their creditors. And yet, when, where, and by whom were the laws of the land enforced against them? When did the Government, in a single instance, obtain judgment and enforce execution? Who, of all the citizens, resorted to that law against the banks, which the banks were daily enforcing against them, and which they, the people, were daily enforcing against each other? No, sir, not at all; but, on the contrary, this universal rebellion of the banks against all law has been legalized and extended by the law-making power. Thus it is, that the Government is required to loan to the banks the whole revenue of the country; and, in effect, to double this loan, by receiving their notes, in the first instance, as money. It is to such debtors that the Government is required to make such a loan, whilst it refuses to credit an honest citizen, with his homeless family, for one solitary acre of its public domain.

Thus briefly, sir, have I sought to illustrate the principles and tendency of this substitute. It is a measure rendered equally odious by the circumstances under which it is presented, by the assumption on which it rests, and by the consequences which must inevitably result from its adoption. It comes to us in the form of a demand—a demand made as a political right—made by private corporations upon this Government and people, for the use of the public money, and for a mortgage upon the future revenues of the country. It demands, also, that, in addition to this, the Government and the people shall give to these corporations a credit indefinite as to time and amount, and that, too, without an equivalent, without adequate security, and without any necessity for so doing. This demand of objects so important is made at a time when these corporations, having prostrated the laws of the country—having seized the public treasure—having refused to pay their notes in the hands of the people—are now standing out in fearless defiance of all public authority. And what right have the banks to make this demand? Have they a better claim to the public money than an equal number of other individuals who are not incorporated? No, none whatever. What, then, should we think, what should we feel, if, instead of a league of eight hundred banks, eight hundred citizens should band themselves together in battalion form, should surround this Capitol, and, instead of agents, attorneys, borrowers, and dependants, should send their military commander into this chamber, to demand, on their behalf, the whole national income? Would not every Senator then spring to his feet, fired with the rage of insulted honor? Would he not meet such a demand with the deepest execrations; and would not the whole body of the American people rush to the Capitol to rescue their treasure from pillage, and their Government from usurpation? Yes: and what, sir, is the difference between the two cases? There is none; no circumstance of discrimination, except the popular delusion which transforms the banks from private corporations into political institutions, and invests these associations of mere brokers and shavers with all the authority, the attributes, and the dignity, of organized political departments. It is this delusion, arising from the unrebuked assumptions of the banks, and strengthened by the silent acquiescence of time, that has enabled these incorporated companies thus to change their character in the public estimation.

But, sir, I must again press upon the attention of the Senate the startling fact that this demand of the public money is made by the banks, upon the avowed assumption that the Constitution has provided no sufficient means for the execution of its own powers; that the officers elected under it by the people are not to be trusted; and that the irresponsible agencies of banks, unknown to the Constitution, must be brought in to supersede those officers, to supplant the Constitution itself, and to take charge of a Government which the people are supposed incompetent to administer. Thus we, the representatives of the States and of the people, are insulted to our very faces; for, if the numerous citizens selected to perform the duties of the other departments of Government be unworthy of the public confidence, how shall we escape the same denunciation, or assume to be more worthy than they? But even this outrage, great as it is, might be endured, if it were confined to us, and to the officers of Government alone. Such, however, is not the fact; for this demand, thus made upon the ground that agents selected by the popular voice are unworthy of confidence, is equally an insult to the majesty of the sovereign people themselves. It is a declaration to them that they are incompetent to elect; and that therefore, the elective franchise, so prostituted and abused, is to be withdrawn from them, and conferred upon the banks.

And now, Mr. President, what are the immediate consequences which are to result from the adoption of the substitute? The banks of deposite are to be selected by the joint vote of the two Houses of Congress. Here, then, the banks and the Government are to be united, not only in the exterior administration of the finances, but that union is to begin in the very source of the law-making power. The banks are to enter the Capitol, with their fatal facilities, to canvass against each other, with the members of Congress, for the custody of the national revenue. They are here to canvass for these favors with the very men by whose votes this revenue is to be raised, reduced, or diminished; and, consequently, the profits of the successful banks augmented or lessened. What a scene would this present! Eight hundred moneyed corporations, with five hundred millions of dollars to loan, garrisoned each winter in the Capitol, among their faithful presidents, lawyers, stockholders, and borrowers, canvassing for a majority of the two Houses—canvassing for the deposites, for an increase of taxes, and for a diminution in the expenditure of those taxes when collected! In such a scene, what would become of legislative purity? what of the rights of the people? What of the public liberty? And which, of all the banks, would succeed in the contest for Congressional favors? Would not the Bank of the United States—the controlling centre of the paper system—she whose friends already throng these halls—she who is already so deeply skilled in political facilities—would she not stand triumphant in our midst? Yes, the same vote which could pass this substitute, would give her the deposites; and thus that institution would again become a National Bank, with all the powers and immunities she before enjoyed, without any of the restraints or responsibilities imposed by a Congressional charter. And here, sir, I shall express it as my deliberate opinion, that every man of the Opposition will sustain this substitute, and that, too, with a view to the very result I have anticipated. Those who desire the concentration of the money power in a National Bank, will ask for none better than the Bank of the United States will become, should this measure be adopted. Nor will that institution desire or accept of a national charter, if it can obtain the public moneys under the less embarrassing charter it now enjoys.

These, sir, are my opinions. The subject of a National Bank will still be urged before the people, but not seriously desired, by the political leaders. They are not the men to pursue visionary forms, to the neglect of substantial realities. Their object is the concentration and union of the money with the political power of the country, and they see in every line of the substitute before us the certain accomplishment of that object.

And now, sir, standing in my place, and in the immediate presence of the American people, I pronounce it as the solemn conviction of my judgment, that this union, should it be effected—the union of the banking or paper system with the Government—will prostrate the liberties of the country; and that this prostration will continue until that inborn love of freedom, the peculiar inheritance of this nation, shall rise to restore those liberties by the only means which despotism cannot withstand. In such a union, in such a compound of the money with the political power, it would be utterly immaterial which of the elements predominated—whether that of the Government, or of the banks. The junction of the two would speedily result in blending both into one; and it is this consolidation, this aggregation, of powers so vast in the same men; it is this which would enable those men to override the liberties of the country. What, then, sir, would be our condition, if the very men who are now struggling to effect this consolidation should succeed, and having succeeded, should, by that very success, place themselves in possession of these powers thus consolidated? Would not the fact of their success, in this effort, be proof conclusive of the dangerous strength of the banking system, which is now their sole support? and would not that strength, united with the powers of Government, enable these men to perpetuate their reign, and to spurn, with impunity, the complaints of a betrayed and ruined people?

How, then, can we adopt a measure fraught with consequences so momentous, so fatal, as these? How can we sit and hear, with patience, a demand thus made of the whole revenues of the Republic—made, as a political right, by private corporations—made upon principles tending infallibly to a revolution of the Government? Shall we sit and hear, unmoved, hear without a becoming spirit of resistance, a proposition so wounding to every sense of patriotism, so plainly destructive of the liberties of the country? Where, Senators, are the souls of your sires? Did you inherit nothing from them but freedom—freedom without the spirit to defend it? Are you thus destitute, and will you betray the only country where abides the only hope to solace the sufferings of mankind? If not, how can you, how dare you support a measure which is to place such a country as this under the vulgar despotism of a moneyed monopoly?

GRADUATION OF THE PRICE OF PUBLIC LANDS.

SPEECH OF MR. CLAY,
OF ALABAMA.

In Senate, March 29, 1838.—The "bill providing for the reduction and graduation of the price of the public lands" having been taken up for consideration—

Mr. CLAY of Alabama addressed the Senate, in substance, as follows:

MR. PRESIDENT: It is cause of gratulation, not only with their several delegations, but with the people, generally, of the new States, as they are familiarly called, that there is, at length, a disposition manifested by the Senate to give to the matters involved in this bill that examination and deliberation which their great importance to the interests and prosperity of those States would seem to demand. Impressed with a deep sense of the justice, as well as the sound policy, of such a measure, the Legislatures of the States embracing the public domain, and the people of those States in their primary assemblies, through their resolves and memorials, have repeatedly, and year after year, for the last twelve or fifteen, most earnestly invoked the attention and action of Congress. Nor is it remarkable that those States should evince such solicitude on this subject, when we reflect on the difference between cultivated fields, abounding in the rich and varied productions of their several portions of the country—not only adding to their own strength and resources, but increasing those of the whole Union—and the wild, unbroken forest, or waste and unproductive territory.

It is true, sir, our humble petitions have been received during the period alluded to, and generally referred, in each House, to the committee having charge of subjects connected with the public lands. In several instances, bills have been reported by those committees, in principle somewhat like the one now before us; but in no instance, do I recollect, within the last seven or eight years, has either House gone farther than to receive such report and place the bill on the calendar, there to remain untouched, and stand over amongst the unfinished business of each successive session. Yes, sir, whilst days, and even weeks, have been devoted to the consideration of local subjects and individual claims, I have often felt mortified and humiliated that not one hour was vouchsafed to the discussion of this question, involving directly the paramount interests of more than one third of the States, and, in a more remote degree, the welfare of the entire Union.

Although discouraged by these repeated failures and disappointments, we have not despaired; but, confiding in the good faith of our country, we have continued our annual appeals to her justice and magnanimity. A blessing is promised, by the highest authority, to those who hold out to the end; I am so far a believer as never to despair in a good cause; and I trust we shall, to some extent, realize the benefits of such perseverance on this occasion.

I am persuaded, Mr President, that all that is necessary to insure success to this bill, or some similar measure, is for gentlemen to examine, and understand its provisions. I do not ask gentlemen to take for granted, or yield implicit assent to, the representations which may be made by the friends of the bill; but, at the same time, I trust they will not take on faith, the objections or the assertions of its opponents: With some members on this floor, I have been sorry to observe a kind of nervous excitability, whenever a proposition is submitted in reference to the public domain, especially if that proposition should come from a member of a new State. We hear it frequently said, or insinuated, in substance, that the people of the new States wish to obtain the public lands without the payment of any consideration, or for a very inadequate one. Sir, said Mr. C. nothing is farther from the fact. The inhabitants of those States as seldom ask donations of public land as those of the older members of the Confederacy. When they ask the right of pre-emption for settlers and occupants, who have improved and given greater value to, and accelerated the sales of, the public domain, they do not ask them as a gift; but the application is always accompanied by the offer to pay the minimum price —the same price you obtain from the monopolist and speculator, who never contributed an iota to the improvement of the country, or to the interest of the Government. When they ask you to reduce and graduate the price of inferior land, which has been offered at public sale, and refused, then, and for years afterwards, at $1 25 per acre, they do not ask you to take less than its value. No, sir: the proposition is, that you will sell it, in a reasonable time, at its fair value, to be ascertained either by the length of time it may have remained in market unsold, or by any other just criterion of value. The imputation that the new States, or their representatives, wish to rob the nation of the public domain, or even to obtain it without the payment of a fair price, is wholly unfounded. They only ask the adoption of just principles in the sale of it, and permission to take it on the payment of a fair and full equivalent. It may, indeed, become a question with the old States, as well as the new ones, whether it will be sound policy for the General Government to retain the millions of acres, which may be found in all of them, so barren and sterile as not to command twelve and a half cents, six and a quarter cents, or, perhaps, one cent, per acre, and which, consequently, must cease to furnish a source of indemnity, even for the expense of keeping the land offices, indispensable to afford an opportunity to purchase. That question, however, does not present itself on this occasion, and may be safely left to the determination of those who will follow us. "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof."

Sir, said Mr. C. the enlightened views of the present Chief Magistrate, upon this subject, communicated in his annual message, however some of us may differ with him in opinion, as regards the particular mode of effectuating the object in contemplation, show that he has devoted to it the attention due to its importance, and are worthy of all commendation. The President's views are set forth, upon every branch of our policy, connected with the sale and disposition of the public domain, with such characteristic force and perspicuity, that I am almost astonished that any statesman can withhold his assent to some such course as he has recommended. After some general remarks upon the system, under which the public domain has been hitherto managed, he introduces the subject embraced by the bill under consideration, by remarking: "The modification most perseveringly pressed upon Congress, which has occupied so much of its time for years past, and will probably do so for a long time to come, if not sooner satisfactorily adjusted, is a reduction in the cost of such portions of the public lands, as are ascertained to be unsalable at the rate now established by law, and a graduation, according to their relative value, of the prices at which they may hereafter be sold. It is worthy of consideration whether justice may not be done to every interest in this matter, and a vexed question set at rest, perhaps forever, by a reasonable compromise of conflicting opinions. Hitherto, after being offered at public sale, lands have been disposed of at an uniform price, whatever difference there might be in their intrinsic value." Again, he adds: "All will concede the abstract principle, that the price of the public lands should be proportioned to their relative value, so far as can be accomplished, without departing from the rule heretofore observed, requiring fixed prices in cases of private entries. The difficulty of the subject seems to lie in the mode of ascertaining what that value is." Sir, no man can successfully controvert the principle here laid down. Its mere statement is sufficient to establish its truth.

Mr. President, said Mr. C. I have given this subject much attention during the last seven or eight years; and I have long since formed the opinion that the price might be graduated with sufficent accuracy, according to the time the land shall remain in market, subject to private entry, reducing it periodically, till it comes down to the fair relative value. Property of any description will soon find a purchaser, when offered on such terms. If land will not bring one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre, when offered at public sale, to which all are invited by a proclamation of from three to six months; nor when the offer at private each of which affords a strong indication of the relative value; that is, to the field notes of the several surveyors, the locality of each tract, and the time the same may have been in market subject to entry; and, to guard against possible losses to the Government in particular cases, when they, or a majority of them, shall deem that necessary to ascertain the fair value, those public officers are to determine it by actual inspection.

A few moments' attention to the several considerations, which the amendment proposes to make imperative upon the public officers to be charged with the valuation and classification, it seems to sible, to "compromise conflicting opinions." The bill, referred to the committee, embraced substantially the principle of valuation, by the officers engaged in the sale of the public lands, in connection with the time they might be market. The amendment carries out this principle, and prescribes more definitely the mode in which that duty shall be performed.

The amendment proposes to associate with t e register and receiver of each land district, the surveyor general, or such deputy as he may designate for that duty, for the purpose of valuing and assigning to four distinct classes, all the public lands that may have been offered for sale, and remain unsold, in the respective districts, "having due regard" to three distinct considerations, in all instances, tive value of the public lands in the old districts, which have been for a length of time in market, to be appraised, and classed into two or more rates below the present minimum price, by the officers now employed in this branch of the public service," &c.

The Committee on the Public Lands, to which this part of the message was referred, were fully aware that objections to a graduation by time, and a preference for valuation, were not confined to the President, but equally entertained by a large number of the members of both Houses; and though, perhaps, a majority of the committee preferred the former mode, they have, in the amendment under c nsideration, adhered to the latter; in order, if possale is continued on the same terms for four or five years afterwards, it affords a fair and reasonable presumption, that it is worth less; and, without much risk of sacrificing the public interest, it might l e reduced twenty-five cents. If it will not sell for one dollar per acre for four or five years more, it is sufficient evidence that it is still less valuable; and, on this principle, reductions might take place periodically, without the hazard of material loss to the Government. Besides, I came to the conclusion, that this plan might be carried into effect with more ease, simplicity, and economy, than any other. These opinions, sir, are not yet changed; and left to my own election, and regarding the interest of the Government, as well as that of my constituents, I should still prefer it to any other.

But, sir, the President has been led to a different conclusion, and has suggested the expediency of "an actual valuation of lands, and classification of them into different rates;" and, also, "to cause the relative, will impress the minds of Senators with the practical fairness of the plan. It will be borne in mind that neither the bill nor amendment embraces that portion of the public lands which have not been offered and refused at auction. Both are expressly confined to lands which "have been offered at public sale and remain unsold" at the minimum price, and "at private entry four years"

"The field notes of the several surveyors," to which the officers engaged in the performance of the duty of valuation, are to have due regard, constitute one important source of information. The law upon the subject requires that "every surveyor shall note in his field-book the true situations of all mines, salt licks, salt springs, and mill seats, which shall come to his knowledge; all water courses over which the line he runs shall pass; and also the quality of the lands. These field-books shall be returned to the surveyor general, who shall therefrom cause a description of the whole lands surveyed to be made out and transmitted to the officers, who may superintend the sales. He shall also cause a fair plat to be made of the townships and fractional parts of townships contained in the said lands, describing the subdivisions thereof, and the marks of the corners. This plat shall be recorded in books to be kept for that purpose. A copy thereof shall be kept open at the surveyor general's office, for public information; and other copies sent to the places of sale, and to the Secretary of the Treasury."

From an examination of this law, it will be perceived that, if the surveyor has faithfully performed his duty, there will be little difficulty in arriving at a safe conclusion as to the value of any public land, after it has first undergone the test of an auction sale, without finding a purchaser. If the surveyor has honestly and carefully noted all the "mines, salt licks, salt springs, and mill seats; all water courses over which the line he runs shall pass; and also the quality of the lands," what more can be considered necessary to ascertain its value?

If any thing more be necessary to a correct valuation, it may be found in the precise "locality of each tract," and "the time the same may have been in market, subject to entry." This information, added to that derived from the "field-notes," ought to satisfy the most scrupulous guardian of the public interest. When the "quality" of the soil is known, with its mineral properties, and its "water privileges"—as some denominate them—and the proximity of the tract to towns, villages, navigable streams, or other facilities of transportation, and the tract has been four, eight, twelve, or sixteen years in market, subject to private entry, open to be purchased by all the world, and still remains unsold, the public interest will be in little danger if it be sold at any of the prices contemplated by the amendment.

But if, from any peculiar consideration, those officers of the Government should not be satisfied as to the value of any portion of the public land within the particular district, another clause of the amendment remedies the imperfection. They may resort to "actual inspection, when they, or a majority of them, shall deem that necessary to ascertain the fair value."

Under all these restrictions and qualifications, sir, can we not safely confide in the judgment, integrity, and circumspection of our own sworn officers, charged, as they are, with the management of this class of the public property? Two of the officers, the register and receiver, necessarily reside within the limits of the respective land districts, and, usually, at some central point. The third officer may be found in every land district, in the person of some deputy surveyor. Independently of the information which is open to them, on the records of the Land Office, and which it will be their duty to regard, they will possess a general topographical knowledge of the country. No material error can be committed, unless it be wilfully done. But, were there more danger of undervaluing than can be reasonably apprehended, will you cavil with the industrious and humble cultivator of the soil for the paltry difference of a few cents an acre, after you have in vain tried to sell it at auction, and have, for four years afterwards, found no one willing to give one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre? Sir, I most heartily wish this question could be carried home to the honest hearts and feelings of every American citizen. I would most cheerfully abide by their response.

But, sir, the guards of the public interest do not even stop at those I have mentioned. However inferior may be the quality of the soil, or the disadvantages of its situation, the first class below the minimum must have been four years subject to private entry before it can be bought at one dollar per acre; the second class must have been offered at one dollar, four years more, before it can be bought at seventy-five cents; the third class must have been offered four years more, at seventy-five cents, before it can be bought at fifty cents; and the fourth class must have been offered four years more, at fifty cents—making sixteen years in all, at the various periodical reductions—before it can be bought at twenty-five cents per acre. Nor can the act take effect, except as to those lands which the register and receiver of the proper land district, and the surveyor, shall, within twelve months after its passage, report to the Secretary of the Treasury to be of no greater value than the prices fixed in the manner before mentioned. And to guard against the danger of monopoly and speculation, no person is permitted to enter, at the reduced prices, more than six hundred and forty acres, or one section, in legal subdivisions, in his own name, or in the name of any other person for his own use. It is no part of the policy of the new States, nor is it the desire of their citizens, to obtain the enactment of any law that will either encourage speculation, or result in a monopoly of the public lands. They entertain the opinion that their wealth and strength consist in a numerous, free, and independent population; and they are too intelligent not to know that the best way to attain that object is to promote and encourage the interests of agriculture. An independent body of freeholders, and industrious cultivators of the soil, are not only always the best friends of freedom, but they furnish the indispensable means of subsistence, and the resources, which constitute the substratum of national prosperity, in every other department of business.

With such views and sentiments as I have justly ascribed to the citizens of the States, comprehending the public domain, is it remarkable that they should be dissatisfied, nay, sir, that they should even be restive, under the operation of laws which are in direct conflict with those opinions, and tend to defeat their accomplishment? By the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, made in January last, responsive to a resolution of the Senate adopted at the late extra session, we are informed there are 71,004,068.68 acres remaining unsold, which have been first offered for sale at auction, and then at sale by private entry, five years and upwards. Including the quantity which has been since offered at public sale, and now also subject to entry, the quantity is increased to more than 97,000,000 of acres.

But, sir, as the bill does not contemplate a reduction of the price, unless the land shall have been in market, at private entry, five years or upwards, I will confine myself to that class. By this report, it appears that more than 14,000,000 of acres have been in market twenty years and upwards, and, looking back to former reports, much of it has been subject to private entry twenty-five or thirty, and some of it even as much as forty, years! About 22,000,000 of acres have been in market more than fifteen, and under twenty, years; more than 16,000,000 of acres have been so offered for more than ten, and less than fifteen, years; and 18,517,802 acres for more than five, and less than ten, years; making the grand aggregate, before stated, of more than 71,000,000 of acres, which have not found a purchaser, though offered in every manner authorized by existing laws for five years and upwards.

However unreasonable a fixed and uniform price for lands, of every description and quality, may appear in the abstract, it operates with peculiar injustice and severity upon the Southwestern States, and the Territory of Florida. There, we have every variety of soil, from the most fertile, productive, and valuable, to the most sterile and worthless—alluvial, rich low grounds, mountains, and pine barrens. In Alabama, out of the quantity within her chartered limits, (estimated at about 34,000,000 of acres,) more than 29,000,000 have been offered for sale, and only about 10,000,000 have been sold—little more than one-third. In Mississippi, (omitting fractions,) 20,000,000 of acres offered, (exclusive of that in the Chickasaw country,) and only 9,000,000 sold. In Louisiana, of 6,000,000 offered, only 2,000,000 have been sold. In Arkansas, of 12,500,000 offered, only 2,000,000 have been sold. In Missouri, of 21,000,000 offered, only 5,500,000 have been sold. And in Florida, of more than 6,000,000 offered, there have been sold but 683,324—a little more than one-tenth! Do not these facts demonstrate the inequality of the soil, and the absurdity of one arbitrary price for all the lands in those five States, and the Territory of Florida? With the exception of Missouri, they all produce the great staple of the South, and, a portion of the country, the sugar cane. Regarding agricultural profits, health, and enjoyment, it is the finest climate in the world. We all know with what eagerness lands are sought in that region; yet, in twenty years and upwards, the Government has not been able to sell more than from one-third to one-tenth of the quantity surveyed and brought into market.

Mr. President, as a large portion of the public domain was acquired by cessions from the several States which claimed Western territory, I have thought it well to look into the early proceedings upon the subject, to understand the inducements held out, and the motives which probably operated to produce those relinquishments. The earliest action of the Continental Congress seems to have had little or no reference to revenue, or profit; but to have been prompted by political considerations of much higher import. The first document emanating from that Congress, which I have been able to find, is the report of a committee, having manifest relation to discontents and jealousies amongst the States, threatening the peace and harmony of the Union, which was adopted on the 6th of September, 1780. In that report, it was advised and agreed "to press upon those States, which can remove the embarrassments respecting the Western country, a liberal surrender of a portion of their territorial claims, since they cannot be preserved entire, without endangering the stability of the general Confederacy; to remind them how indispensably necessary it is to establish the Federal Union on a fixed and permanent basis, and on principles acceptable to all its respective members; how essential to public credit and confidence, to the support of the army, to the vigor of our councils, and success of our measures, to our tranquillity at home, our reputation abroad, to our very existence as a free, sovereign, and independent people," &c.

On the 10th of October, of the same year, the Congress passed a resolution, declaring "that the unappropriated lands that might be ceded or relinquished to the United States, by any particular State, pursuant to the recommendation of Congress of the 6th day of September last, should be disposed of for the common benefit of the United States, and be settled and formed into distinct Republican States, which should become members of the Federal Union, and have the same rights of sovereignty, freedom, and independence, as the other States," &c.

By a resolution adopted on the 18th of April, 1783, Congress renewed the recommendations to the States contained in those of September and October, 1780, to make the liberal cessions therein recommended, "as a further mean, as well of hastening the extinguishment of the debts, as of establishing the harmony of the United States, &c." And, again, on the 29th of April, 1784, that body adopted a preamble and resolution, referring to those which have already been mentioned, alluding to the national debt, growing out of the war which had been happily terminated, and again resolving that the said States (having Western territory,) be earnestly pressed by immediate and liberal cessions, to forward these necessary ends (the extinguishment of the debt of the Revolution,) and the harmony of the Union."

Now, Mr. President, although the extinguishment of the national debt is presented, in the two last resolutions, as an inducement to the cessions recommended, is it not apparent that other and higher considerations prompted the action of Congress? That subject is not distinctly brought to view in any of the other resolutions, while we find prominent, in all of them, patriotic expressions of sentiment in regard to removing embarrassments arising out of territorial claims in the West, promoting the stability of the general Confederacy, establishing the Federal union on a fixed and permanent basis, and preserving the harmony of the United States. These were the paramount considerations, which were again and again urged upon the patriotism and liberality of those States, having or claiming extensive territory. They were too large—they promised to be too powerful: hence the jealousies and apprehensions of the smaller ones, and the frequent and earnest appeals of Congress, to remove the cause which so much threatened our tranquillity at home, and our reputation abroad.

The resolution of October, 1780, also contains an express pledge, which is, perhaps, implied in all the others, that the territory which might be ceded or relinquished, should be settled and formed into distinct Republican States, which should become members of the Federal Union, and have the same rights of sovereignty, freedom and independence, as the other States; and, judging from what followed, the harmony of the Union and stability of the Confederacy being restored and established by the mere acts of cession, nothing remained to be done by this Government of as much interest to the ceding States, as the performance of this solemn covenant. Although all the States which relinquished territory, stipulated in substance that the lands so ceded should be considered a common fund, for the use and benefit of such of the United States as had, or should become, members of the Confederation, there is not an intimation that they shall be made, through all time, one of the great sources of revenue, much less that the most inferior should be sold at as high a price as the most fertile. If such an idea had then been suggested, as refusing a home on the public domain to those who had fought the battles of the Revolution, and, by blood and peril, achieved the liberty and independence of their country, or to their descendants, for a moderate price, or, perhaps, without any price at all, the enlightened and warm-hearted patriots, either in the councils of the States or the nation, would have revolted at the proposition. Sir, such a proposition would not then have been entertained; and if any who were members of Congress in those times of high-toned patriotism, were witnesses of the violent opposition now made to every measure tending to ameliorate and liberalize the terms on which the cultivator of the soil may obtain for actual use limited portions of the public lands, and the pertinacity with which some gentlemen hold on to every fraction of a dollar in the price, they would be filled with astonishment. No, sir: the amount of money to be realized from the territory relinquished, was not the chief or controlling incentive of the States which made the cessions. Whilst they refer generally to a disposition of the ceded lands for the common benefit, they stipulate for no special advantage to themselves: they content themselves with an equal participation in the fund to be derived from them. But, sir, they all show a laudable anxiety to restore and preserve the harmony of the Union, by putting down all controversy amongst the States about territorial claims, and to establish and build up other free, happy, and prosperous communities.

The State of Virginia, perhaps, relinquished more territory than all the other States in the Union; and in this, as in every thing else connected with the early history of our country, maintained that elevated character for patriotism, and that surpassing devotion to the harmony of the Union, and stability of the Confederacy, which particularly distinguished her whole course, as well in our public councils as in the field. In her act of cession, the very first inducement she mentions, and the one which doubtless had prevailing influence over her determination, was "upon condition that the territory so ceded shall be laid out and formed into States," etc. "and that the States so formed shall be distinct Republican States, and admitted members of the Federal Union, having the same rights of sovereignty, freedom, and independence, as the other States." The cessions of North Carolina and Georgia were made upon similar conditions. Indeed, sir, we have not even acquired territory by treaty with a foreign power, that did not look much more to extending and strengthening the Federal alliance than to any other consideration. The treaty with France, by which Louisiana was acquired, and the treaty with Spain, by which we obtained Florida, both contain positive stipulations that "the inhabitants of the ceded territory shall be incorporated in the Union of the United States, and admitted as soon as possible, according to the principles of the Federal Constitution, to the enjoyment of all the rights, advantages, and immunities of citizens of the United States." Nor would the States have tolerated the acquisition of territory on any other terms. If the General Government had proposed the purchase of land for the mere purpose of selling it for profit, or for any other purpose than that of adding new members, and giving increased strength and stability to the general Confederacy, the proposal would have been, at any time, I have no doubt, indignantly rejected.

Now, sir, every leading inducement which was held out by this Government, or influenced the States to make relinquishments, has been accomplished. The debt incurred by the war of the Revolution has been extinguished. All the conflicting territorial claims, which threatened the peace and tranquillity of the Union, have been settled, and harmony has been restored. New States have been formed out of nearly all the territory acquired from the original ones, or from foreign Governments, and admitted into the Union. From thirteen States, and three millions of inhabitants, we have become twenty-six, and number fifteen millions of souls. From a few feeble colonies, we have grown to be a powerful confederated Republic—rich in resources, intellectual and physical, agricultural and commercial. Is this a time to palter about "the ninth part of a hair" in the sale of the public domain? Is this a time to wring from the hard hands of the laborious and industrious farmer and planter, who have been driven from the more fertile portion of the public lands by the rich capitalist, exorbitant prices for those of the most inferior quality?

Sir, the acts and resolutions for the admission of the new States invariably declare that they are "admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, in all respects whatever." Yet we have been required, before admission, to agree and declare, "by an ordinance, irrevocable without the consent of the United States," that we "forever disclaim all right and title to the waste and unappropriated lands lying within" our limits; "and, moreover, that each and every tract of land sold by the United States, (after the formation of our respective constitutions,) shall be and remain exempt from any tax, laid by the order, or under the authority of, the State, etc. for the term of five years, from and after the respective days of the sales thereof, etc." "and that no tax shall be imposed on lands, the property of the United States," etc. Thus we are denied the right to dispose of the unappropriated lands, and denied the right to tax them, whilst they remain the property of the United States, or for five years after they are sold!

How far it is correct that we have been placed "on an equal footing with the original States, in all respects whatever," it would perhaps now be unprofitable to inquire. I should be sorry to suppose that the mistaken policy of this Government will ever impose upon the new States the duty of raising that question. Whether "the original States exercised the right of "eminent domain," or the power of taxation, gentlemen can determine for themselves; but it is very certain that, although the new States have hitherto submitted to the restrictions imposed upon them, as the price of their undeniable right of admission into the Union, they have not always been insensible to the hardship; nor have they always acquiesced in the compatibility of such terms with the acts of cession. It is true the people of the Territories, which have since been admitted as States, at the close of their minority, through their representatives in their several conventions, assented to the terms required of them, if not expressly, at least by implication, to entitle them to admission. So, sir, the youth who has just attained full age, would oftentimes consent to almost any conditions his guardian might prescribe, in order to get possession of his estate; but, to say the least, how ungenerous would be the guardian who would exact conditions, involving great sacrifices in such a case; and how much more so, if he afterwards enforced them with a hard hand!

We have seen, Mr. President, that the United States undertook, substantially, in every instance of the acquisition of new territory, to form and admit new States out of the same, as soon as possible, according to the principles of the Federal Constitution, or, at least, in a reasonable time. To carry this undertaking into effect, just and fair legislation, on the part of Congress, was necessary. To have forbidden settlements within the limits of the territory thus acquired, absolutely, would have been a palpable violation of the compacts with the old States. A State could not be formed without inhabitants; the law, it is maintained, interdicted settlement before purchase; consequently, inhabitants could not be had without a sale of lands. To have refused to sell altogether, would have violated the compacts; to have fixed a price at which the land would not sell, would have been equally repugnant. Nay, sir, the establishment of prices above the fair relative value of the lands, would necessarily have tended to retard the settlement of the country, and have delayed, unreasonably, the formation of States, and would, therefore, have been at least a violation of the spirit of the compacts.

Was the General Government released from the obligation to sell in a reasonable time and on reasonable terms, by the admission of the new States? No, sir, there is no change of the duty of this Government, in that respect, either made or proposed in the acts of Congress authorizing or sanctioning the formation of State Governments. The undertaking to build up and form new States, so far as the disposition of the public domain is concerned, is left in full force. By the compacts of the new States with this Government on their admission, as we have seen, they are restrained from all interference with the primary disposal of the unappropriated lands, and they are expressly agreed to "be and remain at the sole and entire disposition of the United States." The obligation of the General Government is even made stronger by the inhibition imposed on the exercise of sovereignty by the new States, as to selling and against taxing lands sold by the United States, for the term of five years after the day of sale. To prevent the settlement of the public lands retained by this Government without first purchasing them, and virtually to prohibit purchases, by fixing a minimum price amounting to double, and, in many instances, more than fourfold, the relative value, would be, to my mind, a manifest breach of good faith. By the ordinance organizing the Territories northwest of the river Ohio, afterwards applied to the others, (with the exception of the article against slavery,) it was stipulated that, whenever any of them should have sixty thousand free inhabitants, they should be at liberty to form a permanent Constitution and State Government, and be admitted into the Union. With little greater population, most of the new States have been admitted. Concede to this Government the power which I am controverting, and let it be exercised, and the population and resources of the new States might for ever remain stationary. But, sir, I cannot suppose that any gentleman who will examine the compacts can place such a construction on them. If this Government was bound to afford all reasonable and just facilities for the settlement and improvement of the Territories, that they might commence State Governments, having retained the power over the public domain, it is bound, in good faith, to continue its exercise in such manner as to facilitate their continued population and improvement till they shall have attained full maturity.

Mr. President, independent of the obligations imposed upon the General Government, by the terms of the compacts with the ceding States and with the new ones, a just and liberal policy toward the latter, demands a reduction of the price of inferior lands. We have seen from the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, made at the present session, that the sales of public lands at auction and private entry, for the entire period of the cash system to the 30th September last, have only averaged $1 27 4-5 per acre. Those sales have embraced the most fertile and valuable portions of the public domain. Within that period, (as prosperous as any we have known,) nearly all Alabama, Mississippi, and parts of Louisiana, including the finest cotton region of our country, or perhaps in the world, have been in market. Of 122,512,384, offered for sale, since the commencement of the cash system, 61,296,410 have been sold. Hence, the average stated may be considered a fair price for all lands of the first, or approximating the first quality. It may be considered the maximum value, whilst the law makes it the minimum price.

The entire quantity of public lands which has been offered for sale, from the earliest period to 30th September last, is 172,374,470 acres; and the whole quantity disposed of, at public and private sale, but 75,025,055 acres; leaving, as before stated, 97,349,315 acres subject to private entry; no purchaser having yet considered it worth the present minimum! Why does this large proportion remain unsold? Compared with the lands generally, which have been sold, it doubtless has equal advantages in all respects, except fertility. It is dispersed throughout the old, as well as the new settlements; and, consequently, may be regarded, generally, as equally healthy, equally convenient to trade, and possessing equal facilities of transportation. The true answer to the question I have just propounded will be obvious to all: it will not sell for the minimum price, as the other portion has, because it is not worth it. It is owing to the difference of intrinsic value. It is not only inferior in soil, but much of it is totally without value, according to documentary evidence which has been on your files for nine years. In the year 1828, the registers and receivers of the several land districts were called upon by the Secretary of the Treasury to report the quantity of land subject to entry in their respective districts, and its quality and description. The result was, as to the aggregate, 74,358,881 acres, of which 28,247,000 acres, being more than one-third, were unfit for cultivation! The same proportion of what is now subject to private entry, would amount to more than 35,000,000 of acres, unfit for cultivation! And yet the never varying uniformity of price presupposes that all lands must at least be worth a certain fixed sum!

Mr. President, is not the principle adopted by this Government, in relation to the sale of the public lands, altogether anomalous? What other vendor ever held land, or any other description of property, to be of the same value, and at the same price, without regard to quality? If an individual who holds lands bordering on the Mississippi or Red river, and also others, consisting of sand-hills, pine-barrens, or rocky mountains, were to demand, inflexibly, the same price for each quality, would not all the world impeach his understanding, or his judgment? Are all domestic animals of the same species, necessarily of the same value? How profound would that man's judgment be considered who would appreciate as highly the coarse dray-horse, as the fleet courser, or the war-horse! If a merchant were to demand the same price for all goods manufactured of the same kind of material, without distinguishing between lawn and osnaburgs, or between broad cloths and kerseys, the absurdity of his conduct would be universally denounced. Can that be wise in a Government which would subject an individual to the just charge of folly or madness?

Sir, a reduction of the price of the refuse public lands is not only demanded by justice to the people of the new States, but also by expediency in reference to the interest of this Government. At the present minimum, very little of the land now subject to entry will sell in many years, and much of it never will. It is better for the United States, even as regards the amount to be received, to sell at half the price established by law, than to keep it on hand for eighteen or twenty years. Of the 71,000,000 of acres which have been offered, without selling, for five years and upwards, and intended to be reached by this bill, it is probable 50,000,000 would sell for enough to average half the present minimum; say 62½ cents per acre. The aggregate sum produced at this rate, on the quantity supposed, would be $31,250,000; the interest on which, in about eighteen years, would make it equal the price demanded by the existing law. Some of it may be sold in less time; but a great proportion of the 50,000,000 of acres which I have supposed might now be sold at some price, will not sell at $1 25 per acre within thirty or forty years. An immediate sale, then, at half the present minimum, would not only be consistent with the pecuniary interest of the Government, but it would convert barren wastes into more or less productive fields, and thus add to the general resources and prosperity of our country.

Whilst the interest of the General Government is not advanced, the effects of the present policy on the prosperity of the new States is highly injurious. It greatly retards, if it does not entirely prevent, the population of large portions of their territory. Not being worth the present minimum, no one is willing to purchase the inferior lands; and few are willing to go upon them and make such improvements as would give them increased value, sufficient to induce some heartless speculator to enter them over their heads, and rob them of the fruits of their labor. The few who do go upon them may be regarded as mere itinerants. Knowing the uncertainty of their tenure, they make no improvements of a permanent character; they cut down and destroy the timber, without regard to economy, and they cultivate the soil merely for temporary convenience, having no interest in its preservation. The tendency of this mode of settlement and cultivation is to exhaust and impoverish, instead of adding any thing to, the permanent wealth and prosperity of the country. In the mean time, the right of taxation is suspended. Is it astonishing that the new States are dissatisfied or impatient, when their legitimate resources are thus crippled, or entirely cut off? And are not those of the Union also injuriously affected? Suppose the great Valley of the Mississippi were still a wilderness, unsettled and unimproved by the arts of civilization, how much would it not diminish the wealth and strength of this great Confederacy! Take away the four millions of souls, who now inhabit that region, and the rich products of their labor, industry and ingenuity, and what a hiatus it would occasion in the now mighty resources of our Government! Yet the soil would be there, in all its native richness. Sir, it is not vacant, unpeopled, and unimproved territory that constitutes the strength or greatness of any country: it is a numerous, virtuous, intelligent and enterprising population, with their agriculture, their commerce, their mechanic arts and their manufactures, constituting, at the same time, its wealth, and its best bulwark of defence. Give to the new States a hardy and industrious population, instead of your waste lands; and whilst you increase their strength and prosperity, you will add to those of the Union.

Put your refuse lands at their fair relative value, and you give homes to the honest and industrious poor, who have been unable to enter, or have been driven from, the field of competition with men of large capital, and still larger credit. By thus giving them an opportunity to acquire a permanent interest in the soil of their country, you will stimulate their industry and enterprise, and increase their usefulness as citizens. Nor will this liberal and enlightened policy inure exclusively to the benefit of the new States, or of their present inhabitants. No, sir: it will not only bring millions into your Treasury which can never be realized under your present system, but it will open the door through which thousands of the laboring classes and humble tenantry of the old States may acquire comfortable homes for their families, and enjoy the proud independence of freeholders. If gentlemen could see, as I have seen, the vast difference—the almost magic change—wrought not only on the face of the country, but in the character of its population, by converting mere occupants into fee simple proprietors of the soil, I am persuaded they would no longer hesitate as to the expediency of the proposed policy. They would see that not only the new States, but the Union at large, would gain by making unqualified donations, rather than by continuing these refuse lands a part of the public domain. But, sir, I repeat, we do not ask donations; the bill proposes no gift; we only ask that this class of the public lands may become individual property at their fair relative value. If that cannot be ascertained under the provisions of the bill, nor amendment, offer us a better plan; and, if it be a valuation by actual personal examination of every eighty acre tract, we shall not object. We ask for justice—no more. Deal with us as friends and brethren of the same great political family, and we shall be content.

The following are the resolutions of the old Congress, referred to in the foregoing remarks:

[No. 1.]

WEDNESDAY, Sept. 6, 1780.

Congress took into consideration the report of the committee to whom were referred the instructions of the General Assembly of Maryland to their delegates in Congress, respecting the articles of Confederation, and the declaration therein referred to; the act of the Legislature of New York on the same subject, and the remonstrance of the General Assembly of Virginia; which report was agreed to, and is in the words following:

That, having duly considered the several matters to them submitted, they conceive it unnecessary to examine into the merits or policy of the instructions or declaration of the General Assembly of Maryland, or of the remonstrance of the General Assembly of Virginia, as they involve questions, a discussion of which was declined, on mature consideration, when the articles of Confederation were debated; nor, in the opinion of the committee, can such questions be now revived with any prospect of conciliation; that it appears more advisable to press upon those States which can remove the embarrassments respecting the Western country, a liberal surrender of a portion of their territorial claims, since they cannot be preserved entire without endangering the stability of the general Confederacy; to remind them how indispensably necessary it is to establish the Federal Union on a fixed and permanent basis, and on principles acceptable to all its respective members; how essential to public credit and confidence, to the support of our army, to the vigor of our councils, and success of our measures, to our tranquillity at home, our reputation abroad, to our very existence as a free, sovereign, and independent people; that they are fully persuaded the wisdom of the respective Legislatures will lead them to a full and impartial consideration of a subject so interesting to the United States, and so necessary to the happy establishment of the Federal Union; that they are confirmed in these expectations by a review of the before mentioned act of the Legislature of New York, submitted to their consideration; that this act is expressly calculated to accelerate the federal alliance, by removing, as far as depends on that State, the impediment arising from the Western country, and for that purpose to yield up a portion of territorial claim for the general benefit. Whereupon,

Resolved, That copies of the several papers referred to the committee be transmitted, with a copy of the report, to the Legislatures of the several States, and that it be earnestly recommended to those States, who have claims to the Western country, to pass such laws, and give their delegates in Congress such powers, as may effectually remove the only obstable to a final ratification of the articles of confederation; and that the Legislature of Maryland be earnestly requested to authorize their delegates in Congress to subscribe the said articles.

TUESDAY, October 10, 1780.

Resolved, That the unappropriated lands that may be ceded or relinquished to the United States by any particular State, pursuant to the recommendation of Congress of the 6th day of September last, shall be disposed of for the common benefit of the United States, and be settled and formed into distinct Republican States, which shall become members of the Federal Union, and have the same rights of sovereignty, freedom, and independence as the other States; that each State which shall be so formed shall contain a suitable extent of territory, not less than one hundred nor more than one hundred and fifty miles square, or as near thereto as circumstances will admit; that the necessary and reasonable expenses which any particular State shall have incurred, since the commencement of the present war, in subduing any British posts, or in maintaining forts or garrisons within and for the defence, or in acquiring any part of the territory that may be ceded or relinquished to the United States, shall be reimbursed; that the said lands shall be granted or settled at such times and under such regulations as shall hereafter be agreed on by the United States in Congress assembled, or any nine or more of them.

[No. 3.]

FRIDAY, April 18, 1783.

Congress resumed the consideration of the report on finance, and the following paragraph being under debate:

"That as a further mean, as well of hastening the extinguishment of the debts, as of establishing the harmony of the United States, it be recommended to the States which have passed no acts towards complying with the resolutions of Congress of the 6th of September and 10th of October, 1780, relative to territorial cessions, to make the liberal cessions therein recommended; and to the States which may have passed acts complying with the said resolutions in part only, to revise and complete such compliance."

Which was afterwards agreed to.

[No. 4.]

On the 29th April, 1784, Congress passed the following additional resolution:

No. 25. Congress, by their resolution of September 6, 1780, having thought it advisable to press upon the States having claims to the Western country, a liberal surrender of a portion of their territorial claims; by that of the 10th of October, in the same year, having fixed conditions to which the Union should be bond on receiving such cessions; and having again proposed the same subject to those States, in their address of April 18th, 1783, wherein, stating the national debt, and expressing their reliance for its discharge on the prospect of vacant territory, in aid of other resources, they, for that purpose, as well as to obviate disagreeable controversies and confusions, included in the same recommendations, a renewal of those of September 6th, and of October the 10th, 1780, which several recommendations have not yet been complied with:

Resolved, That the same subject be again presented to the attention of the said States; that they be urged to consider that the war being now brought to a happy termination by the personal services of our soldiers, the supplies of property by our citizens, and loans of money from them as well as from foreigners: these several creditors have a right to expect that funds shall be provided on which they may rely for the indemnification; that Congress still consider vacant territory as an important resource; and that, therefore, the said States be earnestly pressed, by immediate and liberal cessions, to forward these necessary ends, and to promote the harmony of the Union.

CUMBERLAND ROAD.

REMARKS OF MR. RARIDEN,

OF INDIANA,

In the House of Representatives, April 12, 1838—

The "bill making appropriations for the continuation of the Cumberland Road through Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois," being under consideration—

The question pending was the motion of Mr. UNDERWOOD of Kentucky, to recommit the bill to the Committee of Ways and Means, with instructions to report, in lieu thereof, a bill to provide for the surrender of said road to the States through which it passes.

Mr. RARIDEN rose and said, that living in, and representing, a district of country through which this great national work passed, he must naturally be supposed to feel a very deep interest in every thing which was done or said in this House in relation to it; and he hoped his situation and feelings would be a sufficient apology for the time he might occupy in giving the House his views upon it. He regretted exceedingly that the proposition to recommit the bill, with the proposed instructions, had been made, and especially from the quarter whence it came; and that regret was by no means diminished by the avowal of the gentleman, that his proposition was retaliatory. Sir, asked Mr. R. could not the gentleman have sought out measures of this Administration less identified with his political friends and himself as a Western man, to wreak his resentment upon, and have saved his friends, and a measure much endeared to many of them? Mr. R. thought he could, and he did hope the gentleman would reconsider; and that what vengeance he had in store for the baffled hopes of the Portland Canal, might fall upon the heads and measures of his opponents, and of the opponents of this favorite measure of Kentucky.

Mr. R. proposed to go into a very brief account of the origin of that great national thoroughfare, and the considerations which the supposed governed the thoughts of those who then controlled the destinies of this great Republic, in regard to it. It should be borne in mind, said he, that, in 1803, the United States had acquired Louisiana, a great cotton growing country. It was then comparatively a wilderness; so was the entire region west of the Ohio river. Each might be made capable of producing, and be made auxiliary to each other, and to the whole nation, in producing products for foreign markets, as well as domestic consumption, by the adoption of a liberal and enlightened policy towards them; and it became very important, in bringing about this end, to adopt such a course as would facilitate emigration and people those countries. This could be done only by opening a way, and by creating facilities of commerce and intercommunication between the emigrant and his fatherland. This road was the expedient wisely hit upon to produce this result. By an act of Congress of 1806, sanctioned by Mr. Jefferson and his Democratic friends, provision was made for its survey from Cumberland to Wheeling; and this, too, at a time when the Revolutionary debt and the Louisiana debt was upon us, and our revenue very inconsiderable.

Well, sir, we went on from year to year, after the road had been commenced in 1810, till the present time, while the country was undergoing every vicisitude of fortune, peace and war, of scarcity and plenty. Yet at all times, and under every Administration, and every party which has held the reigns of power, this work has gradually progressed, and been considered of national importance. It has long since been finished to Wheeling. The way thus opened, and the facilities thus created, had the desired effect. The Western wilds became peopled with an industrious and enterprising population, its wilderness was converted into fruitful fields, and the avails of its industry were visible throughout the nation. The public lands for which a market had been created by Western enterprise, found their way into the National Treasury, and from thence into lighthouses, breakwaters, harbors, navy yards, &c. &c. This is not all sir. By this policy the West had become, as had been predicted by the projectors of this work, the fountain of Southern subsistence. The whole force of the Lower Mississippi valley was directed to the production of cotton, that great staple and inlet of national wealth. The West made the bread and meat which entered into its production, and the South finished the process, and paid us our portion. This, sir, said Mr. R. is what he supposed was in the contemplation of the patriots who projected this road to bring about. How their anticipations have been realized, and more than realized, let the present condition of the West and the Southwest bear witness. Let the unparalleled increase of Western and Southern production, and their effect upon the national income, speak for the wisdom of our fathers upon this measure. Well, sir, in 1818 the United States had acquired the lands through which this road would pass, through Indiana and Illinois, to the bank of the Mississippi, nearly the whole route; and in 1819 also had made a very large augmentation to its cotton-growing land, by the acquisition of East and West Florida. These two considerations induced the Government to extend the survey of the road from Wheeling, through the seats of Government of Ohio, Indiana and Illinois, to the left bank of the Mississippi, and to make appropriations to commence its construction in Ohio, looking to that point on the Mississippi. When this was done, the lands in its vicinity, in those States, the main part of which were owned by the Government, were much sought after from the enhanced value which their proximity to this thoroughfare gave them: they were all bought up. Lands which had little or no other value than their connection with the road, and which, without it, would have remained unoccupied and unbought for fifty years to come, were purchased and repurchased at enhanced prices. During this time, while the sales of Government lands was going on the road was going on. Every year you gave it its accustomed appropriation, as if the Government really intended its construction without a word of opposition, save the fashionable, stereotyped, constitutional objections which a few always professed to hold. The States through which it passed had no choice or agency in its location. They had to adjust and conform their State roads and other works to it as the great column of internal communication, plantations were adjusted to it, houses and towns sprang up like magic, and property rose to a value commensurate with the brilliant destiny of a country through which a wise and munificent Government had projected this monument of its justice and wisdom, and evidence of its parental regard. The process did not end here. The Government receipts did not end with the exhaustion of the lands upon the margin of the road. No, sir. The road only became the base of settlements, which extended north and south, till they absorbed the greater portion of the Government lands. And in this manner, and by this stimulant, were those lands converted into money, and the money appropriated to the use of the nation. The Western people do not complain that they had to pay for those lands, but that in the selection of homes for their families for life, their locations were determined by the just expectations created by the action of the Government in regard to the conveniences and facilities in prospect. They supposed its action to be in good faith, with a view to the consummation of the object indicated by its action, and they accordingly selected their homes. And now, sir, are they to be at this late day told, that the Government is not committed to this great work? Mr. R. said he would not discuss the power of the Government to commence and prosecute it. If thirty years' action—if the sanction of Jefferson, Madison, Monroe, Adams, and Jackson, and their advisers—if the uniform legislative sanction of fifteen successive Congresses had not placed the power out of controversy in the minds of some gentlemen, he confessed he despaired of doing it.

But some gentlemen tell us that they yield the power to Congress, but consider it inexpedient, at this time, to make an appropriation on account of the poverty of the Treasury. He would say a word as to the acts by which he considered the Government committed to the States, and the citizens of the States through which this road passes, to its completion, saying nothing of the original compact with the new States. The good faith of a Government is more than a bond: although there is no legal power of coercion to the fulfilment of the just hopes created by its acts; yet there is a moral power acting upon its agents, deemed by the wise more efficacious, to which the injured or neglected are directed to look, with confident assurance, for the fulfilment of all the obligations expressed or implied from previous action affecting their interest. Well, sir, the location of the road from the Ohio to the bank of the Mississippi, with an appropriation to construct a part of it from the Ohio west, is an undertaking to finish it, when taken in connection with the action and course of the Government in locating and constructing that portion of the same road eas of the Ohio. But this is not all, sir; the Government afterwards promises that this road shall pass through the seats of Government of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois; and, as if to make every thing certain, it sends its agents along the line, and procures releases of all damages which might be claimed for injuries to private property, and a cession of the necessary stone and timber for its completion, a great portion of which is now strewed along its borders.

This is not all, sir. When the Government wished to rid itself of the burthen of keeping the finished portion of the road in repair, it stipulated a large amount to the State through which it passed for present repairs, and another amount to another State, to finish another portion of it before the State should be requested to accept its charge This looks very much like the Government felt itself under an obligation to finish the road through those States at least. If those acts are not deemed sufficient to imply a promise to the new States that the road would be finished through them, as it had been begun, then I refer you to its acts, in connection with the road, for thirty years, to the quantity now finished, and the quantity half finished, extending very nearly from the east side of Indiana to Vandalia, with the materials in a half prepared condition to go into the work now lying upon its margin. If those things, taken together, do not amount to a pledge of sovereign faith, that the road shall be finished with convenient speed, I can conceive of no acts that would: acts and conduct more equivocal, in private life, would be deemed by an honest jury sufficient to fix liability upon a jockey, who had violated the understanding which they implied.

But to the expediency of making this appropriation at this time, considering the poverty of the National Treasury.

Sir, this road has been in account with the Treasury for thirty years. Since its commencement the nation has passed through an expensive war with one of the greatest powers of Europe; yet, in that time, or since, I have never heard that this cause was urged against an appropriation till now. What, sir, shall we be told we have millions to squander in voyages of discovery, and nothing to expend in knitting and uniting the members of this Confederacy together? Shall we be told that a preceding Administration, called prodigal, with an income not more than the present, could appropriate more than ever had before been, or has since been, to purposes of internal improvement, defray all the expenses of the Government, and pay ten millions annually into the sinking fund, for the extinguishment of the national debt, and still have a surplus left to corrupt the nation; and yet that this economical Administration, without a national debt to pay, with an equal income with the preceding one, and with a loan of ten millions in the way of Treasury notes, and another of the same or greater amount in anticipation within the fiscal year, cannot spare this small sum to this work? If this be true, and the real ground of opposition, he could only say it was a poor account of the economy and financial skill of those who administer our affairs. But a few words more, and I am done. I live on this road, and have observed its progress step by step with great interest for a few years past. Its operations have been managed with skill and fidelity, and with as much regard to economy, perhaps, as the extended operations upon it would allow of. The greatest fault is here: the lateness and smallness of the annual appropriation, causes it to cost the Government at least thirty per cent. more than it would, if the annual appropriation were larger, and made at earlier periods of the season. The time or amounts does not allow portions worked upon to be finished, and that which is done by labor in the summer, is undone by the frosts in the winter, and travel in the spring; and at this time, sir, through Indiana, though graded, it is impassible. Your mails cannot be transported upon it with any tolerable speed or safety, single horsemen find it difficult to pass, and yet its margin is strewed with materials going to waste, waiting the action of this House only to assume the place of usefulness in the road. It has not been long since the mail stage drove off a dangerous temporary bridge, thrown over Blue river, on this road, and greatly hazarded the lives of a number of persons. Of all things, the like of this should be provided against: those rivers, should be bridged, materials at least should be collecting preparatory, that the luxury of stage riding, and receiving early news of events, should be indulged to the same extent, and in the same safety, in the West, that it is in other portions of the world, where less is done to enrich the country than there.

The engineer charged with this work estimates five hundred thousand dollars for Indiana on this road; and I do conscientiously believe it would be economy and justice united, to appropriate this sum. Then the water courses could be immediately bridged, and a large portion of the road finished and ceded to the State, to be maintained and kept in order; then the mails could be transported with less cost and less hazard of human life; people could travel with comfort, and the West would look to that high destiny to which the enterprise, intelligence, and industry of its people is rapidly tending. But, sir, make the appropriation upon this road but little more than sufficient to repair the ravages of the winter and travel of the spring, as many seem disposed to do, and you will keep the Treasury always paying, and the road repairing and stationary. I ask this House if the Government does not owe it to those States through which this road passes, to prosecute it vigorously to final completion? Was not this expectation a stimulant to the purchase of wild lands? Has it not already been the means of bringing millions, directly and indirectly, to the National Treasury, which otherwise would never have found their way there? Has it not been the means of stimulating western and southwestern production, so as to make them together a rich mine to the nation? These questions must be answered in the affirmative. Then, sir, would it not be a gross fraud upon the purchasers of those Government lands, now to delay unnecessarily, or to abandon this work? It certainly would. I go further. Large amounts have been invested in houses, plantations and towns, upon the margin of this road, at prices greatly beyond their value, unconnected with it and its prospects, upon the faith that the Government was in earnest in the acts indicating a purpose to carry out the measures begun. Would it not be a fraud upon them now to suspend, or delay the work? I think it would. Have any of the American people been taught to expect impositions and frauds of this character, at the hands of the Government? No, sir: they have been taught to venerate its justice, and to admire its stable pursuit of all the great measures to which its sovereign faith has been committed by act or deed. Let them not be disappointed in this measure.

One other suggestion: think for the minute of the relation this work has ever been made to bear to the interests of the General Government, instead of the State Governments and the people of the States through which it passes. When was the interest, the purse, or cost, of the States consulted in its location, its commencement, termination, or construction? Not at all. It has been prosecuted thus far exclusively with a view to the business and subjects in the care and keeping of the General Government. The interest of the States through which it passes has upon no occasion been consulted in any thing in relation to it, as would have been had its location and construction devolved originally upon the States. And now, sir, would it be common justice for the United States to abandon it to the States in its unfinished condition, still retaining extensive privileges and immunities in its use, and expect the States to finish it according to the original plan, and maintain and keep it up for the common use of each? Mr. R. said he considered such a proposition disreputable to the General Government, and should not for a moment be entertained by Congress; and to abandon the road now to ruin, or to permit operations to be suspended upon it, would show an irresolution and instability in the administrators of the Government in the prosecution of a great national object, unworthy of the people they represent. He would not for a moment entertain such an idea, so humiliating and so fraught with mischief to the prospects of those who have expended their all upon the margin of that road, in the confidence that the Government was not alluring them to poverty and destruction. He would not entertain the idea, for a moment, that the immense treasure already expended, the effect of which is, in the present condition of the road, to make it worse than before it was began, should be wasted, and that the stone and other materials now lying upon its margin, prepared for those permanent superstructures like those which ornament it in the old States, should be set at nought and waste. He importuned Congress to act speedily and liberally upon this measure. Such a course would, he said, be worthy of the great and good spirits who had projected this work, and bequeathed it to the West as the means of commerce and communion with their Atlantic friends.

Mr. R. said he had now urged upon the House all the considerations which occurred to him to induce its speedy and liberal action; and had only to say further, that both justice and economy require a speedy and liberal appropriation for this work.

REMARKS OF MR. BOON, OF INDIANA,

In the House of Representatives, April 17, 1838.—The bill to remove the walls of the new Treasury building being under consideration—

Mr. BOON said he had a very few words to say, and that most of what he might say would be in reply to what had been said by the gentleman from South Carolina who first addressed the committee, [Mr. THOMPSON,] to whom, Mr. B. said, he always listened with the most profound respect and attention. That gentleman had, in the course of his remarks, stated that the whole people of the country had been reduced to a state of starvation by the misrule of the late and present Administrations of the General Government. Now, Mr. Chairman, not knowing, I will not presume to say any thing as to what may be the situation of that gentleman's constituents, but I have the gratification to know, that that portion of the people I have the honor to represent on this floor, are not only free from starvation, or even want of ample subsistence, but they have annually a very large surplus on hand. Sir, the State of Indiana exports yearly an average surplus of the products of the State, an amount much larger than that consumed by her own citizens. This, to me, does not look much like a state of starvation.

But the gentleman from South Carolina had alluded more particularly to the poverty and distress of the people of New York. Now, said Mr. B. it is not my province to defend the people of New York from any reproach that may be made upon her, while she has on this floor so respectable a number of Representatives, who are far more able to defend her interests here or elsewhere than I am. I recollect that, during the panic season in the recess which intervened last fall between the called session and the commencement of the present session of Congress, that some "Whig" charities were extended to the suffering poor of New York city for political effect; and I recollect, too, that about the same time a ten dollar Whig dinner was got up in New York in honor of a distinguished gentleman from the State of Tennessee! Of what kind of ingredients the dinner was composed or made of, I do not know, but the facts of the case show that there could not have been the actual distress in New York complained of by those who are opposed to this Administration. So much, Mr. Chairman, for the starving condition of the people of the country in general, and of New York in particular.

Sir, said Mr. B. as it relates to this most extraordinary proposition to pull down and rebuild the new Treasury building, the reasons which have just been so forcibly urged against the measure by the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. PICKENS] who last addressed the committee, render it unnecessary for me to add any thing more on that head. The honorable member from Massachusetts, [Mr. LINCOLN] who is a most zealous advocate of the measure proposed, has fully acquitted the President of the United States from any and all blame whatever in the misconstruction of this building. Mr. B. himself wished to go one step further in this matter. He wished every friend of the Administration to refrain from assuming any portion of the responsibility of this waste of the public money. If this project was to be persisted in, he was desirous that the Opposition should take upon themselves the whole credit of the measure, and the responsibility of the waste of the public money; for, should this project be carried out, it would hereafter be referred to as one of the gross follies of this Administration, and a waste of the money of the people. The proposition now pending before the committee is to strike out the enacting clause of the bill. Should this proposition fail, and there should seem to be a determination to pass the bill, Mr. B. remarked that he might feel it his duty to offer an amendment to the bill, providing that the building shall be erected in the city of Cincinnati or Louisville, in view of the removal of the seat of the General Government west of the Alleghany mountains.

Sir, said Mr. B. if we are to pull down the work of one architect, upon fault being found by another architect who may want a profitable job, there will be no end to putting up and pulling down of public works. The first reasons that I heard assigned for pulling down the new Treasury building were given by gentlemen of taste, upon the ground that the building, when completed, would obstruct the view of the President's House from a certain quarter of the city; but these reasons not being considered quite sufficient of themselves, it is now assumed that the building will fall down under its own weight.

EXPLORING EXPEDITION.

REMARKS OF MR. CRARY, OF MICHIGAN,

In the House of Representatives, April 10, 1838—On the motion to reduce the amount of the appropriation for the naval service, for the purpose of putting an end to the South Sea Exploring Expedition.

Mr. CRARY said he did not know what could be the object of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. MERCER,] in bringing the character of Commodore Jones into this discussion. From the correspondence between that officer and the Navy Department, every gentleman in the House would form his own opinion. The gentleman from Virginia might come to one conclusion, and Mr. C. to a very different one. No one had yet attacked the character of Commodore Jones; but if the matter of eulogy was to be carried any farther, there were those who would attack it. Mr. C. was of the number; but in so doing, he had no wish to take from Commodore Jones any of the laurels he had won for past services. He could join in praise of them with as much good will as the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. C. said that the law of 1836 declared the object of this expedition. It was to visit the Pacific ocean and the South seas, and when there, it was to be employed in surveying and exploring. It was advocated by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. REED,] on the ground of the immense amount of our commerce in those seas. It was said by that gentleman, and another gentleman from the same State, [Mr. PHILLIPS,] that we had constantly employed there some four hundred and fifty vessels in the whale fishery; that this fleet was manned by upwards of ten thousand men, and cost, with their outfit, about twelve millions of dollars, and were estimated to be worth, when their voyages were completed, twenty millions of dollars. This expedition was designed to aid this commerce, by procuring regular maps and charts of those regions; by ascertaining the character of the tides, currents, and dangerous reefs; by establishing permanent relations with places where our trade was now limitted and uncertain; by seeking for, and restoring to, their homes and families, those American seamen who had been unfortunately left or cast away upon shores inhabited by a race of savages; and, incidental to all these objects, it was expected that some attention would be paid to the great cause of natural history and science generally.

After much discussion, the advocates of the measure succeeded in convincing the House of its importance. The Executive was authorized to send out "a sloop of war and such other smaller vessels as might be necessary and proper, to render the expedition efficient and useful." President Jackson, in consequence of the past conduct of Captain Jones, called him to the command. The conduct of this officer from that time plainly manifested that his object was to make this a great and magnificent expedition, such as should secure to him lasting renown, and give him, not only a great and dazzling name among his own countrymen, but with the whole civilized world. He looked for his recompense in a wreath of amaranth. Had he confined his views simply to the objects proposed by the House, the squadron might have been at sea long ago. But this would not satisfy his ambition and his vanity. He must have a body guard of scientific men from all "of the most celebrated institutions of the country" to catch birds and flies, toads and fishes. This was all very pretty. There were men in the country who would be delighted with an account of the butterflies that sip the nectar of the flowers that spring up on coral rocks, or of the plumage of a bird that spreads it wings over a far off sea. It was very well to take advantage of so favorable an opportunity to augment the stores of science, but that object should have been only incidental and subordinate to the great purpose of the squadron, which was that of surveying and exploring in the latitudes of an almost unknown sea.

Mr. C. said that he was not originally in favor of this expedition, because he thought we had other and more important objects to attend to nearer home. He wished to have the survey of our own coast completed, so that the attention of the Government might be turned to the great lakes and rivers of the interior. Judging from what had already been done, the survey of the coast by triangulation would not be terminated in the life time of the man at the head of that business; even though he should live the full period of a century. He knew that there were men in the country amply qualified to take a leading part in this great work, and he wished to see them brought forward, that they might remove from it the veil of mystery. It was but a science, and could be learned by any school boy with a few months of application.

He thought the blame for the delay of the expedition lay between the Secretary of the Navy and Commodore Jones. The Secretary was the ostensible head of the Navy Department; but if he were to express the opinion that he had often made known to his particular friends, he should say that the Department had not any head at all. That officer had plainly shown himself not competent to his place by allowing himself to be rode over by the commander of a squadron; and it was Mr. C's belief that the sooner he retired to the walks of private life, the better it would be for the naval service. For his own part he believed the fault was chargeable on them both. Sure he was that Commodore Jones had given the expedition a too scientific character.

[Mr. MERCER here interposed, and said that Commodore Jones had no more to do in fixing the scientific character of the expedition than the gentlemen from Michigan.]

Mr. C. resumed, and reminded the gentleman from Virginia and the House that Commodore Jones had made it a sine qua non that no one of the commanders of the smaller vessels should have a scientific duty assigned to him. As early as the fall of 1836, the Commodore threatened to resign, because the Secretary of the Navy intimated an intention to appoint Lieutenant Slidell to a command, and at the same time confer on him the office of historiographer. At a later period, he had been greatly outraged in his feelings, because Lieutenant Glynn was offered, and accepted, the appointment of geographer and hydrographer.

[Mr. MERCER here again insisted that the enlargement of the objects of the expedition had not, in any sense, been the act of Commodore Jones.]

Mr. C. would not say that the Commodore had been the cause of the change, but such was his opinion. It was certain that it was made to conform to the views expressed by him in a letter to Mr. Reynolds, written when the expedition was under consideration in this House. There was a wonderful similarity between the views expressed in that letter, and those which had influence in getting up the squadron.

It had been said that the commander of the squadron was not chargeable with the defective construction of the smaller vessels. This fault had been very unjustly ascribed to the chief naval constructor. This officer acted under special instructions, and he prepared his draughts accordingly. Mr. C. did not know who gave these instructions, but he presumed they came from Commodore Jones, as it was an order of the Department that his wishes should be consulted, and his suggestions adopted, in every thing pertaining to the construction, arrangement, armament, and equipment, of the vessels, as far as circumstances would permit. Mr. C. believed that it was a matter of record that the two brigs and the schooner were planned agreeably to the suggestions, and built under the superintendence, of Commodore Jones. At any rate, he had exhibited as strong an affection for them as though they were his own children. He had labored in season and out of season, to convince the public that they were well adapted to the service in which they were to be employed. He had forced Lieutenant Tatnall to tender his resignation of the command of the Pioneer, in consequence of his having expressed the opinion, formed by a cruise among the reefs and currents of the Gulf of Mexico, that she "steered badly when sailing over six knots," and was unable "to claw off a lee shore in a short head sea." The sailing qualities of these bantlings of the Commodore had been tested during the past winter. The two brigs had formed a part of our coast squadron. The Pioneer got ashore in the sound, and had a number of her men severely frostbitten. The Consort returned to port, after a cruise of fifteen days, with a loss of her mainyard, topgallant-mast, and one man killed, who was thrown upon deck by her breaching-to against her helm. Lieutenant Glynn, a gallant officer, a good seaman, and a man of science, was in command of her, and in his report of the cruise to Commodore Ridgely he says:

"Off the wind with any sea on the Consort is dangerous, and should never be allowed to go over six knots; at seven knots she became unmanageable, and, I think, could not possibly be made to go eight knots, while drawing more than twelve feet water; for her short and full water lines, particularly abaft, make so much wake, that from five knots and upwards the rudder plays in more or less dead water; and thus its influence is diminishing till it ceases to be the principal directing power. Her full of the body and low transom afford a fair hold for a sea coming up with her; while her want of length allows her to be swung round as upon a pivot. In scudding, therefore, long before she had attained a velocity sufficient to diminish perceptibly the violence of the following sea, she would be breached to, or brought by the lee. * * * * It would be impossible to drag her off a lee shore if there was any thing of a sea on. While lying-to on the 29th of January, she pitched every thing beyond the knight heads under water, and carried away the foretop-gallant mast. Any attempt at that time to force the vessel through the water by carrying the sqare-sails, must soon have terminated in the loss of her masts; and I was quite satisfied if she was ever fairly caught within twenty miles of a lee shore in a gale of half as many hours' duration, she must have been inevitable wrecked."

And yet these are the vessels that were to explore and survey the islands and reefs of the Pacific, and go among the icebergs of the South Seas! The first severe gale off a lee shore would have sent them to destruction. No man can blame sailors for running away from such vessels, or from a commander who could speak in praise of their excellent qualities.

He thought the expedition ought to have been at sea a year ago. The Secretary of the Navy, or Commodore Jones, was answerable for the delay. If the former had done his duty, he ought to call the latter to a strict account; but if the Secretary was in fault, he ought to be placed where his imbecility could bring no dishonor upon the country hereafter.

Mr. C. would not now desert this expedition. He would force it to sea with all convenient despatch. He cared not who was sent out as commander, if he was only qualified for the station. He was willing that a midshipman, a lieutenant, or post captain should be selected. He was disposed to leave this matter entirely to Executive discretion. He had only to say, that so far as his vote would effect it, the Expedition should go to sea: he would not desert it: he would not thus reflect upon the acts of a former Congress. If the measure was proper two years ago, it was equally proper now. Not only were all the reasons for it as good now as they were at that time, but there were additional reasons. We had entered into the plan; we had made a beginning; we had gathered together the necessary materials; we had expended large sums of money, and we had raised great expectations. These would never all be realized; they had been considerably lowered by a series of unfortunate events; but the country had not yet lost all interest in the measure. It was the character of the people to go ahead in every thing; and they expected to see this character developed by all their public servants. Whenever such servant failed in a great and important measure, or lagged in the performance of his duty, he very soon became the subject of animadversion and reprehension.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. BRONSON] had said that Congress, by voting the appropriation, authorized the employment of a frigate. Mr. C. voted for it, not because he approved of the frigate, but because he was unwilling to furnish an excuse, in the event of a failure, for charging that failure upon Congress. He wished the responsibility to rest on the commander of the Expedition, who had insisted on having a frigate. That commander had had his own way: he had been indulged with just such a squadron as he asked for; and he had left it in the harbor of New York, for the milder atmosphere of a more southern region.

Mr. C. did not regret this determination. He had long since ceased to have any confidence in the success of the Expedition, as it was organized; and he was glad that an opportunity was afforded of placing it upon a proper footing. He believed that a similar feeling pervaded the whole country.

REMARKS OF MR. CALHOUN,
OF SOUTH CAROLINA,

n Senate, March 22, 1838.—In reply to Mr. WEBSTER.

Mr. CALHOUN rose and said: I am not at all surprised, Mr. President, that the Senator from Massachusetts should show such solicitude to free himself from the responsibility of converting this discussion into a mere personal altercation, so unworthy of the place and the occasion. But it is not a little unjust in him to attempt to transfer the responsibility from himself to me, having acted throughout, as I have, wholly on the defensive, and done every thing I could to avoid personalities. I have, in truth, a deep and unfeigned aversion to personal altercations, in any case; especially here, in my official character, where duty and self-respect, as well as the dignity of the body, forbid its introduction. On the present occasion, I had every reason to avoid it. The subject is one unsurpassed in magnitude and importance, and which requires the calmest and most deliberate consideration. I have had entire confidence in the strength and truth of the side I support; and, of course, felt deep solicitude to limit the discussion strictly to the merits of the question.

But the Senator, in order to throw the blame on me, denies that he drew a comparison between us. Does he consider it no comparison to claim for himself the most universal and ardent patriotism; and to attribute to me the opposite qualities, of being sectional, and entertaining feelings far from friendly to the Union? And this, too, without any thing in the question, or my previous remarks, that could, by possibility, justify it? Does he really think that I ought to have sat in silence without attempting to show, as I have done, how perfectly unfounded are his claims to superior patriotism, and how unjust his charges against me?

But in order to justify himself, he accuses me of having first attempted to fix on himself and friends the charge of inconsistency, in supporting the substitute of the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. RIVES.] I made no such charge. I simply availed myself of the opinion which he and they entertained and expressed, in relation to a similar measure in 1834—acquitting them expressly of all inconsistency. So far from a charge of the kind, I placed my argument on the assumption, that their opinion remained unchanged; and yet this he calls a charge of inconsistency—a throwing of the first stone; and on which he rests the justification of his unprovoked personalities.

The Senator next attributes to me the assertion, that I intended to draw a comparison between his course and mine during the late war, if time had permitted, accusing me, at the same time, of making a "railing accusation" against him. My answer is, that I said nothing like it; and made no accusation whatever, either "railing" or specific. I said not a word of "time permitting me." What I really said was entirely different; and bears no analogy whatever to what he attributes to me, as the Senate must remember. I confined myself to an inquiry into the truth of the picture he had drawn of his patriotism; and his comparison between his public conduct and mine. I demonstrated what little claims he had to the high qualities he arrogated to himself; and how unfounded his assumption was to a more universal and ardent patriotism. I illustrated all this by a reference to his course in relation to abolition and the tariff; and declined going into a comparison between our courses during the late war—not for a want of time, as he states, but expressly on the ground that the events of that day were by-gone, and belonged to history, where I was willing to leave it, and where I should leave it, unless provoked to go into the comparison, by some future attack from the Senator. I added not a word of accusation whatever, either "railing" or otherwise. It is true, I said that, at one time, I intended to go into the comparison. I certainly had no reason, personally, to decline it; but I felt a strong repugnance, which I could not overcome, to recurring back to such distant events, that have passed out of the circle of the politics of the day. Acting under its influence, I limited my remarks, in reference to the Senator and myself, to the great and living questions of the day, which are still unsettled, and are destined to exercise an important control over the future destiny of the country.

But, if I should be forced into the comparison, I shall not confine myself simply to what the Senator did at that important period of our history: I would take a far wider range. He claims for himself an exalted patriotism, far above others, and myself in particular; and that, too, in war as well as peace; and he would have no right to complain, if held responsible, not only for what he did, but for what he did not; not only for his own acts, but also for his political associates and party, which passed without his censure or rebuke. I have no wish, for the reasons I have stated, to enter on the comparison; but if he desires it, I will read a statement of some dozen or fifteen of his votes, which I laid my hands on since he commenced his reply; and which will furnish some index of his course during that period.

[Mr. WEBSTER indicating no desire for the reading, Mr. CALHOUN proceeded:]

Dropping, then, the Senator's course during the war, I shall proceed to notice some remarks of his in reference to myself. He has hunted up with much industry, and brought forward with great parade, my course in relation to the tariff—to the Bank—and the Bonus bill, immediately subsequent to the late war, in order to fix on me a charge of inconsistency. I am pleased that he has afforded me, on this occasion, an opportunity to speak of this portion of our political history, and of the part I took. It is one that requires explanation, not only in reference to myself, but the party to which I belong.

In supporting the measures to which the Senator referred, I was not alone: I acted with the great body of the party: and, if I took a more prominent part in relation to them than others, it is to be attributed to the position which I held in the House and the party at the time. It is not my intention to defend those measures, but to explain, in justice to myself and the party, the circumstances under which we acted. I do not deny but that we departed, more or less, from the true principles and policy of our party; but it was under circumstances which, though they do not justify the departure, are calculated, in a great degree, to excuse it, and to repel effectually any inference that it was an intentional abandonment of them.

No popular party is proof against success, and the long possession of power; and such proved to be the fact in our case. We had been in the uninterrupted possession of power for more than sixteen years, and had just carried through successfully a war against the greatest power on the earth, and, at the same time, overthrown the party in opposition to us. The flush of victory had, as is usual, the effect of working a considerable change in the feelings and views of our party, which contributed to the introduction of the measures to which the Senator refers. But there were other, and powerful causes, which also contributed to it. During the war, the country had suffered much from a depreciated and unequal currency; from the want of domestic supplies to take the place of those articles which we had been in the habit of receiving from abroad, but which had been cut off by the war, and from the want of good roads, and other channels of conveyance, on which to transport munitions of war, and to concentrate promptly a sufficient force on the points menaced or attacked by the enemy. After its termination, there was a vivid recollection of the difficulties occasioned by these wants. The danger, at the time, to the country, was believed to be connected exclusively with our foreign relations. The war, it is true, had terminated successfully, but there were hostile feelings left behind on both sides, between our country and Great Britain; and she kept up a powerful force in her possessions in our immediate vicinity, which was calculated to excite our vigilance, and to admonish us of the necessity of being prepared for a renewed contest. Besides, we were in danger of being involved in a long and dangerous contest, growing out of the revolution in Spanish America; in which, at one time, the great powers of Europe, united by what was called "The Holy Alliance," were strongly inclined to interfere. Under these circumstances, and when the political principles of our party appeared to have gained a permanent ascendancy, by the prostration of our old opponents, and to be in no danger, it is not at all wonderful that the measures with which the Senator now reproaches me should have received the support of myself and the party to which I belong. I confess, for myself, that I then believed the danger to be, not within, but without—not from the giving away of our principles, but violence from abroad; and that I had no suspicion that it lay in the quarter which experience has shown it really did. This accounts for my course at that period.

In voting for the tariff of 1816, which I am still of opinion was a judicious measure, with the exception of the minimum principle, of which I think as badly as any one, I regarded it as a revenue measure, and called for by the circumstances of the time. But I did not dream that, in the short space of twelve years, it would be perverted by those interested into an instrument of such unbounded oppression as to exact and pass into the Treasury one-half of the whole proceeds of our foreign exchanges. Nor did I imagine that, in introducing a bill to set apart a particular fund for internal improvement, and leaving it to Congress to determine thereafter the extent of its power over that subject, and to what objects the funds should be applied, (that was its real character,) there was the least danger that, in a few years, the whole revenue of the country would become an object of scramble among the various sections; in which the struggle would be, who should get most, without any reference to the public good. As to the bank, placed in the circumstances in which I and those with whom I acted were, I do not now see how we could have acted differently, even with our present experience. The time for reformation in reference to the currency had not then arrived; and any attempt at reform would have proved abortive.

But I offer not what I have said as a justification; I acknowledge we all departed, in a greater or less degree, from the stern and rigid principles of the party, and the true policy of the Government, and well have we paid the penalty. It has taught me a lesson never to be forgotten; and I now call on the younger and more inexperienced members of the party, as I then was, to profit by our example. Avoid, as you would the greatest evil, the least departure from principle, however harmless and innocent it may at the time appear to be. The smallest departure may prove to be an entering wedge; and others, differing from you in views and principles, will drive the measure farther than you ever contemplated; just as we have seen our old opponents seize on the tariff, internal improvement, and the bank, to overthrow our principles and to establish their own. Never cease to bear in mind that ours is a limited Government, with specific powers; and that if the prescribed line be passed ever so little, there is no fixing any limits to the encroachments of power.

Nor is the period of which I am speaking the only one in which success has caused departure from the principles and policy of our party. The vast revenue, which the protective tariff placed at the disposal of the Government, had the effects on those in power which might have been anticipated. They no longer relied on principles as the means of preserving their ascendency. The patronage and resources of the Government were deemed sufficient for that purpose; and many measures were adopted, which will hereafter be regarded as great and dangerous departures from the creed of the party; and which have done more to reconcile the people to the principles and policy of our opponents, and to weaken their confidence in ours, than all other causes put together.

As to myself, each revolving year impresses me deeper and deeper with the truth and wisdom of the old Virginia school of politics. She was blessed, when this Government went into operation, with leaders of the clearest discernment and purest patriotism; the Jeffersons, the Taylors, the Roanes, and many others, who had formed the most just conception of our system of Government, and the policy to be pursued to preserve it. I had, from my earliest years, imbibed a strong attachment for that school. Indeed, I may say, it was inherited by me. But I never realized to the full extent the depths of its wisdom, and the vast importance of adhering rigidly to its maxims, till experience, and the reflection of riper and more advanced years, taught me. And here is the broad line of distinction between the Senator and myself, which he, with all his ingenuity, cannot obliterate. He belongs, and always has, to another and an opposite school, which, to designate by its most distinguished leader, may be called the school of Hamilton; a man distinguished for his great abilities, perfect frankness, and ardent patriotism, but who was decidedly inferior to Mr. Jefferson in genius, the power of original thinking, and the clearness and depth of his conception of the true nature and character of our Government. Belonging, as we do, and ever have, to schools so diverse, our agreement has been casual, while our difference has been habitual and fundamental, both as to the nature and character of our Government, and the policy it ought to pursue; and which has placed us opposite to each other on the present, and most of the other great questions which have been agitated in our time.

He sees in the success of the present question the advancement of the principles and policy to which I am devoted, and in its defeat the advancement of his own; hence our difference, and the ardor of the present conflict—a conflict of opposing systems, in which, as one or the other may prevail, the future destiny of the country will be permanently influenced. The separation of the political and moneyed power will give a lasting ascendency to the political school to which I belong, and their union to that of the Senator.

He is right in fixing on 1825 as the year when my views in relation to the principles and character of the Government became firmly fixed and settled. It was then I took my seat in the chair which you, sir, now occupy. I had devoted the seven preceding years laboriously to the duties of the War Department, which I found in a state of complete disorder, and which so engrossed my attention as to leave me little leisure to attend to the general politics of the country. The change of office gave me both time and opportunity to view more minutely the general operations of the Government, which I did not neglect. I soon saw the incipient state of those disorders, which had then just begun to develope themselves, and the causes in which they originated, as well as the fearful consequences to which they threatened to lead. This induced me to make a careful review and examination of the principles of the Government. I went to the source, the Kentucky resolutions and the Virginia resolutions and report, which I carefully investigated, in all their bearings. I then turned my attention more carefully to the investigation of the character and tendency of what was called, at the time, the American system, and saw clearly its oppressive, corrupting, and dangerous tendency. I took a firm stand aginst it. Since then, my life has been one incessant struggle to maintain or restore the principles and policy of the old State rights Republican party, regardless of all personal consequences. During this long period of thirteen years of continued action, amidst the most trying scenes, I may bid defiance to the most rigid scrutiny to point out the slightest variation in my course, or the least departure from the principles or doctrines of the political school to which I belong. I may be accused of carrying my principles too far, or of adhering too rigidly to my doctrines, but of the opposite fault none have ventured to accuse me. My adherence to them has never wavered under the greatest difficulties or danger. If, then, I erred in common with the great body of the party, under the circumstances which I have explained, I, at least, have long since made, I trust, ample amends. If I have done any thing to contribute to the common errors of the period immediately subsequent to the late war, I have done far more, I hope, towards their correction, and the restoration of the principles and doctrines which our party profess, as well as to arrest the ascendency of the opposite. To this great object, which, I solemnly believe, involves our liberty and the perpetuation of our popular and free institutions, I have devoted my life.

REMARKS OF MR. CALHOUN, OF SOUTH CAROLINA.

In Senate, March 24, 1838—On ordering the bill to separate the Government from banks to a third reading, after the specie section had been stricken out, on motion of Mr. CUTHBERT.

Mr. CALHOUN said, as late as it was, (near 10 o'clock at night,) and fatigued and exhausted as the Senate must be after sitting ten hours, he was compelled to intrude himself on their patience. The question was on the engrossment of the bill; and as he could not dossibly vote for it in the shape it had assumed, he was constrained to assign his reasons, but he would do it in the fewest words possible. He said he was most anxious to vote for the measure. He had taken the deepest interest in it, and felt most solicitous for its success; and if he thought that the bill, as amended, advanced the great cause for which he had been so earnestly contending, one inch, he would give it his vote. But such was not his impression. On the contrary, he believed that it was an entire surrender of the cause. He would go further—it was a retrograde movement, and would leave the cause in a worse condition than it was. So far from a divorce from the banks and a return to the constitutional currency, the bill, as it stood, would virtually restore the deposite bank system again, with some features more objectionable than it formerly possessed; which he would now proceed to show.

On the motion of the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. CUTHBERT,] the 23d section, which provides for the collection of the dues of the Government in specie, was struck out, with the aid of a few on this side, and the entire opposition to the divorce on the other. That section provided for the repeal of the joint resolution of 1816, which authorizes the receipt of bank notes as cash in the dues of the public. The effects of this will be, should the bill pass in its present shape, that the Government will collect its revenue and make its disbursements exclusively in bank notes, as it did before the suspension took place in May last. Things will stand precisely as they did then, with but a single exception, that the public deposites will be made with the officers of the Government instead of the banks, under the provision of the deposite act of 1836 Thus far is certain. All agree that such is the fact; and such the effect of the passage of this bill as it stands. Now, he intended to show conclusively, that the difference between depositing the public money with the public officers, or with the banks themselves, was merely nominal, as far as the operation and profits of the banks were concerned; that they would not make one cent less profit, or issue a single dollar less, if the deposites be kept by the officers of the Government instead of themselves; and, of course, that the system would be equally subject to expansions and contractions, and equally exposed to catastrophes like the present, in the one, as the other, mode of keeping. He spoke of bank profits and bank issues generally, as derived from the deposite of public money—the aggregate profits and issues of all banks, without reference to the distribution of the profits under the one or the other mode of keeping the public money. He would show, in a word, that the bill would no more divorce the Government from the banks, in relation to the deposites, than it would as it now stood, as to receiving their notes, and giving them credit and circulation as cash, in its dues and disbursements; and that it would unite them as effectually in respect to both, as they were before the suspension in May. Although the assertion might excite some surprise at first, it would be very easy to make plain every word he had said.

The profit which the banks derive from the public deposites, when their own notes were collected and deposited, as would be the case if the bill passed in its present form, arises from the withdrawing of their notes from circulation. While their notes are in deposite, they are as completely withdrawn from circulation for the time as if burnt or destroyed; and the withdrawal makes a vacuum to that extent in the circulation, which has to be filled up by new discounts, and, of course, increased business and profits; and this was equally true whether the notes withdrawn were deposited in certain banks, as under the deposite act of '36, or in the hands of receivers general, and other Executive officers, as proposed by this bill. The profit depended, in no degree, on the fact where their notes were deposited; but on the amount withdrawn, and the length of time they were kept out of circulation. The larger the amount withdrawn, and the longer kept out, the greater the business and profits of the banks. Nor can the issues exceed the sum necessary to fill the vacuum occasioned by the deposites, whether they be made with the banks themselves, or the officers of Government. When the vacuum occasioned by the withdrawal is filled, whatever exceeds that must return on the banks, without regard to the place of deposite, and check farther issues. It follows clearly from all this, that the deposite of the public funds, if collected in bank notes (as proposed by the bill as it now unfortunately stands amended) in the custody of the public officers, would not in the least affect the discounts and the business of the banks. They would be as great as if deposited with the banks, and would keep the circulation of bank notes as much expanded, and subject to as many fluctuations and shocks. These propositions he held to be incontrovertible. He would be glad to hear any member rise in his place and attempt to answer them.

Nor would the Treasury be a particle more independent of the banks than under the deposite system, before the suspension of specie payments. The revenue, as he had said, would be collected under this bill, should it pass, as it was then, exclusively in bank notes, which, on another suspension, would be just as worthless in the hands of the officers in whose custody they might be deposited, as they would be in the banks themselves, and which, of course, would again compel the Government, in such an event, to pay its debts in worthless rags, to its own great discredit, and the loss of its creditors, or not pay them at all. Nor would it be possible, any more than in the present instance, to collect its debts in the legal currency of the country. Gold and silver would as certainly disappear as completely from circulation, under the operation of this bill, as it did under the system of bank deposite that existed at the time of the late suspension.

But if it will have no effect in rendering the Treasury more independent of the banks, nor in limiting banking operations or profits, as it certainly will not, where, he asked, will it differ from the late deposite system under the act of '36, which this bill is intended to supersede? There is and can be but one point of difference, viz: in the distribution of the profits from the deposites; and even that difference, he would show, is more apparent than real. Where the revenue is deposited with certain banks, selected by the Secretary of the Treasury, as under the act of '36, the profits of the deposites accrue almost exclusively to them. They discount on them, and issue the notes of other banks which they hold in deposite, or draw specie for them, and thus increase their business and profit, without incurring any additional liability; but where the deposites are made with the Executive officers, the profits would accrue, apparently, to the banks generally. He said apparently, for it would depend wholly on the officers holding the deposites. They can, at pleasure, give the profit to what banks they please, by holding back the notes of one bank, and disbursing the notes of another, and thus keeping the notes of one out of circulation, and throwing the other into circulation through disbursements, to return on the banks issuing them. The effects of this would be to give one all the profit that it could derive from being a deposite bank, and stripping the others almost entirely of the advantage of having its notes received in the dues of the Government. Take, for instance, two banks, in a place where the average public deposites were a million of dollars; is it not clear, if the Executive officer would make it a rule to disburse the notes of one bank, and hold back those of the other, it would operate, in fact, as a standing loan to that amount to the favored bank?

The result is, that in either case the distribution of the profit resulting from the public deposites would depend on the Executive Department, whether made with the Executive officers, or in deposite banks under the act of 1836. The Executive in one case would have the selection of the banks, and in the other the control over the subordinate officers of his department; with this difference, that when the bank was selected, it would, under the act of 1836, be under the control and protection of law, but the officers would be completely under the control of the head of the department at all times. This is the sum total of the difference. If you pass this bill you have the one, and if you defeat it you have the other.

Thus regarding it, and being opposed on constitutional grounds to receiving any thing but the legal currency of the country, or Government securities, in the public dues, and to the increase of Executive patronage, he could not possibly vote for the bill as amended. He was decidedly opposed to all discretionary powers, especially in the Executive branch of the Government, and this bill would give greater than any that has ever passed. It would not only give the power to which he has already alluded of favoring what bank it pleased, but the controlling power of demanding specie at pleasure of the Executive, of any bank it might desire to oppress, and abstaining from demanding of those it intended to favor. Powers such as these he regarded as incompatible with our free system of Government, and he for one could not consent to confer them.

But he had other and insuperable objections. In giving the bill originally his support, he was governed by a deep conviction that the total separation of the Government and the banks was indispensable. He firmly believed that we had reached a point where the separation was absolutely necessary to save both Government and banks. He was under a strong impression that the banking system had reached a point of decrepitude—that great and important changes were necessary to save it and prevent convulsions, and that the first step was a perpetual separation between them and the Government. But there could be, in his opinion, no separation—no divorce—without collecting the public dues in the legal and constitutional currency of the country. Without that, all would prove a perfect delusion, as this bill would prove should it pass. We had no constitutional right to treat the notes of mere private corporations as cash; and if we did, nothing would be done.

These views, and many others similar, he had openly expressed, in which the great body of the gentlemen around him had concurred. We stand openly pledged to them before the country and the world. We had fought the battle manfully and successfully. The cause was good, and having stood the first shock, nothing was necessary, but firmness; standing fast on our position to ensure victory—a great and glorious victory in a noble cause, which was calculated to effect a more important reformation in the condition of society than any in our time—he, for one, could not agree to terminate all those mighty efforts, at this and the extra session, by returning to a complete and perfect reunion with the banks in the worst and most dangerous form. He would not belie all that he had said and done, by voting for the bill as it now stood amended; and to terminate that which was so gloriously begun, in so miserable a farce. He could not but feel deeply disappointed in what he had reason to apprehend would be the result—to have all our efforts and labor thrown away, and the hopes of the country disappointed. All would be lost! No; he expressed himself too strongly. Be the vote what it may, the discussion would stand. Light had gone abroad. The public mind had been aroused, for the first time, and directed to this great subject. The intelligence of the country is every where busy in exploring its depths and intricacies, and would not cease to investigate till all its labyrinths were traced. The seed that has been sown will sprout and grow to maturity; the revolution that has been begun will go through, be our course what it may.

The alternative to the rejection of this bill would be to do nothing, which, in his opinion, was infinitely preferable. It would throw the responsibility from this on the opposite side. We would thus have done all we could, and if nothing be done, theirs would be the fault; and the country would hold them responsible. But to pass this bill in its present form would be to assume, not only the responsibility of acting, but of leaving things in a worse condition than we find them; to strike the disease deeper into the system, and render it more concealed and dangerous, while the attention of the patient would be withdrawn for a time from his danger. If, on the contrary, we stand fast on our principles and professions, and suffer the bill to be lost rather than to yield our principles, the public attention would be doubly roused; the subject would be more fully and perfectly investigated and understood, and the great cause we have so nobly supported would finally and gloriously triumph. Let others do as they may, he would maintain his position, and stand where he stood in 1834, and ever since. He could not be driven from it when others came to it, and now he could not be drawn from it by their departing. To stand alone had no terrors for him. It was to him not unusual.

REMARKS OF MR. DROMGOOLE, OF VIRGINIA,

In the House of Representatives, April 19, 1838—Explanatory of his amendment offered to the resolution of his colleague, (Mr. HOPKINS.)

Mr. DROMGOOLE, having succeeded in obtaining the floor, remarked that it had been his purpose on yesterday, when he submitted the amendment now under consideration, to accompany the same with a few observations in explanation. He was, however, prevented from fulfilling his intention on account of his colleague [MR. WISE] having anticipated him in getting the floor and consuming the remainder of the morning hour. If his colleague, who had again this morning occupied the attention of the House, and who had just taken his seat, could have forborne for a short time, and waited to hear his (Mr. D's) intended explanations, he felt confident that the trouble of supposing that the slightest imputation or reflection upon the select committees, to which reference had been made, might well have been spared.

[Here Mr. WISE rose, and was understood to say that he owed an apology to his colleague for having on yesterday preceded him.]

Mr. DROMGOOLE said, in reply, that no apology was necessary; that he had not made reference to it with any feeling of dissatisfaction, or for the purpose of censure or complaint; and he took this occasion to return his colleague his thanks for the very prompt and decided manner in which he then expressed his determination to sustain the proposed amendment. The resolution offered by his colleague [Mr. HOPKINS] refers to abuses which have gradually crept into the practice and proceedings of this House, whereby its expenditures have been greatly and unnecessarily augmented. Retrenchment and reform is proposed to be systematically introduced, and guards are to be set against the recurrence of similar abuses and corruptions, and for complete security in all future time. Now, said Mr. D. the subjects embraced in the proposed amendment have an immediate and direct connection with the purposes and objects of the original resolution. He [Mr. HOPKINS] proposes a faithful and comprehensive examination into all extravagancies and malpractices; and, in order to preserve the purity of the press from the alarming corruption engendered by the patronage exercised in the appointment of printer, he deems it indispensibly necessary that the political journals and the public printing shall be entirely disconnected. So thoroughly convinced is my honorable colleague, that the employment of an editor to execute the printing required to be done by order of this House, sheds a baneful and contaminating influence over his morals and his political principles, that he is constrained to become the advocate of a total and an absolute divorce between the political press and the Government printing; and, furthermore, with a view to screen them from temptation, and preserve their integrity, he would provide by law, that all conductors of newspapers should be forever proscribed from being employed to do any printing, officially required to be done, for their Government and their country.

It had occurred to him, said Mr. D. that his honorable colleague, the mover of the original resolution, must have lately espoused the opinions now held by him, and must have very recently become a convert to the doctrines now promulgated. As they have not heretofore been avowed and advocated, it would seem to be not an improbable conjecture that they have been produced by serious reflection upon the circumstances connected with the last election of printer by the House of Representatives. Sir, the candidates on that occasion, the protracted struggle, the interest and the excitement manifested, are still freshly remembered by all. After the close of the election, with but little delay, and with remarkable promptitude, it was announced in the National Intelligencer that the printing would be executed in that office, and not in the office of the elected printer, who was not prepared to do it.

It is the current rumor that such is still the arrangement.

Before Mr. D. proceeded to state the reasons and considerations which, in his mind, amply sustained and justified an investigation into the conduct of the public printer, and into the manner in which the duties of his office were discharged, he would barely advert to a remark made by his colleague [Mr. WISE] on yesterday. He spoke of the spirit of the resolution (my amendment) and the spirit in which it was offered. That the inquiry asked by me, said Mr. D. is not improper in its spirit, its tendency, or its purpose, a mere reference to the fact that it elicited the ready and unqualified avowal of support from my colleague himself, ought to be received for conclusive proof as to him. As regards myself, sir, I trust I manifested no improper spirit, and was guilty of no indecorous conduct.

I endeavored, on that occasion, as I always do, to observe decorum and propriety, and to conform to the rules of the House. Whether an officer of this House discharges his duties faithfully, and complies honestly with the terms and conditions of his appointment, is unquestionably a fair and proper subject of inquiry. Surely it will not be denied, or even doubted, that the House of Representatives may supervise an officer of their own appointment, and examine whether the office itself is correctly administered. Neither the power to examine, or the propriety of exercising it, can be questioned. If the information sought could only serve to gratify party spleen, then it would be vain, and idle, and useless, to pursue it; if it could only serve to harass an innocent and faithful officer, and inflict a wound upon honorable and sensitive pride of feeling, then to urge the investigation would be wanton cruelty. But public and paramount considerations require a full disclosure of all the suspicious circumstances connected with the subject of the printing, and they demand that any information obtained shall be applied to useful and practical purposes.

If, Mr. Speaker, the fact shall be disclosed that the individual elected printer hold the office nominally only, performs none of its duties, and yet receives a certain stipulated profit, dependent on no contingency whatsoever, does he not palpably and shamefully enjoy a sinecure at our hands? If he receives a fixed and certain sum, and allows or agrees for others, in consideration of this sum paid to him by them, to perform all the business of the office and receive the entire proceeds, and they also realize profits, is it not strong presumptive, if not conclusive, evidence that the rates paid for printing are extravagant, and that they ought to be reduced. The question also is suggested whether the public printer can farm, let out, or depute, the business of his office? And if he can, whether an agreement that the person deputed must pay a certain, fixed, and in no way contingent sum, and for the same be allowed to receive the entire proceeds of the office, whatever they may be, is it not a question whether such an agreement is not immoral, fraudulent, corrupt, void? Nay, more: Does not the transfer of the entire business and proceeds of an office for a certain and fixed sum, involve the disgraceful and criminal offence of selling an office? If there was an agreement or understanding subsisting prior to the consummation of the election, that one of the parties was to stand the successful applicant, and that there should be a joint participation in the proceeds of the office obtained, a division of the spoils, does not such an agreement also come within the English statute against the sale of offices, the provisions and principles of which have, I believe, been generally introduced into this country?

In every aspect of the case, in every point of view, a full development of all the facts and circumstances is requisite. Rumors, and suspicions, and doubts, ought to be made to give way to ascertained and established truths. I have not, said Mr. D. any personal knowledge of the matter. But let all be disclosed—let nothing be concealed—integrity and honor will scorn concealment—they will eagerly embrace every opportunity for their vindication. If improprieties are detected—if corrupt practices are exposed to view, we may perhaps be able to devise an adequate remedy for their present correction, and an efficient precaution against their future recurrence. Let us, however, look at this matter in one other point of view. An individual seeks an office—he requests and permits his immediate friends and supporters to recommend him as qualified and competent: he succeeds. In the sequel, it appears that he was in no wise prepared to perform the duties of the office; that from his condition and circumstances he could not possibly perform them; that he had sought the office from a combined desire of pecuniary and political speculation; that he did not intend, at the time, to execute the business connected with the appointment, but designed to transfer it to others for pay. In the eyes of all honorable men, would not such an individual appear, unmasked, an impudent and unprincipled impostor? And what ought to be the mortification and chagrin of honorable, but deceived and disappointed, friends?

Mr. D. repeated, that the conduct of an officer of the House was a proper subject of investigation—that it was perfectly fair and legitimate to inquire how he had performed his duty. Indeed, he had heard of no objection from any quarter, except that he understood that the nominal printer himself very strongly objected. This, said Mr. D. is very natural.

Now, sir, said Mr. D. in reference to other topics embraced in the amendment, what was proposed? It was proposed to ascertain the amount of expenditure incurred in consequence of the appointment of certain select committees of investigation. It is not designed or intended to cast any, the slightest, reflection upon these committees: the purpose is to show how various items of expenditure have been incurred by the action of those committees, and thereby explain, to some extent, the cause of the augmented expenses of this House. It is to an improper and erroneous proceeding of this House, and of course I embrace all, without distinction of party, who have concurred in clothing committees with general and indefinite powers, that very heavy portions of our expenses is to be ascribed. It is known, said Mr. D. that I have uniformly opposed authorizing our committees to send for, and require, the attendance of any and every citizen throughout the whole community, at their mere will. He believed that the committees placed an improper construction on the power to send for persons, when they interpreted it to mean an authority to issue a subpœna to compel the attendance of witnesses. There appeared to his mind a clear distinction between the act of sending for a person to give information to a committee, and the power of issuing a compulsory process requiring the presence of a witness to be examined upon oath. Let it not be said that the mere authority to send for persons is vain and useless, and can answer no practical purpose. It is to be presumed that every good and creditable citizen is ever ready, voluntarily, to impart any information in his possession deemed useful to his Government or his country. Nor let it be said, that we have no security that statements, made by persons attending, by request, will be full and correct. It is the solemn duty of a person under such circumstances to tell the truth; it is the unquestioned right of the House to seek, through the organ of a committee, pertinent and useful information; and he who shall suppress the truth, give false and delusive statements, prevaricate or equivocate, trifles with the authority of the House, is guilty of contempt, and may be punished. Mr. D. said that he wholly denied that under the expression "to send for persons," was covered the power to issue subpœnas; and he further denied that the House could, by express grant, delegate any such power. A subpœna is a peremptory command, under a penalty, to attend and testify. No person will pretend that a committee can exact a penalty, or inflict a punishment, for contempt. A subpœna from a committee, therefore, is quite an idle and impotent process.

The rules adopted for our government, said Mr. D. expressly provide that subpœnas are to issue by order of this House, and are to be signed by the presiding officer. The Manual to which we have always referred as authority, and which has lately been adopted by express order, states explicitly that subpœnas for witnesses shall not be issued in blank, and refers to authority to sustain it. This he believed was the long established and invariable practice of the British House of Commons, from which we derive all our parliamentary precedents. When a member proposes that a witness shall be required to attend and testify, he is caused to name the witness to the House, and sometimes perhaps to state the importance and materiality of the expected testimony.

[Mr. GARLAND of Virginia said, that as he was a member of the first investigating committee referred to in the amendment proposed by his honorable colleague, and its chairman, it was proper that he should state, that when he was first applied to to issue a subpœna for a witness, he declined, and sent the subpœna to the Speaker, who also declined, saying it was the duty of the chairman. In this opinion, upon an interview with that officer, Mr. G. acquiesced, and issued all the subpœnas which went out during the investigation.]

Mr. DROMGOOLE said, that he had heretofore remarked, and now repeated, that he intended not to impute blame or censure to any one. He believed that the House had always silently acquiesced in, if it had not formally sanctioned, such practice. He maintained, however, that the practice was fundamentally wrong, and in violation of the written rules of the House and of parliamentary usage. His great object was to have an exhibition of the consequences of this illegal exercise of power, with a view to its correction. He understood that these investigating committees exercised the power of commanding the attendance of witnesses, at their pleasure, from the remotest sections of the Union, without naming them to the House, and without any averment of their supposed materiality. And he had understood that they had gone still one step further, and had actually issued commissions and appointed commissioners to take depositions when and where they pleased. Can the grant of power to command the attendance of witnesses, and subject them to a personal examination before a committee, be fairly and properly construed into a grant of authority to appoint and empower commissioners to take depositions? Now he maintained that it was the grant of this indefinite and latitudinous power, or the silent permission to exercise it, which had swelled the expenses of this House to a greater amount than would have been otherwise the case. Whenever it shall be proper to examine witnesses before a committee, and procure testimony for the use of the House, let them be named to the House, and let the direct and undoubted authority of the House be exerted to insure their attendance. The desired evidence will thus be more certainly obtained, in a mode free from objection or doubt; whilst we shall have a better security of the peace and comfort of the citizen, and of individual liberty, from useless and unnecessary disturbance and vexation, than when left exposed to the caprice or mercy of a bare majority of an investigating committee. It was, then, in the hope, that by showing how the expenses of this House were liable to be greatly and improperly augmented, and how, possibly, power might be wantonly and capriciously exerted, by a very few members, to the great inconvenience, if not oppression, of the citizen, these aberrations would be restrained, and correct principles and practices revived. Such was his object in desiring this branch of the information. The same course of remarks would apply with equal force to the information called for in reference to investigations by the Committee on the Judiciary.

There was another item of expenditure embraced in the proposed amendment. He alluded to the expense incurred for printing a large edition of the rules and orders of the House, together with Jefferson's Manual. How many copies were embraced in the order, he did not recollect; one or two thousand he believed. Now the investigation might show that a heavy expense had been incurred on this account; and, if so, it would be the duty of the House to guard against it for the future, or at least to take some measure to prevent the necessity of another edition within any short time. The plan which at present suggested itself to his mind was, that the copies should be carefully preserved for the use of the members, as the property of the House. They might be deposited in the Library of the House of Representatives, be taken out by members at the commencement, and returned at the close, of each session. This would save the expense of another edition of the Manual.

[Here Mr. MERCER rose and reminded his colleague that, in reference to the printing of Jefferson's Manual, that work had been made a part of the rules of the House, where it did not conflict with them.]

Mr. DROMGOOLE was fully aware of that fact. He believed that his colleague was chairman of the committee that reported the revised rules at the extra session, including the order for the adoption of Jefferson's Manual as a part of them; and it was upon that gentleman's motion, in the first instance, and a subsequent motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] who sits near me, that the printing of a large edition of the work was directed. It was certainly with no view of attaching blame to any one, that he sought for this information. It was for the purpose of avoiding a repetition of the expenditure. The matter had presented itself to his consideration, and he thought it not an improper subject for the attention of the proposed committee.

In what he had proposed, said Mr. D. he had no design of precluding his honorable colleague, the mover of the resolution, from going into the most full and ample investigation of all other topics deemed to come within its scope. His colleague proposed, he believed, to provide, by law, for preventing the employment of any conductor of a political journal in the execution of the public printing. Whether he should ultimately concur with his honorable colleague [Mr. HOPKINS] in that object, he could not then say. He would hear the reasons for it, weigh them dispassionately, and be governed by his best convictions of duty. It would take, however, very strong reasons indeed to induce him to vote for a law, proscribing, in advance, any individual or class of individuals from being employed in the public service. If it was wrong to elect the conductor of a political journal to do the public printing, in the estimation of a majority of the House; if it had, on account of the patronage bestowed, a corrupting effect, let them decline to elect an editor, and select a practical, professional printer. According to the present impressions of his mind, he was not disposed to pass a proscriptive law.

Mr. D. said, surely he had no inclination to blame the zeal of his honorable colleague, [Mr. HOPKINS,] who moved the original resolution, for desiring to withhold all the patronage of Government from political journals. It would be recollected that a short time before a colleague of theirs [Mr. PATTON,] vacated his seat, he had, under the direction of the Library Committee moved for a very large subscription, for the use of the members, to a political journal, (Niles's Register,) the expense whereof would exceed, according to calculations submitted at the time, $12,000 per annum. Mr. D. had been opposed to the adoption of that resolution; it proposed a direct patronage of the press for the individual purposes of the members. He, with others opposed to it, succeeded in laying it on the table, and it was but a reasonable conclusion that those who refused to lay it on the table were in favor of its adoption. If Mr. D. was not mistaken, his colleague [Mr. HOPKINS] voted against laying it on the table. This proposition was a direct proffer of Government patronage to a political journal, and moreover looked pretty much as if it squinted at a censorship over said journal. Here, sir, is the resolution reported by "Mr. PATTON, from the Committee on the Library:"

"Resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives be directed to subscribe for ten numbers of 'Niles's Register' for each member of the House, to be delivered once a week: Provided, The editor of said Register will agree to publish in, or as a part of, said work, at least once a week, under the direction of the Clerk, the Journals of the House, with the yeas and nays on all questions: Provided, further, That the editor of said Register will also agree to publish, at the end of every session of Congress, under the direction of the said officer, a supplement to said work, containing all the laws passed thereat, and treaties ratified by the Senate: to which shall be prefixed a copious index, to be approved of by said officer, and furnish one copy thereof, free of charge, to each member of Congress for the time being."

Mr. D. did not allude to this, for the purpose of making any charge of inconsistency upon his honorable colleague, but merely that it might be seen that those who complain of the baneful influence of Government patronage over the press, sometimes, unwarily perhaps, give votes having the appearance of bestowing that very patronage so strongly deprecated.

Mr. D. knew that it was very common for gentlemen to talk about the corruption of the press, by the influence of the patronage of the Government; and he knew that the subject of venal editors, and a subsidized press, filled up much of the ordinary and regular declamation of the day.

Much of these charges, or all of them, may be true; and if so, are they not alike, and equally, applicable to all political parties? How far the election of printer by this House may corrupt or influence the course of the political journal under his direction, he would not undertake to decide. Nor would he undertake to declare that a person might not be influenced by unworthy motives in seeking the office, and that he might not commit an act of corruption in the very management or contrivance by which he effected his election.

In relation to the present nominal printer to this House, Mr. D. said he did not mean to affirm or deny any thing in reference to any influence which his election may have had upon the course of his paper. It was no part of his business or purpose to inquire if that paper had faithfully fulfilled its prospective promises. It was no concern of his to know whether a prudent observation of the co-operating political influences which were visible in his election had not had some effect in regulating the tone, the temper, and character of its articles. No: it was a matter of no moment to him to be informed if this paper has not, by a natural and gradual process, accommodated itself to the opinions and views of those to whom it is known that the editor was mainly indebted for his appointment. Of the course of that paper, Mr. D. said he had but little knowledge, and certainly cared nothing at all about it. He had nothing to do with the newspaper or its concerns. His proposition applied to the printer to this House.

But, said Mr. D. these charges and rumors of profligacy and corruption are constantly reiterated. They are not confined to one party alone. It is not always the same party against whom the missiles are hurled by their adversaries. The adversary party in their turn have to ward off blows levelled at them, some times with force and directness. Sir, crimination and recrimination is the employment of opposing parties almost without intermission. Why, said Mr. D. he had seen the charge going the rounds that a strong combined effort was making to raise an extensive fund to buy and establish a press, and to employ a competent editor to publish a new political journal in this city; and a circular, purporting to be signed by three members of this House, soliciting liberal contributions for the support of the establishment, has been very conspicuously exhibited to the public attention. In relation to this matter, he had not a single remark to make, either as to the truth of the charge, or the propriety of the measure.

Mr. D. said that he would take the liberty of briefly adverting to one remark made on yesterday by his colleague, [Mr. WISE,] in reference to another subject. His colleague had taken occasion to refer to him as one of those belonging to what was denominated the Divorce party—that party which was in favor of the Independent Treasury bill. Now, he did not complain of this allusion of his colleague, but he was at a loss to perceive the connection between that question and the one now before the House. Mr. D. however, had no objection to avowing, at this or any other time, his opinions on that subject. He was one of those who wished to organize the Treasury of the United States upon its true constitutional ground, and to disconnect it entirely and wholly from its union with State institutions. He believed that good policy required it; that past experience demonstrated its necessity, and he believed it to be according to the spirit of the Constitution, and the obvious intention of the framers of that instrument. He was well satisfied, from reason and reflection, as well as from the lights of former experiments, that the State banks, from their limited and local character, and from their separate and unconnected existence, under different State authorities, could never harmoniously, adequately, and efficiently, perform the functions of fiscal agents to the Federal Government.

Mr. D. observed that it was a principle long established in Virginia, that the business and operations of each Government, State and Federal, should be kept separate and distinct. That each Government should be confined to its own orbit—that each should separately exercise its own appropriate powers—that the offices and the administration of the two Governments should not be united or blended in the same persons—are in the good old Commonwealth of Virginia, regarded as cardinal doctrines. The proposed connection between the banks and the Federal Government—the mixture of the revenues of the two Governments in the hands of a common fiscal agent—the transfusion of the moneys of the Federal Government into the business of corporations—are a palpable violation of the political creed of Virginia, which she has constantly and ardently cherished. Such was the wakeful jealousy on this subject—such the anxious desire to establish and secure this great principle of State sovereignty, (doubtless to guard effectually against any sinister influence on the part of the Federal Government)—that at the very first session after the Virginia Convention had ratified the Federal Constitution, the Legislature enacted that any person holding any office or place, any commission or appointment whatsoever, whether any pay or emolument was attached thereto or not, or if in any way accepting or receiving any emolument whatever, should be entirely disqualified for holding any office in the State. And the preamble of the act, after reciting that the convention had assented to the Federal Constitution and the creation of a Federal Government, declares that "it is judged expedient and necessary that all those employed in the administration of said Government ought to be disqualified from holding or administering any office or place whatsoever under the Government of the Commonwealth."

This was the doctrine maintained from the first by the Revolutionary fathers of the Old Dominion, and solemnly embodied into law in 1788, at the session that intervened between the act of ratification and the commencement of the Federal Government. From that period to the present it has been carefully preserved among our living statutes. And for the purpose of upholding the same principle of keeping the State and all its institutions exempt from any improper influence or interference by the Federal Government, it is a part of our fundamental law, a provision of our amended Constitution, that certain persons in the service of the United States shall be incapable of exercising the elective franchise. Mr. D. unhesitatingly avowed that he was one of those who advocated an entire separation between the revenues of the Federal Government and the State banks. When that vitally important subject came up for regular discussion, he hoped to have an opportunity of giving his views on it at length; and he thought he did not deceive himself in supposing that upon that occasion, or upon his return to the district which he had the honor to represent, he could give satisfactory reasons to his constituents for the course which he should deem it his duty to pursue. At present he would say no more on this topic, for he knew that remarks on it were not pertinent to the subject matter under consideration; but this much he had felt constrained to say, in consequence of the direct allusion made to his opinions by his colleague, [Mr. WISE.]

He would not longer detain the House, and hoped that his amendment would be at once adopted, and that the whole resolution might pass, so that his colleague, [Mr. HOPKINS,] the original mover, might, without further delay, commence a faithful and comprehensive investigation, with a view to retrenchment and reform.

PROTECTION OF THE ABORIGINES.

SPEECH OF MR. TIPTON,

OF INDIANA,

In Senate, April 18, 1838—On the bill to provide for the security and protection of the emigrant and other Indians west of the States of Missouri and Arkansas.

Mr. TIPTON addressed the Senate as follows:

I am happy to find that we have reached this bill in the regular order of our business. I consider it the most important measure, with, perhaps, one exception, of any that has, or is likely to come before us at the present session of Congress. I feel much diffidence in attempting to speak on any question in this Senate, composed of members so much better qualified to throw light on every subject they discuss than I can pretend to be, but the position I occupy here seems to make it my duty to submit a few remarks explaining the views of the Committee of Indian Affairs, and my own opinion, on this important measure.

On the success of this measure materially depends the character of our Government, in regard to its treatment of the aborigines of our country, and upon it also depends the existence of the Indians as a separate and distinct race of people. The removal of the Indians from the east to the west side of the Mississippi, and of giving them a Government and laws, has been the settled policy of this Government for many years; it has been ably discussed both in this and the other branch of Congress, and is, so far as my information extends, unanimously approved by the people. The subject has been favorably reported on by the Committee on Indian Affairs of the Senate at three successive sessions of Congress, but the posture of our Indian relations for three years past, has prevented us from urging it to a final decision. I am happy to be able to say that, in the opinion of the friends of the measure, the time has arrived when Congress should act definitely on the subject. We think it very desirable that this bill should become a law before the present session closes.

In the remarks which I am about to submit to the Senate, I propose to say something concerning the condition of the aborigines of North America when our forefathers took possession of their country, of the effects of our laws regulating trade and intercourse with these people, and to contrast the cost of administering the intercourse laws among our Indians with what will be the expenses of administering the government under which it is proposed to place them by the bill before us. I hope to be able to show to the satisfaction of the Senate and the country, that a better form of Government can be established and administered for them at a saving to the United States of sixty per cent. on the sums annually expended, as our law now stands, for the Indians of the proposed Territory.

I cannot doubt that, if we pass the bill, and if the superintendence of the Territory, and the execution of the plan proposed by the Committee of Indian Affairs, be placed in the hands of experienced, talented and honest men, the next generation of Indians in the territory may dispense with the agents of the United States, and become their own agents, their own merchants, their own mechanics, manufacturers, legislators and lawyers—become a civil community, depending on their own exertions for existence, and independent of all others.

It appears to me that in our system of government no part is so imperfectly understood as that which relates to Indian affairs, and none more urgently calls for reform. My residence for the last sixteen years has been near the Indians, during which time I have had the honor of serving the Government in various capacities in the transacting of business with them. The relations which I have sustained to the subject when in and near the Indian country, and when acting with you in this place, have afforded opportunities of becoming acquainted with it, which few have enjoyed. I should have been dull, indeed, had I not by this time learned something in relation to this matter, and, with what I have learned, I must now declare that I should be an unfaithful Senator, and an unfeeling neighbor to the Indians, were I to remain silent upon this occasion.

Under the healthful influence of our institutions, there has, for a few years past, been a rapid increase of kind feeling for the suffering Indians, and almost every act of the Government, in relation to them, is marked with increased liberality. But, I am sorry to say, that I know, from personal observation, that the benevolent designs of Government towards this unfortunate race of men are seldom accomplished. We are conscious of our superiority over them; we are not dependent upon them; we do not fear them. Still, we are not the less kind towards them on account of our superiority. Were the United States Government capable of acting towards the Indians from selfish motives, destitute of kindness, and regardless of the principles of humanity, it could at once coerce them beyond the sphere of vexation, and beyond the necessity of legislating for them, But, in the plenitude of our power, we are not regardless of their interests. We legislate for their relief every year; we are spending millions of money, and are sending numerous agents to relieve and protect them. We discard the hateful principle of exclusive selfishness. We are actuated by kind feelings towards them; by a desire to do them good.

Now, I know, sir, by personal acquaintance with the subject, that, with slight exceptions, our well-meant efforts have injured rather than benefitted them. They who have had an opportunity of seeing the Indians at their homes—no, I recall the expression, for they have no homes; but they who have enjoyed the opportunity of witnessing the effects of our intercourse laws and regulations on them in the places where they have existed—must, I think, attest the truth of my remark; while they who have been at a greater distance from them, may infer its truth from the fact that, with all that has been done for them, they, as a people, have not prospered. It is true, a few thousands of them may be classed with civilized men, yet, taken as a whole, a general decline, which has been in progress ever since the white man first set his foot on the American continent, has not been arrested—as a people they are still perishing.

If this position be true, what follows? Why, sir, that we should change our policy towards them. This necessary change is intended to be provided for by the bill now on your table.

If there were not something wrong in principle in our former policy, and injudicious in its application, why has it resulted in disappointment? Why have not the Indians prospered under it? Like causes will produce like effects. There are causes which result in the improvement of other people; these causes have not been brought to operate upon the Indian tribes, or they, too, would have been improved; unless we believe, as some of the early superstitious Spaniards believed, that the Indians are unsusceptible of improvement.

With regard to mental ability, we have no reason to believe that they would suffer by a comparison with any other people. Some minds are more obtuse than others, and receive instruction in the arts of living, and in sublimer science, more slowly; but it would be preposterous to suppose that a whole nation of people were destitute of capacity to improve their condition; and that generation after generation should pass away under these mental inabilities. No such thing has happened in regard to other people, and no such thing ever should have been attributed to the aborigines of America.

Are they not human beings, possessing all the passions of rational man, and all the powers of thought which belong to the human mind? If they are not of our stock—if they are not human, why legislate for them in the manner that we do? But we know that they are human beings, possessing the faculties of human understanding; and it is no less certain that they are capable of being improved in their condition. There may exist causes to retard improvement, but not to render it impracticable. If we have sought their improvement unsuccessfully, it is because we have not sought it by suitable means. The failure is in consequence of an error on our part, and not because the Indians are incapable of improvement.

The circumstances of men may be changed; Governments may be destroyed, and others may succeed them. Convulsions may remove mountains, and fill their places with seas; still the laws of nature remain unchangeable. If we were told that fish had left the sea for want of capacity to enjoy the element of water, and were breathing upon land; or that fowls, which had been formed to fly in the heavens, had become averse to air, and were winging their way through the briny deep, the boldest assertions would not be believed, because they would be at variance with the known laws of nature. No less absurdity is attached to the conclusion, that though the Indians are rational beings, they are unlike all other rational beings in regard to some mental or constitutional defect; or, if they possess the faculties and passions of other people, they will nevertheless render themselves different from all, by choosing a course which others would not—a course of wretchedness during a brief existence, and ending in utter ruin. Such things would be contrary to the laws of nature as they operate upon rational beings, and such absurdities ought never to have obtained credence among civilized men.

Other nations, it is true, have disappeared, but not from the causes to which Indian decline has been attributed, to wit: an inveterate aversion to improvement, entailed upon generation after generation, and which is to continue until they disappear from the face of the earth. Nations may be conquered by others more powerful, and the vanquished may disappear by amalgamation with their conquerors, or may sink into oblivion under their oppressions; but neither of these causes operates upon the Indians. They are not, at this time, sinking under positive oppression, because, on the contrary, we are kindly seeking their preservation. Neither are they disappearing by amalgamation with their conquerors. They remain a distinct class of people, with separate interests.

On the discovery of America, some millions of aborigines lined the Atlantic coast, where, at this time, scarcely one is found. Where are they? In relation to many tribes, the inquiry is made in vain. They have disappeared. Not a vestige of them is now to be found, not even a stone to tell where they lie. They have no record in history, except the obscure traces which are barely sufficient to enable us to conjecture that once they were here. We have reason to believe that both the name and the existence of some tribes have been obliterated from the recollections of man. They have melted away before the approaching whites like snow beneath the beams of the sun. They who have been most exposed to the blighting emanations of their conquerors, have been the first to disappear. More remote tribes, upon which these evils operate more indirectly, have been less injured by them. Looking after them, we perceive some fragments of tribes remaining, and numbers increase as we go back from the people from whom emanates their ruin. Destruction has marked the way they have gone; and wherever we find them in contact with the white man, they are on the decline.

There is something painful in the reflection that these people were once numerous, and that by our approach they have been reduced to a few. It is natural that we should feel averse to the admission that the true causes of their decline are to be found among us. Hence we have sought for the seat of the disease among them; but, in my judgment, it is not there to be found.

That the true cause of Indian decline does not originate with them, I undertake to prove from another consideration. Our inquiries whence, by what means, and at what period they came to America, can never be answered but by conjecture; but none can suppose that they were thrown upon this continent in greater numbers than we found them. There are many reasons for supposing that the number which first reached our continent was very small, and that this small band increased to millions. If the causes which produce Indian decline are of Indian origin, and are peculiar to themselves, how did it happen that they increased from a few to many? Are they at this time decreasing under causes which at that time produced increase? Have the laws of nature changed? The case is too plain to be misunderstood. A few Indians increased to many millions under the privations of savage life. The white man came, and from that moment they have declined. We brought with us from Europe the bane that produced a rapid diminution of numbers, and from us a wasting influence has constantly emanated.

In our unwillingness to admit that we had occasioned the rapid decline of this people, it has been reported that, prior to the arrival of our pilgrim fathers, whole tribes had been destroyed by pestilence on the New England coasts; and hence it has been inferred that, in order to make room for the whites, Providence, before their arrival, had commenced the work of destroying the aborigines; but that such a destroying pestilence had raged to the depopulation of the country, lacks proof. What disease was it? Why has it not attacked a tribe since our arrival? or, how have we escaped it? We hear of the small-pox destroying thousands in the course of a few months, and we hear of the ravages of other diseases which we have introduced into the country, but we hear nothing of the wastings of the disease which is said to have slain its myriads a year or two before the landing of the pilgrims.

We who are acquainted with wilderness countries, inhabited by Indians in the West, are at no loss to account for the mistake of supposing that villages had been destroyed by a plague. Indians frequently change their places of residence; and we frequently discover places on which were once Indian villages, abandoned by the inhabitants, because of the superior eligibility of other places. Similar causes, it is probable, occasioned the abandonment of Indian villages, discovered by early European emigrants, and the story of the destruction of the Indians most likely originated in this preconceived opinion of the whites.

The causes of the rapid decline of the Indians evidently exist among us, and therefore, must be within our reach, and under our control. It is no less evident, that in this matter we have labored under some mistake of vital import—a mistake which we have already seen has rendered abortive our efforts to do them good. True, efforts of the benevolent have, in no instance, I believe, been entirely unsuccessful—a few have been benefitted; but I speak of the Indians in the aggregate; and, as a whole, they have constantly been on the decline.

That we should have labored so long under a vital mistake, is rather unaccountable. I suppose that one cause of our error has been, that we have overlooked the fact that the condition of the American Indians is an anamoly in the history of man. No nation of people ever was similarly situated, either as it regards their own barbarous condition as a people, or as it respects their relation to others. In our reasoning, we have supposed a similarity of condition where it did not exist, and, consequently, we have drawn conclusions from premises which were true only of others. The barbarians of ancient Greece, who deified a man for the improvement he effected in society by teaching men to eat acorns instead of weeds, we now feel confident existed only in fable, as did a thousand other things of which we have been told. The world has not furnished a case parallel to the one under consideration. On this account much of our fireside theory has been erroneous. At a distance from the Indians, we have indulged in speculations which were inapplicable to them. More practical knowledge of their true condition, and of what ought to be done for their improvement, could be acquired by a month's residence in their villages, than by seven years' theorising at a distance of a thousand miles from them.

But our errors appear the more astonishing inasmuch as we seem to have looked for effects in the absence of causes. We have looked for improvement when the essential means of improvement had been wanting. Then, in our disappointment, we have, with still greater absurdity if possible, attributed to the savage some peculiar propensity which belonged to no other nation of people—an unnatural passion for war, for hunting, &c.

I have assumed what admits of ample proof, but which I presume few will deny, that the history of man does not furnish a case similar to that of the American Indians. Here, in the commencement of savage life we may say, for the first time, we find man left in a state of nature, to seek subsistence from spontaneous productions. Without an implement of iron with which to fell a tree, to till the ground, to butcher an animal of the forest for food, or to catch a fish in the waters, or even to dig a root from the earth. No spinning wheel, or loom on which to manufacture a garment, and no seed corn from the mother country. Here man begins existence as in another world, where all is unknown except the brook at which he slakes his thirst. They have every thing to learn, and the brevity of life, especially under the calamities of this new state of things, soon deprives the destitute company of profitable recollections of the arts of life in the mother country. No book of record preserves the story, or directs succeeding generations to improve their condition by telling them of what is done in other lands. Tradition alone tells of the past, but here are no regular institutions to preserve the veracity of tradition. Commencing under these disadvantages, and with the wilderness of our continent before them, they remained barbarians, and so would any other race of men have remained under similar circumstances.

But, it may be objected, that many of the tribes near us, and especially those which the bill before us concerns, have seen the operations and advantages of civilization, but have not abandoned their wild habits. For this, I answer, many reasons are at hand. As civilization has approached them on one side, they have been encouraged to recede from it. Our prejudices have stamped upon them a mark of inferiority, in consequence of which they are thrown out of good society, and into that which is worst. Such disadvantages as these, the existence of which are admitted by all, produce their evil effects; but, such as these are the mere appendages of the real evils which have protracted savage habits, and augmented savage woes. Notwithstanding all their disadvantages, some have improved their condition, and a few have attained to the comforts, though not to the privileges, of civilized man. We have imposed upon them a system of regulations which necessarily holds them fast in their uncivilized habits. Our laws recognise them only as savage men, headed by chiefs. We appoint agents to manage them and theirs, and to teach them to neither think, hope, nor act for themselves, but to feel dependent upon us. Our laws, therefore, not only detain them in savageism, but deprive them of such advantages of the savage state as formerly enabled them to live under it, without imparting to them the essential properties of civilization. In this state of dependence and degradation we have given them good advice, and kept them at the same time exposed to the example of the most worthless of our own people.

While we have done some things for them which were right, we have withheld others which were of vital importance, without which no people ever did prosper, and without which, I venture to say, no people ever will prosper.

It can easily be perceived that many things have tended to perpetuate the wretchedness of the Indians, but that which claims our first attention, is one which we have been most slow to perceive, and yet it is of itself sufficient to destroy the whole fabric of civilization in the whole world, were it allowed so widely to operate. It is the state of anarchy which belongs to savages. I mean the absence of law—the want of civil government.

Can any thing be more evident than that without law, without civil government under some name, the most civilized nation upon earth would soon sink into insignificance, and ultimately become savages? The condition of the Indians is the very reverse of civilization—without law, without government. Can it be possible for them to improve their condition in life without both? I answer, no, fearless of contradiction. Nor is it possible for them in future to become substantially improved in the arts of life without law, without government. No, never can they be civilized in the absence of this requisite principle in the system of civilization. The last remnant of the last savage tribe that shall be left upon this continent, will pass out of existence in a savage state, unless they be brought under the influence of law.

We have given them axes and hoes, oxen and ploughs, and have sent men among them to teach them their use; we have instructed them in letters, and the soothing voice of religion has invited them to the house of worship. A few have been improved; still, taken as a whole, they are perishing, and perish they must, unless they be made subject to law.

The bill under consideration proposes to supply these essential wants, to remedy these vital defects, by placing them in a situation in which they may become a civil community, organized and exercising the functions of civil government. The design of the bill, I do most heartily approve: I hope it will be approved by both Houses of Congress: the doctrine in which consists the essence of the bill is sound, and I cannot easily conceive on what ground it can be objected to.

I esteem it a high commendation of this bill, and one that augurs well for its passage by Congress, that it is in conformity with sentiments expressed by the Father of our Country. In a special message to Congress on the seventh of August, 1789, respecting the Creeks, Cherokees, and the Wabash Indians, General Washington used the following language:

"While the measures of Government ought to be calculated to protect its citizens from all injury and violence, a due regard should be extended to these Indian tribes, whose happiness, in the course of events, so materially depends on the national justice and humanity of the United States."—(State papers, vol. 4, p. 12.)

I quote these words with the more pleasure, because they were spoken in reference to the tribes whose interests at this time are most intimately connected with the provisions of the bill. Here let us notice that, in the words of Washington, the following points were presented to the consideration of Congress: first, the protection and security of the citizens of the United States, and secondly, the happiness of the Indians; "which," says he, "materially depends on the national justice and humanity of the United States." In urging Congress to seek the happiness of the Indians, he appeals to the justice and the humanity of our Government.

The bill is designed to cover precisely this ground, and no more. It provides for settling the tribes where the localities of their situation will be such as to diminish, and ultimately to annihilate, all just grounds to apprehend future hostilities from them. In regard to this matter, the local advantages of this place are greatly superior to any other under our control.

We know that there is a recklessness hovering around the Indian character, that often leads to rash and ruinous deeds; and it will be wise in Congress to place these people in a condition presenting strong inducements to them to quit the chase, and to commence agricultural and other pursuits to support themselves. This will diminish their propensity for war, as well as for hunting. Since a prominent feature of the bill is its design to promote the happiness of the Indians, I trust that Washington's appeal to the justice and humanity of the United States, will not be unavailing in the support of its passage.

The first section of the bill describes the Territory which is to become the scene of Indian reform, and provides that patents shall be granted them for their lands. What may be termed the northern boundary, commences at the source of a small river called Puncah, after a tribe of Indians of that name, who reside on and near it, and follows that stream to its junction with the Missouri river; thence in an easterly direction with the Missouri river about 200 miles; these two rivers form a natural boundary, extending nearly east and west; thence with the Missouri river a little east of south about 200 miles to the western boundary of the State of Missouri; thence with the western boundary of the States of Missouri and Arkansas to Red river, and up Red river to a point 200 miles west of the western boundary of the State of Arkansas. (This point has been fixed on chiefly on account of the country beyond it being uninhabitable, on account of the scarcity of timber.) Thence a direct line to the place of beginning.

It will be perceived that the northern, a portion of the eastern, and the southern boundaries are natural. Natural boundaries are to be preferred in all cases, more especially when they are to separate the white and red people. It will be more easily known by the latter; and, in all respects, the purposes which render a line of demarcation necessary, are more fully understood by natural than by artificial boundaries.

The western, and most of the eastern boundaries are of necessity artificial. The Territory is large enough to include the tribes already there, and has sufficient space to accommodate all the Indians east of the Mississippi, that are intended to be transferred to that country to form a part of the Indian confederacy.

That the country is of suitable dimensions, will appear from an examination of the numbers now there, and ultimately to be located there.

The Indians within the Territory at present appear to be as follows:

Choctaws	15,000	Osages	5,510
Chickasaws	1,500	Kanzas	1,606
Seminoles	407	Omahas	1,400
Creeks	22,000	Ottoe and Missourias	1,600
Cherokees	8,000	Pawnees	10,000

Delawares	921
Kickapoos	625
Senecas and Shawanoes of Neosho	462
Quapaws*	600
	53,325

*The Quapaws are a branch of the Osage tribe. They have been living within the State of Arkansas, have recently been located within the Territory, and are reckoned among the emigrants.

The tribes now East of the Mississippi, and under treaty stipulations to remove West, are:		Tribes East of the Mississippi, and NOT under treaty stipulations to remove West, are:
Winnebagoes	4,500	Menominies	4,200
Ottawas of Ohio	230	New York Indians, say	4,176
Pottawatamies of Indiana	3,000	Wyandots	575
Chippewas, Ottawas, and Pottawatamies, unit'd	6,288	Miamies	1,100
Cherokees	14,000		10,051
Creeks	1,000	To which add those now in the Territory	74,241
Chickasaws	3,900	And those under treaty to remove	42,418
Seminoles	2,600
Apalachicolas	400	Will make a population of	126,710
Ottawas and Chipewas in Michigan	6,500
	42,418

Between the Mississippi and the Missouri are the Sauks and Foxes, which probably must be brought into the Indian Territory, say - 6,400

To which may be added stragglers of several of the emigrant tribes not included in the above estimates, say - - 773

Making - 7,173

Which, added to those already mentioned, viz: - - - - - - 126,710

Will make - 133,883

Which will be the population of the Territory when all the tribes which will probably be gathered into it shall be located.

The Territory, being about equal to 600 miles by 200, will embrace 76,800,000 acres. This, divided among 133,883 persons, will give to each a little over 593¼ acres; or it will give to a family of seven persons about 4,015 acres.

The State of Ohio contains 25,600,000 acres. The population of Ohio, according to the last census, is 937,903. The average amount of land in Ohio to each person within the State, is a fraction over 27¼ acres; or, to a family of seven persons, 190¾ acres. The inhabitants of the Territory, therefore, will have more than twenty-one times as much land to each individual as the present population of the State of Ohio possesses.

The country between the Shawanoes and others on the north, and the Osages and Cherokees on the south, has been examined within the last year, and found to be adequate to the wants of the Pottawatamies, Ottawas, united Pottawatamies, Ottawas, and Chippewas, New York Indians, Wyandots, and Miamies.

North of the Delawares, and south of the Pawnees and Otoes, is a tract of 8,960,000 acres of unappropriated land.

The Pawnees, Puncahs, Omahas, and Otoes, own about 19,008,000 acres. Their entire number is about 13,800 souls. Allow to each of them the average quantity calculated for the whole Indian population when all shall have been gathered into the territory that will be necessary, viz: 573¼ acres, and the amount required for them will be 7,914,300 acres, leaving a surplus of 11,094,700 acres. Add this 11,094,700 acres to the other unappropriated tract, which contains 8,960,000 acres, makes 20,054,700 acres to be given to the people yet to be provided for within the territory.

The tribes to be located within this tract are the Sacs and Foxes, the Winnebagoes, and the Menominies, numbering in the whole about 15,100 souls. The amount of land to each person would be about 1,328 acres. This is more than enough. But as in this northern part of the territory there is a greater scarcity of wood than in the more southern, the whole country north of the Delawares had better be fairly divided between the three last mentioned tribes, and the indigenous tribes now resident thereon.

The Territory as described in the bill is not too large, because,

First. It barely embraces those tribes that have intimated a willingness to be thus organized into a community.

Second. Some allowance should be made for succeeding generations. Their prejudices, which have kept them at a distance from each other, are too inveterate to be abolished in a few years, so far as to make it pleasant and profitable for them to be brought in contact, as our own people are in civilized communities. There they will have room to settle their descendants for generations to come, among themselves, untrammelled in their march of civilization by the mortifying prejudices of white neighbors.

Third. It is not too large, because of the great scarcity of wood in some portions of the Territory. The assumed western boundary of habitable country at the distance of two hundred miles from the States of Missouri and Arkansas, is at the utmost extent at which it can be placed, according to information derived from the most authentic sources. The boundless prairies, or plains, between the western boundary of the proposed Indian Territory and the Rocky Mountains, or the line between us and Mexico, should, in my opinion, be kept by the United States for their own use, to be disposed of as future circumstances may require, as a hunting ground for the Indians or otherwise.

It is not easy, for one who has been accustomed only to countries covered with timber while in an unimproved state, to form a just conception of a prairie country in which the order of nature is reversed. Here, instead of extensive forests, are extensive plains, interspersed only with groves of timber. In view of these circumstances, and the number of Indians which we have yet to remove to the Territory, the country described in the bill will not be too large for the purposes contemplated.

A common objection to be met at this place is, that on account of the scarcity of timber, the country is not suited to the object contemplated. This difficulty is obviated by observing that the timber now there will be sufficient for the present and a few succeeding generations. The soil is good; wood is prevented from spreading over the country by the burning of the grass on the prairies. These prairies are covered with grass tall enough for the scythe, and which is usually burned during the dry season of the fall. The flames are borne along by the winds with great rapidity, and are very destructive to young timber on the margin of these prairies.

As the country becomes peopled and stocked with domestic animals, the quantity of grass will be diminished, and the ravages of annual fires will become less destructive, and timber will rise up with astonishing rapidity. These remarks, sir, are not mere theories; they are facts, known to every one acquainted with the prairies on the Wabash and Mississippi rivers. Many persons now cut firewood from land that thirty years ago was open prairie.

The suitableness of this country is such that one is almost ready to conclude that Providence had contrived it for this very time and for this special purpose. The soil is generally very fertile. The Missouri river washes its borders, not reckoning by the meanders of the river, about four hundred miles. The Red river washes its southern border two hundred miles. The Arkansas, Kanza, and Great Platt rivers, run across the territory from west to east. These are all large rivers, and although, on account of their great width, and the sand bars over which they run, steamboats cannot ascend them far without danger of being left aground, by the rapidity with which their waters fall, still, the navigation of these rivers will be of benefit to the inhabitants, for transporting their produce to our markets, in times of high water, in ordinary flat boats, with which it will not be desirable to return.

There are many smaller streams that might be used in the same way after great rains. Creeks and rivulets are abundant. There is perhaps less swampy or marshy land there, than in any portion of the settled parts of the United States, of equal extent. Hence may be inferred its general healthiness.

The sickness which has occurred with the Choctaw, Cherokee, and Creek emigrants, is not to be attributed to the general unhealthiness of the climate, but to an imprudence which frequently attends the first settlers of new countries, in placing themselves along the large water courses. Such situations are unhealthy in all rich countries of the West, until the exuberant foliage of these lands becomes somewhat subdued by the grazing of stock.

Salt springs and rivulets of salt water are numerous; and coal, without search, has already been discovered in so many places as to justify the belief that it exists in great abundance throughout the Territory. This circumstance will greatly diminish the inconvenience which might otherwise be felt on account of the scarcity of wood. Both lead and iron ore have also been found in the Territory.

Its adaptation to leading a barbarous people to civilization is not more conspicuous in any feature than that of pasturage. These extensive plains are covered with grass, and afford excellent grazing during the warm seasons, and hay during the winter. These prairies, that were once spotted, or rather blackened, with thousands and tens of thousands of buffaloes, could sustain an equal, or even greater, number of domestic animals. The pastoral state is one that seems, by Nature, to intervene between the savage and the civilized. The truth of this remark is already apparent in several tribes now in the Territory. The facility with which domestic animals are reared are in some measure appreciated, and give stimulus to renewed exertion.

By reference to the annual report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, p. 59, respecting the Creek Indians, I find it stated by the Agent, that they dwell in comfortable farm-houses, have fine gardens and and orchards, raise from forty to fifty thousand bushels of corn more than is necessary for their own consumption. They furnish large quantities to the commissariat at Fort Gibson annually, and have contributed to the supplying of the late emigrants. The same report says, the produce of the Cherokee farmer is his corn, oats, potatoes of both kinds, beans, peas, pumpkins, and melons. The great profit of the Cherkee farmer is his corn, his horses, his cattle, and his hogs. Some of the Cherokees have taken and fulfilled contracts for the garrison at Fort Gibson, and for subsisting emigrant Indians, to the amount of from forty to sixty thousand dollars, without purchasing an article, except in the Indian country; and at their principal saline, they make eighty bushels of salt per day.

"The Choctaws," he states, "have mostly given up the chase for a living, and are engaged principally in the cultivation of the soil, and in raising stock. It would be impossible to estimate the number of acres of farms in cultivation, nearly all have their fields well inclosed, and raise corn, potatoes, peas, beans, pumpkins, and melons, and those settled along Red river raise large quantities of cotton. The country is well adapted to raising stock, and so prolific has been the increase, that they have furnished large quantities to the Creek contractors, without apparently diminishing the main stock. The corn crop of last year was very good, producing a surplus of about fifty thousand bushels, a large quantity of which was furnished to the garrison at Fort Towson. The quantity raised this year will greatly exceed former years, as the people have enlarged their farms, and turned their attention to farming, with much greater care and industry." Of the Senecas and Shawnees, he says: "They cultivate the soil and raise stock; they make corn, oats, wheat, rye, and garden vegatables; no tribe own more horses, cattle, and hogs, than those people, in proportion to their number."

These facts, it seems to me, should silence the statements so frequently made, that the Indian territory was a sterile country, not suitable to become the habitation of a highly cultivated civil community, and it proves another fact, very important, and I state it with great pleasure, that here is a proof positive, that the aborigines of this continent are competent to support themselves by cultivating the soil, and pursuing any or all of the arts of civilized man.

The more judicious and well informed Indians, who reside in this Territory, from the nature of their relation to the United States, will not be liable to unkind feelings, or hostile intentions, toward our citizens. Their interest and ours, from the nature of their pursuits, will become assimilated. But there are inconsiderate outlaws to be found in all countries, and especially among the Indians, who, through foreign emmisaries, have excited jealousy and distrust, which have proved injurious, both to the Indians and to ourselves; and I know of no place so well guarded as this Territory is from the approach of foreign emisaries.

Look upon the map of the United States embracing our uninhabited territory westward, and it will be perceived that they could not be so well situated, in reference to this matter, in any other place. Far removed from the British possessions on the north, still farther from the ocean on the east; and, moreover, immediately on their west is the uninhabitable region of 400 or 500 miles; and on the southwest is a country of so much prairie as to form a barrier against an improper foreign intercourse from that quarter.

Here the Indians are to be placed, not so compactly as to produce collisions among themselves, and yet so much so as that the whole will be under the eye of our Government; the slightest expression of unkind feeling toward the citizens of the United States would be perceived, and could be nipped in the bud. It is because the Indians have had an opportunity of devising mischief in the obscure recesses of the wilderness, and because there were fastnesses there to which they could send their women and children, and in case of emergency to which their warriors could retreat, that they have at various times had the temerity to make war upon our frontier. Here they would adjoin no such secluded places, in which to hatch mischief, and no such fastnesses in which they could evade a speedy retribution of their offences.

The bill secures to the tribes within the Territory, severally, peaceable possession for ever, unless they abandon their land, in which case the land will revert to the United States.

Nothing can be more plain than that insecurity of title has a tendency to paralyze industry and enterprise. In this is to be found one of the causes that have held back from improvement most of the tribes near us. The Southern tribes, for various reasons, had been induced to feel themselves more secure than others, and this was one cause of their improvement.

Many instances might be produced to show the sad effects of the uncertain tenure by which they have held their possessions. As early as 1646, Indians in New England, under the labors of Elliott* and others, learned to read and to work; but the crowding of white people around them sometimes produced war, and sometimes peaceable negotiations for their removal, and rapidly drove them away from civilization, or else penned them up under circumstances still more disastrous to the Indians.

Subsequently, Brainard in New Jersey,† and the Moravians in the West,‡ were in like manner disappointed. Even among the rude Pottawatamies of the St. Joseph of Lake Michigan, as late as between the years 1822 and 1828, a very promising beginning of improvement was made by that truly benevolent society, the Baptist Board of Foreign Missions. More than sixty youths of both sexes were in their school, making pleasing progress in the knowledge of letters, while their progress in industry was no less prosperous. The males learned to work on the farm, in the smith-shop, and in the shoe-shop. The females learned to sew, spin, and weave, and to attend to the various branches of domestic economy. Three new settlements were formed by the institution. At these settlements they commenced making rail fences, log dwellings, &c. Seven of their youths were sent to New York, and two to Vermont, to complete their education, hoping that, by the time of their return, the improved state of society would afford them employment, beneficial both to themselves and their countrymen; but scarcely had the work of improvement commenced before it was destroyed by the rapid influx of white population, and all ended in disappointment. The society has removed its establishment west of the Mississippi, where, I have no doubt, it will be useful.

In the history of this ill-fated people may be found many instances similar to those which I have noticed. I have mentioned these, because the three former are part of the history of the country, and known to every body; the latter took place while I was attached to the Indian Department. I had frequent opportunities to visit the school conducted by the society, and it is but an act of justice to bear testimony to the prudence, economy, and industry with which it was conducted, and I had the mortification to witness its failure, from the causes which I have stated. My purpose will be answered by saying that by the provisions of this bill, the difficulties that have been experienced in improving the Indians for near two hundred years, arising from the insecurity of possession of the tribes near us, will be prevented in future; the lands they may in truth call their own; the improvements which they shall make thereon will benefit their descendants. For this reason, parents will be stimulated to provide for their children, and children will be induced to respect their parents. In order to make this provision, the parents will blend their interests together, correcting that destructive error of savage life, of keeping separate the property of husband and wife, and of alienating their affections, as well as their interests. Here schools can be permanently established and conducted without interruption, as they are among us, and I hope with equal success and usefulness.

The ambiguity which seems to have attached itself to what we term Indian treaties, is a strong argument in favor of this feature of the bill, which provides that they shall hold their lands by patent; by the same instrument by which the citizens of the United States hold their lands. Concerning the validity of this instrument, a question cannot be started among civilized men. For a trespass upon a landed right secured to the owner by patent, the decision of a court will, without legal doubt, secure to the owner ample remuneration for damages.

By securing to them their lands by patent, the better informed, who can understand it, will be inspired with additional confidence in the security of their possessions; and, through them, the same confidence will be instilled into the minds of the less informed, promoting through the whole the salutary ends we are seeking. In securing to them their lands by patent, we are but redeeming pledges already given. We have not only assured all of those tribes that within this Territory they might expect a permanent residence, but to many we have actually promised patents, using the very word that I now use.

We have not only promised them security in that country by treaties, but this assurance has been confirmed by law. An act of the 28th of May, 1830, makes it lawful for the President of the United States to solemnly assure the nation or tribe which, by exchange of lands, shall locate in the Territory, that the United States will for ever secure and guarantee to them, and to their heirs, the country so exchanged with them; and if they prefer it, a patent is to be made and executed to them for the same.

In treaties, the promise of a patent has been made to several tribes. By a treaty with the Choctaws of the 15th September, 1830, article 2d, it is stipulated that the United States, under a grant specially to be made by the President, "shall cause to be conveyed to the Choctaws, a tract of country west of the Mississippi river, in fee simple to them and their decendants to inure to them while they shall exist as a tribe, and live on it."

The treaty with the Creeks of the 24th March, 1832, stipulates that "as soon as the boundaries of the Creek country, west of the Mississippi, are ascertained, the United States will cause a patent or grant to be executed to the Creek tribe, agreeably to the 3d section of the act of 28th May, 1830." Similar stipulations have been entered into by the United States, with the Cherokees, Senecas, Senecas and Shawanees, Quapaws, Shawanees, Delawares, and Potawatomies of Osage river, by which their lands in the Territory are to be secured to them respectively, by patent.

I can anticipate no objection to the provision which is to secure by patent the claims of the several tribes within the Territory, because it does not propose to introduce any new principle into our Indian relations. It is merely designed to complete the fulfilment of obligations which we have already come under. We cannot in justice deny the patent which we have promised them for their lands in the Western Territory.

The 2d and 3d sections provide for the appointment of a superintendent and a clerk. Every Government must have a chief officer to see that their laws are faithfully executed, and it matters not what title he bears, if his duties are properly performed. Sections 5th, 6th, and 7th provide for a legislative council, to be convened once a year, for the purpose of enacting such laws as the welfare of the community requires. These laws will not take effect until approved by the President of the United States.

Here, within this Territory, will, ere long, be an Indian population of more than 133,000. They will belong to 28 tribes, not to mention some minor divisions. In order to promote peace and harmony among them, it is important to establish, upon just principles, the relations which the tribes are to sustain towards each other, and to make all fully to understand these relations. The measure is further necessary, in order to prevent the strong from oppressing the weak. Further, the proximity of such a population to our settlements, and the necessity for our citizens to pass through their country, imperiously require that they should not be left loosely, as they now are, under our present management, but that they should be considered as one people, and that whatever rules or regulations exist in their country, especially such as can in any way affect our citizens, should be such as our Government would approve, and the tendency of which would be the promotion of peace and amity between them and us, and among themselves.

We have now reached the ground upon which alone the fabric of civilization can be erected, namely, a union of intellect, of interests, and of pursuits—a confederacy of people thus united, enacting laws for the security of their persons and their property. For want of these the Indians have heretofore led a savage life. Now, when put in possession of these privileges, we have a right to expect them to look up to a better condition.

But, as the general council, at first, will be inexperienced in legislation, it is deemed expedient for the United States to exercise a guardianship over them, and not allow laws to operate until approved by the President of the United States.

Sections 4, 9, 10, 11, and 12 are merely for filling, in detail, what is embraced in the several sections which give character to the bill.

It only remains to notice the 8th section, which is that part of the bill which provides that the confederacy shall appoint an agent to remain at Washington, during each session of Congress, to attend to the interests of the Confederacy as they stand related to the United States. The delegate is to be an Indian—one of themselves. His pay is to be equal to that of a member of Congress, and his duty will be to attend to their business here.

Upon this subject, which is one of some importance, I am happy to find that, as far back as 1778, in the days of Washington, by a treaty with the Delawares, it was agreed that that tribe, united with others, might have a Representative in Congress By the treaty of Hopewell, Nov. 28, 1785, with the Cherokees, it is agreed that that tribe shall have a right to send a deputy of their choice whenever they think fit, to Congress. And in the 22d article of a treaty with the Choctaws, of 27th Sept. 1830, the Indians request of the Commissioners to secure to them the privilege of a delegate on the floor of Congress. The commissioners stated, in the same article, that they could not, under a treaty stipulation, accede to their request, but that they would submit their request to the consideration of the Government. The treaty containing that stipulation has long since received the sanction of the President and Senate of the United States, and is the law of the land. I have added the case of the Choctaws to those which preceded it for no other reason than to increase the strength of the plea, not for a delegate on the floor of Congress, but for an agent to attend at Washington during the sessions of Congress; for this I put in a plea, not for the Choctaws separately, but for all the tribes that may see fit to unite in forming the Confederacy. In order to accomplish the work which we have begun, it is not only necessary to make them thoroughly acquainted with our institutions, but to hold out inducements to stimulate them to laudable emulation to improvement. The provision for this agent is admirably calculated to answer these ends.

Their agent here will not be an idle spectator, but one actively engaged in bringing to the notice of Congress, and the heads of Departments, matters of interest to those who sent him, and which require the notice of the Government. By these means he would acquire self-respect, and a correct knowledge of our laws and institutions.

The Choctaws, Cherokees, Creeks, Weas, Shawnees, Delawares, Pottowatomies, Otoes, Ioways, and Osages, have had books printed in their several languages; the Shawnees have a newspaper printed in their own language, edited by Mr. Johnston Lykins, a gentlemen of talent and great moral worth I have had the pleasure of his acquaintance for many years. He is well suited to the task he has undertaken for these people.

The facility with which many of the Indians learn to read and write in their own language, is owing to the simplicity of a new system of writing, which promises to be of great utility. In their newspaper they take a deep interest. By the reading which is now introduced among them, they will acquire information of the arts of life, the science of Government, and of the condition of the world, that will elevate and enlarge the mind with great rapidity.

Again: By admitting an agent of their own to attend to their business here, it would relieve some members of Congress of much labor on that subject, who could devote their time to the business of their own immediate constituents.

Such is the nature of the bill now under consideration. Is there one thing in it which is not called for by one, or by all, of the considerations which, (as I have stated,) Washington urged upon Congress, so long ago as 1789, namely, the safety of our own frontier, and justice and humanity to the Indian tribes? Placed under the same circumstances under which our new settlements have improved, they may be expected also to improve. Situated, as they will be here, on our Western frontier, and separated from every body else, and our own citizens prevented in future from making encroachments upon either their territory or their rights, and as their interest and ours become more and more identified, as enlightened communities, the ties of friendship between us will be strengthened, and the decline of this heretofore ill-fated people may be arrested.

That our design will, if reduced to practice, succeed, we have just grounds to believe, from the advanced state of improvement of the Cherokees and some other tribes. The Cherokees were so situated as to feel more of national pride than the perishing tribes on our borders; and they have made advances in civilization while many other tribes have been sinking into insignificance. But the Cherokees possessed only a portion of the facilities to improvement which we propose to give to the Indians in the Territory. We may fairly infer, therefore, that in the Territory, improvement will be much more rapid than it has been among the Cherokees.

It is rather surprising that the Cherokees, or their advisers, did not earlier see this, and long ago embrace the opportunity of acquiring rank, reputation, and all that makes life desirable; far beyond what they would ever have attained by remaining in their original place. There all laudable ambition was circumscribed to the little sphere of an Indian tribe; here, in the Territory, the sphere will be enlarged, until it shall equal in population and business one or two of the largest States of this Union.

The Governor of the Wisconsin Territory—than whom few men in the country understand Indian character better, or have done more to chastise their temerity in time of war, or are more zealously engaged in preserving their existence as a people, or more desirous to ameliorate their condition—in his letter published with the annual report (page 17) of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and laid on our tables at the commencement of the session, while speaking of the wretched condition of the Winnebago Indians of Wisconsin, says: "It would, however, be much better for the Indians and the Government, if they could be located southwest of the Missouri river, where they could have no intercourse with the whites. I have no hesitation in saying that the Government should interpose its aid to save this miserable and degraded race of Indians from the ruin and destruction which seems to await them." These remarks, coming, as they do, from Governor Dodge, are stronger arguments in favor of the bill than any opinions of my own that I can hope to urge on your consideration.

None can believe that we have discharged the obligations of justice towards a perishing people, whose territory necessity compelled us to take possession of. The world is large enough for all its inhabitants. There is room enough for us and for them: we have yet unoccupied, except by a few Indians, the best place, taking into view the whole case, which our continent ever afforded for their residence; a place unembarrassed by State rights, and, as I have endeavored to show, favorable in its location, and ample in its resources. There are already in that country 74,241 Indians, on the ground, ready to receive at our hands the initial institutions of government and greatness. We can do them justice in this case, without loss to ourselves. I say more: the act of justice which we are called on to perform, promises us positive benefits. Not less distinctly is the voice of humanity heard in this case. Who can think of a race of men, possessing undisturbed a quarter of the globe, with noble intellect, though within naked bodies, retiring from the vast Atlantic coast before the Spaniards' cross-bows and the Spaniards' bloodhounds, before English guns and English institutions, now halting to oppose a feeble resistance, and again receding farther into the wilderness to hide, strewing the way of their retreat with the victims of their suffering, and appearing fewer and fewer upon every occasion that brings them to our view, without a softened heart! A hundred times over have we declared that we wished them well; and yet our wishes have not been reduced to practice: neither their retreat nor their decline has been arrested. They have at length reached the extremity of habitable country on our western border: no farther can they go, unless we crowd them off the land where man can live, and let them die at once. To this extremity, I say, 74,241 have already come. There they stop; and their numbers daily accumulate, by influx from the various tribes east of the Mississippi. There, for the last time, they turn towards this Government, imploring mercy by all that is dreadful in the past, or hopeful in the future. And shall we shut our eyes, that we may not see their sufferings, or stop our ears, that we may not hear their cries? And shall we fold our arms, and refuse to help? No: our history must not, will not, be stained with such a dereliction of duty toward the race that preceded us. I anticipate a response in every American heart. We will help them: we will help them now; for if we delay, it may deprive us of the opportunity.

I would fain persuade myself that I am but expressing the feelings of every one who has brought his mind to bear on this subject, when I say that I consider it a privilege, than which none in my short life will afford me greater satisfaction, that I have been allowed to bear a part in this noble work of justice and of charity. Centuries have passed away, and with them millions of the ancestors of those for whom we now legislate, but it has been reserved for this generation, for this time, and may I hope for this Congress, to extend the hand of kindness to a noble race of men.

Now let us act, and not delay about quibbles of minor import, which experience will correct in the progress of the work. Let us not deny ourselves the felicity of improving this rare opportunity of doing good. Let us speedily prepare a message of kindness to be carried to these people already within the Western Territory. Let us tell them in truth, here terminates your wanderings west, and here shall terminate your wretched sufferings; from this time date the commencement of your elevation which will not leave you short of the summit of all that is desirable among your conquerors. Now they present the hand, not of the conqueror, but of the kinsman; see ten thousand eyes dried at once, or rather wet with tears of joy, and listen to the voice of a grateful people gladdening the solitary places of the desert, followed by the hum of industry, which shall convert the wilderness into fruitful fields. Under these auspicious and pleasing anticipations, let us act on this bill, and I have no fears of the result.

Here, sir, I would gladly close my remarks, but I must claim the indulgence of the Senate a few moments longer, while I draw the parallel between the present expenses of administering the intercourse laws to the people of the Territory, and the expenses of the Government proposed by the bill. I have prepared a statement, showing the number of artisans and others now engaged within, and connected with, the people of the Indian Territory.

Present annual expenditures under existing laws within the proposed Indian Territory.

Five agents, at $1,500	$7,500
Four sub-agents, at $750	3,000
One clerk, at $1,000	1,000
Seven interpreters, at $300	2,100
Twenty-five gun and blacksmiths, at $840	20,000
Seven farmers and assistants, at $600	4,200
Twelve teachers, at from $833 to $840	6,960
Three millers	1,700
One millwright, (vacant,)	600
St. Louis Superintendency.
One superintendent	1,500
One interpreter	300
Two clerks	1,800
One laborer	180
	$53,240

Expenses of proposed Territorial Government.

Superintendent's salary	$2,000
Clerk's salary	800
Subsistence of delegates attending general council	2,000
Printing laws and regulations	300
Contingencies	1,000
	$6,100

At the end of the first four years after the Territorial Government goes into operation, one-half of the agents, sub-agents, and interpreters may be dispensed with; and after the expiration of eight years, every agent, sub-agent, and interpreter may be discharged, leaving to the superintendent, the chiefs, and the general council, the management of the entire business of the Territory. Among the emigrant tribes, there are a number of young men of talent, well educated, and wanting employment. These men, with the assistance of the superintendent and council, will be able to manage all the business for their people within their Territory. Offices will be created for them to aspire to, and it will, I have no doubt, be found the interest of both our Government and the Indians, at no distant day, to withdraw every white man holding an office from the Territory, leaving the Indians to manage their own concerns for themselves.

The expenditures will soon be still farther reduced, by discontinuing the artisans at present employed among the Indians under treaty stipulations, as above stated, all of whom, excepting two, are engaged for limited periods. Two are permanent; the others are for the following periods, viz: during the pleasure of the President, 18; at the discretion of Congress, 4; for five years, 4; for ten years, 8; for sixteen years, 3; for twenty years, 4; for thirty years, 5; uncertain, 11.

Some of them have been several years engaged, and may soon be discharged. In the year 1859, the term of service for the longest engagements will expire. At that period we can withdraw the last of our mechanics from the service of the Indians, and it is proper that we should do so.

It will become the duty of the head of the Indian Department to inform the Indians that our Government will, at the end of the present engagements for white mechanics, discontinue them. The superintendent and all other officers of the Territory will see the necessity of placing Indian youths in workshops, either within their Territory or elsewhere, to learn all branches of mechanism, to be prepared for the time when our present engagements to furnish them will have expired.

When we shall discontinue the practice of furnishing mechanics and laborers to work for the Indians, the expenses of the Territorial Government will be reduced to $6,100 per annum.

Not the least of the difficulties which we have to encounter in organizing the Indian Territory is to reduce the salaries, and withdraw our agents, artisans, and others, employed among the Indians. These men are rolling in ease and luxury, receiving better salaries than the States pay their officers, higher wages than can be realized from the ordinary pursuits of life. The salary of an Indian agent is higher than the salary paid by some of our States to their Governor. Agents are also furnished fuel, quarters, clerk hire, and stationary, and to some a laborer. They will not willingly let go these comfortable places. When a move is made in Congress to retrench expenditures, they will be found in this city urging their own claims to place. Congress should take up this subject and reduce the salaries paid to most of them, twenty-five per cent. It will require some firmness in both the Executive and Congress to reduce these extravagant expenditures, and bring them down to the real wants of the service. But, sir, we are compelled to retrench if we intend to fulfill our duty to the Indians or to ourselves. I feel justified in saying, from not a very limitted acquaintance with the subject, that we have become extravagant in making Indian treaties, careless in appropriations, and wastefull in the application of public money to the use of the Indians, and to those employed by the Government among them, and that retrenchment is necessary.

Should this bill become a law it will not be necessary to keep more than three agents, and about six sub-agents, in the employ of the Government for all the Indians not within the territory. An agent for the upper lakes, one at St. Peter's, and another at Council Bluffs, with a half dozen subs at suitable places, will, in my opinion, be sufficient. It is bad policy for Congress to create agencies to be scrambled for, and worse to advance them far into the wilderness, and make it necessary to send out a military force to protect them; the regular increase of population, and the advances of our settlements approach these people fast enough.

The bill of the last session for organizing the Indian territory was submitted to the consideration of eleven tribes, and was assented to by them. These tribes are Delawares, Shawanoes, Kickapoos, Pottawotamies, Sauks of Missouri, Ioways, Weas, Piankashas, Peorias and Kaskaskia, Kansas, and Ottowas, every one of these tribes approved of the provisions of the bill, and desired the Government to carry into effect without delay, and each of these tribes sent to Congress, through the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, a petition to that effect. An extract from one of these petitions is found in page 65, of the annual report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, it concludes thus: "with all the foregoing propositions we are well pleased, and we earnestly request the Government to carry them into effect as soon as practicable."

The Commissioner appointed to submit the bill to some of the tribes, in his report, also printed, and on our tables, says further: "the agent for the Pawnees, Ottoes, and Omahas, in a conference held with him last summer, appeared confident, that these three tribes would acquiesce in the measure. Such, says he, is also my decided opinion. The subject has not been submitted to their consideration."

I have the pleasure of a personal acquaintance with Major Dougherty, the agent spoken of; have long considered him an efficient business man, and I entertain, no doubt, that if he makes the effort, all the tribes, for which he is agent, will yield their assent, and join the confederacy.

To the Osages, Quapaws, Senecas, and Senecas and Shawanoes, the subject has not been submitted for their consideration. It is believed that each of these tribes would have been in favor of the measure if the subject had been properly explained to them.

No answer has been received from the Creeks; the bill not having been submitted to them in a formal manner. Some of their Chiefs, I understand, are favorably inclined. The Cherokees and Chickasaws have expressed a disinclination to come into the measure. This is owing, I have no doubt, to erroneous information, or bad counsel.

It may be laid down as a general rule, to which there are but few exceptions, that wherever the agent for a tribe of Indians is in favor of the measure, the Indians of his agency will agree to it. There is not a tribe of Indians in our country, excepting the Cherokees east of the Mississippi, and which is evidently under the influence of bad counsel, but what will yield their assent to any measure that may be desirable with the Government to accomplish, provided their agent does his duty. If he desire complaint, they will complain; if he desire peace, or war, he can influence his Indians to conform to his wishes. Indeed, sir, so perfectly satisfied am I of the unbounded influence of an agent over these people, that wherever an agent has been in office a sufficient time to become acquainted with his Indians, if they refuse to conform to the wishes of the Government, I would justify the Executive in dismissing him, as being either incapable or unfaithful; either of which is good ground for removal. An incapable or unfaithful agent frequently produces difficulties, and sometimes such as end in blood. We owe it to the people of Missouri and Arkansas to complete our plan of defences of the Western frontier with all possible despatch. I have no fears of a rupture between the whites and the tribes sent to their Western border from east of the Mississippi; but strong forts should be speedily erected and well garrisoned, to prevent combinations or collisions between the emigrant tribes and the numerous tribes of the Rocky Mountains, that would bring upon us a blaze of war from the Sabine, in the Southwest, to the great Lakes of the North, and which would certainly retard, and might forever prevent us from realizing the fond hope we now entertain of seeing the Indians of the Territory become, under our protection, an enlightened civil community.

For the present, we must keep a military force near them. While they remain untamed savages it is indispensable that we keep them within hearing of a morning and evening gun, and the roll of the drum; but this should not be looked to as the permanent policy of the Government. The rod can sometimes be advantageously holden over the child in minority, but, lamentable, indeed, must be the condition of a people who can only be kept in bounds by the presence of physical force. We must strive to enlighten their minds and elevate their character by moral power, not by physical force; looking to the time when we can, without danger of harm to them, or to us, withdraw our troops from their presence; and leave them to depend on their own resources, not looking up to us to furnish them the most common necessaries of life, that are within the reach of every inhabitant of North America, of ordinary intellect, and common industry. They should be taught that, as man is a perishable being, he owes it to himself to make exertion to support his existence, not depending on the spontaneous productions of nature, or upon the exertions of others, as they have heretofore done. So long as we furnish artisans and laborers, and supply provisions, to the Indians, and continue our agents to administer to their wants, they will look up to and depend on us. It belongs to human nature to indulge listlessness when an opportunity is afforded us to do so. Necessity prompts to industry and exertion. These people have depended on our presents and annuities for half a century. We should undeceive them at once, by letting them know that, within the Indian Territory, we will supply them with artisans and laborers no longer than to the expiration of our present engagements, the last of which will terminate in 1859, twenty-one years hence, except two blacksmiths that are permanent. If we teach them division of property, labor, and the elements of Government, and protect them from foreign emissaries and invasions by the strong arm of this Government, we have good reason to look forward with the confident hope of seeing them, at no distant day, emerge from degradation, and become an independent state, and its citizens an intelligent, industrious, and happy people.

REMARKS OF MR. YELL,

OF ARKANSAS,

In the House of Representatives, April 16, 1838—In Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, on a bill reported by Mr. LINCOLN of Massachusetts, making an appropriation of money for the destruction of the new Treasury building, and for other purposes.

Mr. YELL addressed the Committee as follows:

Mr. CHAIRMAN, it was not originally my design to say one word on the merits of this bill at the present stage of its existence; but as I find that it has already elicited much debate, and the hounds are out, I may as well utter what I have to say on this occasion. I am not prepared for a set speech, and will occupy the attention of the committee for a few moments only.

I am an opponent of the bill, Mr. Chairman; and, at the very threshold, I protest against its passage. I behold in it, sir, the commencement of another scheme for a splendid and a profligate Government; a scheme for the recommencement of that system of expenditure and profligacy which distinguished other days, and rendered immortal another Administration, when we had splendid projects for a vast chain of internal improvement on the earth below and in the heavens above; a scheme for the projection and completion of "light-houses" in the skies; of beacons, buoys, and palaces, and all those fanciful projects which a versatile fancy could originate, and an administration of idolators could, if they had consulted their own wishes, have carried into execution. Mr. Chairman, the storied debut of that Administration has now become a matter of history; but, sir, it is yet recollected; and, as I opposed its existence with all my zeal, I shall now, and ever after, I trust, be found among the most strenuous of those who lend a helping hand to obliterate and destroy the baleful example which it set for the imitation of subsequent Administrations of the laws and principles of the Constitution, and the obligations of the Government. I object to this bill, and protest against its passage, for other, and, I trust, not unpatriotic reasons than that which I have already stated; I behold, sir, in this bill, a feature and a design, both of which are too palpable to escape the observation of the most reckless observer. When the preceding Administration came into power, it was pledged to carry out the principles of reform in the abuses of the Government, and retrenchment in the public expenditure. The present Administration stands pledged by ths avowals of the Executive to carry out those principles; and I, for one, Mr. Chairman, am not disposed to shrink from the performance or fulfilment of the pledges of the Administration to the people. But, sir, this bill meditates the very reverse of all our pledges. It is intended and designed for political effect: it has been conceived in a settled determination to get up a wasteful expenditure of the public funds, for the purpose of enabling the opponents of the Administration to raise the watchword of alarm, preparatory to a deafening outcry of profusion and prodigality against this Administration. I am not to be led astray by any such artifice: no gulltrap of the kind can catch me; and I appeal to any man of this Administration, to any man of the "bread and soup party," as we are called, to come forward and defeat the project of the opponents of he Administration.

Sir, I am a friend and supporter of this bread and soup party, as it has been scornfully denominated, and I am proud of the cause in which I am engaged; for it is the cause of the people, of civil liberty, and of law. I am, sir, a radical in all things, and particularly a radical in my support of the Administration. I am a foe of those who would waste the public treasure; I am a foe to all splendid schemes of Government; I go for an economical administration of the affairs of the country; and am determinedly hostile to high tariffs, quixotic expeditions to the South Seas, and hold in abhorrence all projects which have not the happiness and the interests of the people in view; nor am I to be found among those who would pamper the pride and luxurious fancy of public officers, by erecting stately edifices and palaces for them to luxuriate in at the expense of the people.

If this bill is to pass, I wish to know who is responsible for it, the Administration or its opponents; and if one hundred and fifty thousand dollars are to be wasted in destroying one building to erect another, I am anxious that my people should know who the act is to be accomplished by. Will the friends of the Administration, with retrenchment and economy on their lips, consent to an act so opposite to the sincerity of their professions?

Who, sir, will support this bill? The partisans of Mr. Van Buren and the former advocates of General Jackson? It may be, sir, that it will find the support of a few of all sides, and I shall not be surprised if gentlemen of weak nerves and timid hearts, professing to be the champions of the Administration, are found giving it their votes.

Sir, it is ever the misfortune of overgrown and successful parties to find in its ranks men who, in the hour of adversity, or in the hour when a little extraordinary thunder is supposed to be discernible in the political atmosphere, shrink from their professed fealty and political attachment, and are surely to fly for safety to the camp of the enemy. Sir, it has been the misfortune of the Administration party to have many men of this description among its numbers. Our opponents gathered in its folds old Federalists, the champions of the Hartford convention, counterfeit Democrats, National Republicans, Antimasons, and Abolitionists. They have, sir, been a kind of catch-all, or omnium gatherum; and it is from such base material, that we find skulking and dodging, when it is supposed that a cloud of danger is gathering. Thank God, the recent elections in the North and the East have nearly cleared our ranks of such materials, and I thank God for it. Let them go. We wish none of their aid—none of their assistance. In fact, sir, they were an incubus to the party, and will ever be an incubus to the party to which they may attach themselves.

There may be others, sir, professed friends of the Administration, who have, of late, been frightened to their wits ends, by the gasconade and bravado of the Whigs, who may vote for the passage of this bill. They have, of late, been told that Whiggery, as it is called, is about to take possession of the whole world. The Whigs say they have carried Maine by a majority of I know not how many thousands, Connecticut by five or six thousand, New York by thousands, and even Baltimore, where the election for a successor of the late Mr. McKim has not yet taken place, they loudly affirm has already been carried by a majority of computing thousands. They will, probably, vote for this extravagant bill. Well, sir, let them do it, and let them also quit our party if they choose. Our party has, at all times, and on all occasions, suffered much from men of this description. In its early history, it had its Judases—men professing our principles and advocating our cause, the moment they saw, or thought they saw, a little danger in the distance, [here Mr. YELL turned round and pointed to a gentleman who sat near by him,] deserted the camp, fled to the enemy, and left us—I hope forever. We wish no such men in our ranks, and I rejoice that they have taken up their quarters with our common enemy.

This bill, Mr. Chairman, if sustained at all, or if passed, must be sustained and passed by other men than those who support this Administration. It must be sustained and carried by men who are determined to get this Administration ashore, and then ask us to get it afloat by a flood of worthless bank notes and shin-plasters.

[Here Mr. YELL and Mr. WISE held an indirectly good-natured conversation, in an under tone, about banks and shin-plasters, the precise nature of which was not understood by the Reporter.]

As for this new Treasury building, Mr. Chairman, what are the objections raised against it, that call for its demolition? Why, sir, it is said that it stands in the way of the President's mansion! It is guilty of the monstrous crime of hiding the White House from the view of some gentlemen who hold seats in the other end of the Capitol. It impedes their vision, and, forsooth, they cannot see that building, for the occupancy of which their hearts palpitate, and all their aspirations are breathed by midday, and on which their dreams are based at the midnight hour. [Loud laughter and approbation.] Sir, they cannot see the Executive mansion! Indeed, they cannot behold that edifice from that end of the Capitol; and let me tell you, sir, that if they were to change their seats, and come to this end of the Capitol, they would still find themselves suffering under total obscuration of vision. The Executive mansion would not then greet their anxious eyes, and let me add, they never can behold it, for the people have already decided that they never shall occupy that edifice, for they are not worthy. [Here the House indulged in a hard fit of laughter, all sides partaking of the general humor.]

As for the new Treasury building, Mr. Chairman, it is, in my opinion, good enough for all the purposes for which it was intended, although I have never examined it, or taken any pains to procure any information that would enable me to decide on its merits. If I were to examine it, I should know nothing about it, for I know but little or nothing about the laws and rules of architecture. If, however, I should take the trouble to go into an analysis of its excellencies or defects, I should be just as wise in relation to it as the Committee on Public Buildings are; for they tell you that they know nothing, of themselves, about the matter, and have furnished a report to this House on information obtained from others. The building is good enough for all the purposes contemplated in its erection; and I protest against the waste of a large sum of money to destroy it.

Mr. Chairman, whilst gentleman stood ready to waste one hundred and fifty or three hundred thousand dollars, not to build up, but to destroy, is it not a little singular, that they refuse to vote one farthing to suppress Indian hostilities, or place the frontier in a state of defence. The whole of your frontier border is now threatened with a bloody and desolating war. The tomahawk has been ground, and the scalping knife is whetted, for the bloody action, and from the Upper Lakes to the shores of the Sabine, you hear the war cry of the infuriated savage of the forest. You are called on for money to defend the lives and property of those whom you are bound to protect, and what is your reply. The Treasury is exhausted, the prospects of the country are gloomy, you must wait a little longer; assistance cannot now be given! Sir, wait a little longer? and how long must we wait? Till your border is deluged in blood, your lands devastated, and your offspring are given to the faggot and the knife; and all this must be waited for, because politicians at the other end of the Capitol want to see the Executive mansion.

Mr. Chairman, I represent a people, who are as intelligent as they are patriotic, and as economical as they are brave and hardy. They demand a free participation in the affairs of this Union, and they stand ready to denounce prodigality and extravagance, wherever it be found. They never can be much capable of justifying the gross and un pardonable wast and abuse, which this bill, if passed, must carry in its train; and in the name of the American people, I protest against its passage; and in doing so, I appeal to the friends of this Administration in Congress, to veto a measure at once, which, if submitted to by them, will at once justify the abuse that has been heaped upon them by their foes, and seal without reflection or objection, the charge of profusion and prodigality, which has been for months rung in their ears by their foes.

Having said much more than I originally designed to say, and having trespassed on the patience and indulgence of the committee, I yield the floor, again and again most unequivocally protesting against the passage of the bill.

CUMBERLAND ROAD.

REMARKS OF MR. CAMPBELL,

OF SOUTH CAROLINA,

In the House of Representatives, April 11, 1838.—The motion of Mr. UNDERWOOD to recommit the "bill making appropriations for continuing the Cumberland road in the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, and for other purposes," to the Committee of Ways and Means, with instructions to report a bill ceding the road to the States through which it passes, being under consideration, and Mr. UNDERWOOD having addressed the House in support of it—

Mr. CAMPBELL remarked that, with the opinions he entertained, he would be wanting in his duty if he did not raise his voice in opposition to the bill now under consideration, and in support of the motion just made by the honorable gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. UNDERWOOD.] He congratulated the House and the country upon the motion, coming from the quarter it did, as indicative of a better feeling upon the subject of public expenditure, and hoped, if successful, that an eternal separation would take place between the Government and this favorite object of internal improvement.

He would ask gentlemen whether the Cumberland road is more immediately connected with the military defence or foreign commerce of the country than a thousand others that intersect it in every direction, or whether the appropriations contained in the bill under consideration are not liable to the general objections applicable to appropriations for other objects of internal improvement?

He knew that this road had a sort of prescriptive right to the patronage of the General Government: that as far back as 1806 an appropriation was made for its construction out of the two per cent. fund, reserved from the sale of public lands, for laying out and making roads to the State of Ohio, under the "act of 1802, authorizing the people in the eastern division of the territory on the northwest of the Ohio river, to form a constitution and State Government." Whether it was then supposed that this would become, what it has long since been, a charge upon the public Treasury, it is not material to inquire. We know that appropriations for its construction commenced in 1806, under the administration of Mr. Jefferson, and have continued to the present time.

If this was a Government whose constitutional powers were settled by precedents, the frequent appropriations for this road, extending through a period of more than thirty years, would be sufficient to establish the constitutionality of this bill. While, however, he protested against such a construction, he would waive its discussion, and base his opposition upon grounds of expediency.

He did not intend to condemn the policy under which this road was commenced. Arguments, at this time applicable, have, from the altered condition of the country, now lost their force. In illustration of this, he would state that the report of the committee of the Senate in 1805, recommending an appropriation to form a communication between the Ohio river and the Atlantic States, concludes with the following argument:

"Politicians have generally agreed that rivers unite the interest and promote the friendship of those who inhabit their banks, while mountains, on the contrary, tend to the estrangement of those who are separated by their intervention. In the present case, to make the crooked ways straight and the rough ways smooth, will, in effect, remove the intervening mountains, and, by facilitating the intercourse of our Western brethren with those on the Atlantic, substantially unite them in interest, which the committee believe to be the only effectual cement of union applicable to the human race."

Sir, (said Mr. C.) these objects have been accomplished. The crooked ways have been made straight, the rough ways smooth, the intervening mountains have been scaled—not by this road only, but by numerous communications that owe their existence, not to Governmental patronage, but to individual enterprise; to enterprise prompted by enlightened views of commercial advantage, and the strong stimulant arising from the hope of individual wealth.

Other arguments, applicable in 1805, have now lost their force. Formidable tribes of savages at that time hung upon the skirts of our infant settlements on the western side of the Alleghany mountains, for whose defence it may have been proper to form a communication by this road with the Atlantic border. How changed is the prospect! The magician has waived his wand, and the transitions have been as rapid as the shifting scenes of a moving panorama! Those infant settlements have sprung up into flourishing communities; the extended forest that then reposed in the deep solitude of primeval silence, is now a cultivated country, whose fields teem with fertility, whose towns and villages and cities resound with the hum of busy multitudes. Over a country, at that time unrodden, save by the foot of the untutored Indian or solitary trapper, independent States now hold sway over a population, numerous, intelligent, patriotic, brave; a population that, except on the extreme frontier, is so far from requiring defence from others, we must look to with pride and pleasure as being not only able but willing to afford effectual assistance to their Atlantic brethren should they ever be invaded by a foreign foe.

The Cumberland road is completed continuously for some distance beyond the Ohio river, and has been worked upon in different places as far west as Vandalia, in Illinois, within less than 100 miles of St. Louis, and more than 400 on the line of the road beyond the Ohio river. Mr. C. acknowledged the force of the argument that might be used in favor of appropriations to connect the different parts of the road, and thus to render what has already been expended available. But look, sir, said he, to the condition of the Treasury. The report made a few days since by the Committee of Ways and Means shows that on the first of January last, there was less than five hundred thousand dollars in the Treasury of the United States applicable to public expenditures. In the same report the estimated resources of the present year, including $7,000,000 of Treasury notes, are placed at $31,000,000. Of which $13,000,000 are estimated as the receipts from customs, and $3,000,000 from public lands; both of which resources are admitted, in the present condition of the country, to be uncertain.

Mr. C. had not, nor did he suppose that any gentleman, either in the House or out of it, possessed the data that would enable him to form a satisfactory opinion of the amount of duties that would probably be paid into the Treasury on the importation of foreign commodities; for the experience of former years will afford no criterion by which to judge of the present. It must, however, be obvious to all, that the fever of land speculation, which, nder the influence of credits easily obtained, had een stimulated almost to delirium, is rapidly subsiding, and that the purchases of the public land will for the present year be limited almost exclusively to the demand for settlements. This last demand will be diminished at the public sales, from the strong and pernicious tendency of your preemption laws to induce emigrants to seize upon the best portions of the public domain not yet brought into market. He observed some of the representatives from the new States smile incredulously at this assertion. But with the most respectful deference to those who advocated this system, he could not but think that it held out an inducement to avarice that operated unfavorably upon the morals of our pioneer population. Mr. C. wished not to be misunderstood; he made no charge against that population, whose hardy enterprise had conquered the wilderness. Among them you will not find the rude unfeeling boor, that "against the houseless stranger shuts his door," but a population as much distinguished by generous hospitality as by a love of liberty and hardy enterprise—a population which, although perhaps destitute of some of those minor advantages that a higher degree of improvement will introduce, are clearing the way for towns and villages and cultivated fields—a population whose energies have surmounted difficulties and dangers from which almost any other people would have shrunk in despair, that have conquered and are going on to conquer, that have laid and are now laying the foundation for future empires.

Mr. C. would now return to the subject from which, he said, he had somewhat digressed, and admit that the estimated receipts from the customs and the public lands were not exaggerated, and that the available means of 1838 would amount to $31,000,000. Deduct upwards of $16,000,000, not drawn from the Treasury on the 1st of January, of previous appropriations, and upwards of $2,000,000 of appropriations under permanent laws, and there remains less than $13,000,000 applicable to the appropriations of the present year. Deduct from this amount upwards of $6,000,000 for Indian hostilities, and upwards of $600,000 for the Canadian frontier, and there remains less than seven millions of dollars for the expenditures of the Government, including the civil and diplomatic list, the army, navy, fortifications, armories, the survey of the coast and harbors, the erection of light-houses, and all other expenses. It is true that the report of the committee estimates that there will be $11,000,000 of unexpended appropriations on the 1st of January, 1839, but Mr. C. contended that this did not weaken the force of the argument; for appropriations unexpended this year will remain as a tax upon the next; and the $10,000,000 Treasury notes that must be redeemed either towards the conclusion of the present, or early after the commencement of the next year, is more than equal to any temporary convenience that may be supposed to arise from the estimated unexpended balance of appropriations on the 1st of January, 1839.

We are as careless, sir, as if we were sailing under a clear sky, with propitious breezes, over a summer sea. But do you see no speck on the political horizon? It is no longer a speck; a cloud has arisen, whose dark shadow is thrown upon the prospect before us. Where is the faithful pilot? Why does he not warn us of the breakers on which, with every sail spread out to the deceitful breeze, we are madly driving? Where is the honorable chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, [Mr. CAMBRELENG,] or the chairman of the Committee of Claims, [Mr. WHITTLESEY,] those faithful guardians of the public treasure? Why do they not warn us of a national debt, as the inevitable consequence of unnecessary and extravagant appropriations?

Mr. C. warned gentlemen of the consequence of a national debt. If we contract a national debt, the "compromise act of 1832," which brought peace to a distracted country, will prove but a rope of sand to an increase of duties. Yea, more, the very next revolution of the political wheel may bring those into power, who will not hesitate to direct the duties upon importations, constitutionally imposed only as a means of raising revenue to pay the legitimate expenditures of the Government, to objects of protection.

Scenes would then return, upon which he could not look back without feelings of unutterable disgust. Protection and anti-protection would again become the watchwords of parties divided by geographical lines. Local prejudices and individual avarice would again usurp in the halls of legislation places that should be consecrated to patriotism and virtue. The clamorous importunities of partial interests would again intrude upon our deliberations, and the American Congress be again converted into an arena for the most bitter contests.

If we would avoid this, we must, if possible, avoid contracting a national debt. A debt to some extent, from the present prospects, cannot be avoided. But it is our duty to refuse all appropriations, whether constitutional or otherwise, that are not absolutely necessary to defray the expenses of the Government. No gentleman can doubt that a large national debt will inevitably lead either to an increase of the tariff, or to recalling the instalments from the States. To say nothing of the consequences (of which we have recently had bitter experience) of suddenly diverting, by an act of legislation, a large amount of money from the chanels in which it was employed, he doubted whether there would ever be found sufficient firmness in Congress to adopt the latter alternative. Even if the instalments should be recalled from the States, he doubted whether it would not prove to be calling "spirits from the vasty deep." You may, perhaps, recall them, "but will they come at your bidding?" Mr. C. intended to make no insinuation against the honor of the States, but, from the debates at the extra session upon the proposition to withhold the fourth instalment, he thought it probable that many of the States looked upon the deposites that have been made with them as legitimately their own property, and, under this impression, they will not willingly tax the industry of their citizens to comply with what they may believe to be an arbitrary and unauthorized demand.

Within the last two hours we have passed a bill containing appropriations for an exploring expedition, for the employment of naturalists, geologists, botanists, to examine the animals, soils, and plants of distant lands, subjects with which this Government has as much to do as with the "vespertilio homo," or man-bat of the moon. In such appropriations do we give evidence of our sympathies for the condition of our constituents, or afford a revelation of the calamities that await them from our legislation? Do gentlemen not see that, by unnecessary appropriations, they are sowing the seeds of bitterness between the different sections of this Union? That they are digging a mine, which, when it is filled, as it will be, with the elements of wrath, a protective tariff, and fired by the collision of separate interests, will produce an explosion that may shake our political fabric? If public opinion does not rise against unnecessary appropriations, and the voice of economy be heard in this hall, he would not say that the ruin of the country, but he would say that the oppression of the people, so far as an increase of taxes is oppression, will be the inevitable consequence.

The present is an auspicious time to commence a reduction in that system of extravagant appropriations, which certainly received a great accession during the time of a large surplus revenue, and there is no subject upon which we can with more propriety commence than the Cumberland road. It it has long been a favorite object of Government appropriations, and, if we recommit the bill, with the instructions proposed, the people will at once be convinced of our sincerity, and that they must rely, at least while the Treasury is in an embarrassed condition, upon their own energies, with the assistance of the States, to effect such objects as an enlightened view of their interests may induce them to undertake. Individual and State enterprise are, indeed, the only legitimate, safe, and economical agents that can be employed in the construction of internal improvements not immediately connected with the foreign commerce or military defence of the country.

He appealed particularly to the public spirit of those gentlemen whose constituents were more immediately interested in the passage of the bill under consideration. No distinction, no honor arising from place or power, can afford to the patriot the consolation that flows from the conscientious discharge of his duty to his country; and no gentleman can discharge his duty who, in the present condition of our finances, will vote for unnecessary appropriations. No one need implicate himself upon the constitutional question of appropriations by the General Government for objects of internal improvement, by voting for the motion to recommit the bill, with the proposed instructions. The condition of the Treasury is surely more than a sufficient excuse.

In 1830, when General Jackson placed his veto on the Maysville road bill, it was said in this hall that he had raised to his memory a more imperishable monument than when he won the glorious victory that preserved the queen of our Southern cities from the pollution of a conquering foe, and, with her safety, the honor of the country. And yet, if he was not mistaken, he heard an honorable gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MERCER] congratulate the House a few days since that more extensive appropriations by the Government for objects of internal improvement had been made since that time than during any other equal period in our history! Let gentlemen look to this.

As he had before remarked, Mr. C. did not intend to discuss the constitutional power of Congress to make appropriations for objects of internal improvement, further than to say that the great variety of opinion that existed in relation to it should, if there were no other objection, make gentlemen hesitate to pass this bill. Leaving, however, the subject of constitutionality out of the question, it must be admitted that appropriations by the General Government for objects of internal improvement are partial in their operation, tending to the benefit of particular sections at the expense of the whole, and therefore inconsistent with that equality upon which our institutions are founded. To remove this objection—to make appropriations sufficiently extensive to embrace every section of the country having, or claiming to have, objects worthy of Governmental patronage, would create a vortex of expenditure that would engulf the diamonds of Golconda and the gold of Peru—would require a revenue, the collection of which would produce a wide-spread ruin, and, after exhausting the resources of the country, would be insufficient to accomplish the object.

To advocate appropriations for the Cumberland road, upon the ground that it will enhance the value of the public lands in those States through which it passes, is almost equally inadmissible: for the same argument will apply in favor of the construction of roads into every wilderness where the Government owns land. Who can suppose that the opening of roads by the Government is necessary to attract the farmer to the virgin soil of the West? Who has not observed the tide of emigration, sweeping in its progress the population of the old States, to this land of promise? The temptations are already strong enough to induce thousands to break through those local attachments, originating in childhood, increased by the associations of their maturer years, "growing with our growth, and strengthening with our strength," until at last they entwine themselves around the affections with a power that nothing but that love of wealth that springs eternal in the human breast could sever. A human tide has for years been pouring into the new States and Territories with a rapidity unequalled in the annals of the world, since, perhaps, those immense migrations recorded in history, when whole tribes of barbarians poured in upon and settled the territories of their less warlike neighbors, sometimes bringing with them their own institutions, sometimes adopting those of the conquered race. Whole districts of country in the old States have declined in population; attracted from a soil that in any other country would be considered as yielding a bountiful reward to the cultivator, to encounter the hardships and privations preparatory to converting the wilderness into a garden. Can any one, with these facts before us, contend that additional inducements to emigration are even desirable?

Our western brethren labor under no peculiar disadvantages in relation to the means of intercommunication. They hold constant intercourse with the rest of the world, not by those majestic rivers only which, uniting their waters in the Mississippi, together pay tribute to the Gulf of Mexico, but by numerous other channels of communication which owe their existence to individual and State enterprise.

He hoped the motion to recommit would succeed: now was the time by its adoption to relieve ourselves of a work whose constitutionality is doubtful, whose benefit is partial, and appropriations for continuing which, in the present condition of the Treasury, must bring on us the reproach of reckless extravagance. Let us surrender it to the States through which it passes; if worthy of patronage, it will be continued under their auspices, sanctioned by the enlightened liberality of their citizens, and paid for by those who enjoy the advantage.

If an additional argument was necessary to show that the General Government should abandon, not only this, but all other objects of internal improvement not immediately connected with the foreign commerce or military defences of the country, that argument could be found in the large surplus recently deposited with or paid to the States.

REMARKS OF MR. ELMORE,
OF SOUTH CAROLINA,

In the House of Representatives, April 24, 1838.—The House having resumed the consideration of the motion of Mr. TOUCEY, made under the unanimous direction of the committee appointed to investigate the causes which led to the death of the late Mr. CILLEY, to print the report of that committee, and postpone it till next Monday week—

Mr. ELMORE of South Carolina addressed the House as follows:

Mr. SPEAKER: The debate which has arisen on the report in this case was unexpected to me. It began on Saturday, by a censure on the committee by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. ROBERTSON,] who objected to the printing of the reports and proceedings of the committee, and censured the committee for having transcended their powers. The precise extent or manner in which the committee had gone beyond their powers was not stated.

[Mr. ROBERTSON disclaimed any opinion that the committee had intentionally transcended their powers; they were irregular. He did not censure them in any other sense than that they had merely transcended.]

Mr. E. had understood the gentleman as acquitting the committee of any intentional violation of duty—as censuring them technically, not morally.

The gentleman from Virginia did not, when he spoke on Saturday, define the grounds on which he censured the conduct of the committee, but had subsequently been more explicit, and more limited. Other gentlemen had followed from various parts of the House, and assumed much the same positions, enlarging on them, and extending their remarks indiscriminately on all these points of objection to the whole committee. It is not a little remarkable, sir, that no investigating committee has been appointed by this House, in late years, without itself becoming the subject of attack the instant it comes to report the discharge of the duty imposed on it by the House. I do not complain of this; it may be all right, and the House may be fully sensible of the justice and propriety of thus repaying the services of their committee. But, sir, what I do complain of is, that this censure should be indiscriminate, and upon generalities; and not that merely, but generalities growing out of a state of things imagined by some gentlemen to have existed, and taken for granted by others upon no better foundation than this vague fancy. The censures of those who have thus blamed the committee as having transcended their authority, do so without having read their reports, the evidence, or their journal, and upon the erroneous assumption that the committee examined witnesses without authority, implicated members, and put them on their trial without the permission of the House, and reported resolutions for their punishment. This mode of identifying the majority and minority in an indiscriminate censure for all the proceedings of the committee, where they agreed as well as where they disagreed, places me in the awkward position of receiving reproof, although differing from the majority in that part of their proceedings which seems to create the greatest dissatisfaction, and to have called out the strongest reproof. As the House had not ordered the papers laid on your table by the committee to be read, I did not feel at liberty, in the few remarks I made yesterday, to go into particulars which would explain the fact announced in general terms, when I presented a paper to the House on the coming in of the report of the majority, stating my dissent from that report. I trust I may be indulged by the House, under these circumstances, in going somewhat further into detail than will be strictly regular, as, under the action of the House, all the papers which would give the proper explanations of the part and opinions I have sustained are kept upon your table and from the knowledge of the House, and I can in no other way make my position known.

I do not feel myself called upon to vindicate any part of the conduct of this committee beyond that point to which it had my concurrence. There was a point to which all agreed; and beyond that, there was such difference of opinion, as each division of the committee has indicated in the reports upon your table. I feel myself called on to defend nothing beyond what had my assent. The majority must take care of its own conduct, and are, I presume, prepared to do so to the best of their ability, and to them I leave that task.

It is objected that the conduct of the committee was irregular, unparliamentary, because they proceeded to examine witnesses, by which members proved to be implicated, and then proceeded to try them, without permission of the House or hearing the parties implicated, making it an ex parte proceeding.

If it was irregular and unparliamentary to examine witnesses in this investigation, and report the facts proved by them, then the House alone is responsible for it, as, by its resolutions of the 28th February, this committee was expressly ordered "to inquire into the causes that led to the death of Mr. CILLEY, and the circumstances connected therewith." But it is said that the committee should not have proceeded after "a member proved to be involved," without reporting to the House, and having its order to proceed, because the privileges of the House and the member would be violated by doing so. A rule laid down in the Manual of Mr. Jefferson is the authority relied on for this that rule is as follows:

"When a committee is charged with an inquiry, if a member prove to be involved, they cannot proceed against him, but must make a special report to the House; whereupon the member is heard in his place, or at the bar, or a special authority is given to the committee to inquire concerning him."

The Manual refers to 9 Grey's Debates of Parliament, for the case establishing this point of Parliamentary law. It is contended that this is the law of this House, adopted by the 118th rule. Sir, the question is not whether this is the law of the House, for of that there is no doubt, but what is the meaning of that law? How are you to construe it? Are you to put an arbitrary interpretation on it, or, by referring to the case out of which it sprung, to gather its true meaning and intent? Can any man doubt that it was adopted only in that sense, which every just and reasonable rule of interpretation gives it in the book from which you take it? Well, sir, before we apply that test to it, let us ask what is that interpretation which we would most naturally put upon it? It is this, sir: that if a committee, charged with some inquiry of another character, finds a member implicated, say in a fraud, as in the case of Ridge, 2 Hat. Prec. 257,* they shall not proceed against him till they have informed the House and had instructions; for this obvious reason, that the House never allows its privileges to be acted on without authority from itself to take cognizance of its privileges; a case entirely different from the present, as I will show presently. And, sir, in exact accordance with this construction are the facts in the case from 9th Grey's debates, on which this rule, or law, or decision of Parliament stands, which is now relied on for censuring the committee. The Commons, in that case, ordered a committee to examine into a case of the trial of Sir Thomas Armstrong for treason, and his execution, and to report a bill to levy an indemnity for his family out of the estates of two lawyers,† who prosecuted, and four judges who tried and unjustly condemned him. In examining into the matter, it was proved that Sir Robert Sawyer, then a member of the House, was attorney general, and had assisted in prosecuting Armstrong; the committee put his name in the bill without first reporting to the House the facts as to Sir Robert Sawyer, and the House considered this against their privilege, and recommitted the bill, with instructions to include his name in it. John Hampden, who took a prominent part in the debate, said that, if in an investigation on other matters, it "fall out" that a member is implicated, it is his privilege and the privilege of the House to have it reported to the House before he can be proceeded against. No jurisdiction over its privileges, arising, collaterally, out of an inquiry ordered by the House, on other subjects, can be obtained by a committee. But, sir, the true doctrine of privilege is, that the House has all privilege in its keeping. The privilege of the member is its privilege; and when it refers to a committee an order to inquire whether its privileges have been violated in any transaction, within the limits of that transaction the whole question of privileges has been referred by that body which has all privilege in its keeping. Such was the case here; the House expressly directed that the committee should "further inquire whether there has been, in the case alluded to, a breach of the privileges of this House, and to report thereon to the House."

This principle is too important to the justification of the minority of the committee to allow it to pass without more full examination. I have said, sir, that the privilege of the member is the privilege of the House, and in its keeping. The privilege of each member is a part of that great aggregate, the privileges of the House, and in its keeping and control; and here, sir, I speak by that same law of Parliament which is now the law of this House, and refer to the Manual, page 122, for the following rule: "The privilege of a member is the privilege of the House. If a member waive it without leave, it is a ground for punishing him, but cannot in effect waive the privilege of the House." 3 Grey, 140, 222. Again, sir, on the same page is another law of the House: "Privilege is in the power of the House, and is a restraint to the proceeding of inferior courts, but not of the House itself."—Manual 122, 2 Nelson 450, 2 Grey 399. When the House, therefore, ordered this committee "to inquire whether there has been, in the case alluded to, a breach of the privileges of this House, and to report thereon to the House," they referred the question of privilege in its broad and unqualified meaning. In the very words of your law, "the privilege of a member is the privilege of the House." In all the cases from which are drawn the rules relied on to censure the committee, I have not seen one which arose where a committee was charged to inquire into any matter or question of privilege, but in every instance they occurred where inquiries were ordered on other matters not relating to privilege, and in the examination a member proved to be involved; when, under the well-known rules of Parliament, to proceed against him, without express authority, was against the privilege of the House. Sir, when time has passed on, and the feelings of the present moment shall have left our judgments free and impartial, we will see and acknowledge the full force of this distinction.

Your resolution directed the committee to inquire whether a breach of the privileges of the House had been committed, and your laws told us the privileges of the House included the privileges of its members; and under your imperative order the committed proceeded with deliberation to execute the most painful duty which I have ever been called upon to perform; one which I solemnly protest I never could have been induced to undertake under any other than an imperative sense of the highest obligations to obey you.

† The lawyers were Burton and Graham, and the judges were Jeffreys, C. J., Sir F. Wythens, Sir Thos. Walcott, and Sir Richard Holloway. See Journal House of Commons, vol. 10, pages 137, 284, 289, 290, 298, 300, 331, 337.

I now ask, sir, how the committee could have answered to the inquiry you ordered, "whether a breach of the privileges of the House had been, in the case alluded to, committed," without examining witnesses? Did the House not understand that witnesses were to be examined, and testimony taken? If not, why, sir, were the committee empowered to send for persons and papers, the highest powers required to investigate facts? Sir, the committee were required to ascertain a fact—was there "a breach of privilege in the case alluded to?" and to enable them to do so, they were clothed with this ample power; and, sir, when they had ascertained the fact, they were further ordered not to lock it up in their own bosoms, but to report it to the House.

It is also said by some of the gentlemen who have spoken, that this proceeding was ex parte, the members implicated having no notice. This is another of those imaginary facts, which have led some gentlemen into a train of mistakes. The very first act of the committee, in beginning the examination of witnesses, was to give formal notice in writing, as its journals will show, to all the parties, that the committee authorized their attendance, and considered them entitled to confront, examine, and cross-examine every witness—a privilege which was exercised to its fullest extent. Every witness was sworn, and was examined with every form and under every sanction which could unveil truth and satisfy the parties, who were present personally, or by such persons as they choose to represent them. It is a total mistake in gentlemen who suppose it was ever the idea of the committee that the House should take this examination as final, or that it should take this testimony at all as evidence, if it decided to proceed against those implicated; it was reported because the order of the House required it, and because it was proper to show the facts.

I have examined the precedents in similar cases in both Houses of Congress; but before calling the attention of the House to them, and submitting any remarks on them, I will ask the attention of the House to some facts not heretofore brought into the discussion. You raised this committee to inquire whether a breach of your privileges had been committed in the case referred to them, and very shortly after commenced the presentation of petitions to this House, praying you to expel, by name, the members who had been concerned in that case, which you had referred to your committee. From day to day, these petitions were presented, to the number of hundreds, and you, day by day, referred them to this very committee. For what purpose, sir? Gentlemen who have favored us with learned opinions on parliamentary law can perhaps answer this question satisfactorily. One gentleman from New York [Mr. SIBLEY] said yesterday that it was always understood, when a matter was referred to a committee, that the committee was to report on it of course, and I agree with him. Sir, the majority report is in conformity to the prayer of these petitions; mine against them. But, sir, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BRIGGS] says the rule in the Manual before quoted is a rule of the House, and that a simple reference is not sufficient to give the power to the committee; but, sir, the gentleman forgets that the very first of these petitions was presented by his colleague, [Mr. ADAMS,] on the 6th of March, when it was not in the regular course of the business of the House to do so, and that to enable him to present them, and have them referred to this committee, the rules were suspended by the very vote of two thirds required by his argument.

There has been one objection made to these proceedings, sir, which I have heard with surprise. It has been said, sir, that the committee has tried the members implicated, and that against the authority of the House. When the committee were called on to act in this matter, I examined the precedents in this House and the Senate. I understood the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] yesterday to say there should have been no argument submitted in the report, and no final action recommended; that he believed there were no precedents for it in the House; in the Senate, in 1808, the case of John Smith was somewhat similar. When I was assigned this duty, sir, I looked into precedents, and the first which attracted my attention was this of John Smith. I found the report of the committee, (vol. 20, State Papers, 701,) drawn by the honorable member from Massachusetts, in that masterly style which has always characterized his pen. It is said that this committee has tried the members implicated. On comparing the proceedings of the two committees, I have not been able to see the difference in principle in their proceedings, except that in this investigation the committee kept within the rules of evidence adopted by all courts, and in that they were avowedly enlarged to the "admission of a spe ies of evi ence which in courts of criminal jurisdiction would be excluded." In John Smith's case, I find argument on law and fact, keen, pertinent, and powerful. I find also, sir, that that committee say: "The committee have never conceived themselves invested with authority to try Mr. Smith. Their charge was to report an opinion relating to the honor and privileges of the Senate, and the facts relating to the conduct of Mr. Smith. Their opinion, indeed, cannot be expressed in relation to the privilege of the Senate, without relating at the same time to Mr. Smith's right of holding a seat in this body; but in that respect the authority of the committee extends only to proposal, and not decision." Upon turning to the close of the report, I find that proposal was this resolution:

"Resolved, That John Smith, a Senator from the State of Ohio, by his participation in the conspiracy of Aaron Burr against the peace, union, and liberties of the people of the United States, has been guilty of conduct incompatible with his duty and station as a Senator of the United States. And that he be therefor, and hereby is, expelled from the Senate of the United States."

Here, sir, is the annunciation of guilt and sentence, not as a trial, but as a proposal to the Senate for its confirmation, enforced by arguments of great ability, both on law and the evidence, which that committee took.

The case of Humphrey Marshall, a Senator charged with perjury, had the examination and report of acquittal. (2d vol. Sen. Jour. 217 to 224.)

The case of Mr. Blount, a Senator from Tennessee, occurred in 1797, (2d volume Senate Journal, 383 to 392.) A copy of a letter implicating him in conduct incompatible with his duty to the country was communicated to the Senate by the President, and it was referred to a committee to report what "it is proper for the Senate to do thereon." That committee examined witnesses and reported their evidence, although not specially authorized to do so, and reported a resolution that he was "guilty of a high misdemeanor," and "that he be expelled," which was done by a vote of 25 to 1.

In this House, sir, the precedents equally show that it has been the custom to examine witnesses, submit arguments on law and fact, and recommend final action to the House. The first case is one of high sanction, Mr. Madison having been chairman of the committee. James Gunn, a Senator from Georgia, in 1796, sent a challenge by the hands of Frederick Frelinghuysen, a Senator from New Jersey, to A. Baldwin, a member of the House of Representatives from Georgia, (2d vol. Jour. H. R. 470 to 475.) The papers were laid before the House by Mr. Baldwin, and referred to a committee without any instructions whatever, and that committee took evidence, reported it a breach of privilege, but recommended to the House, as the Senators had apologized, it should proceed no further.

On the 14th January, 1800, the President communicated to the House a letter received by him from John Randolph, one of its members, complaining against certain officers of the Army or Navy for insulting him for words spoken in debate. It was referred to a committee without any instructions, and that committee, without informing the House that any question of privilege had arisen, examined witnesses, and reported that it was a question of privilege, and censured Mr. Randolph for "derogating from the rights of the House," by appealing to the Executive, and recommended that no further action should be had by the House, (3 vol. Jour. H. R. 559 to 573.) In the case of Matthew Lyon, the committee were ordered to report them, and did report for his expulsion, (3 vol. Jour. H. R. 157 to 179.) In the case of J. A. Coles, the committee examined evidence, and recommended what should be the final action of the House, (Jour. H.

R. 7 vol. p. 111; State Papers, 21 vol. p. 18 and 19.) In the case of Russel Jarvis, (Jour. 1 sess. 20 Cong. 587 to 834,) the committee recommended what should be the final action of the House. In the case of Henry G. Wheeler and Robert Codd, two Reporters who had an affray in the presence of the House, the committee appointed to inquire into the facts, examined witnesses and reported it a breach of privilege, and recommended the adoption of resolutions affirming H. G. Wheeler guilty of contempt and breach of privilege, and that he should be excluded from the Hall and imprisoned. Indeed, sir, it has been, I may say, the unvarying practice of committees of both Houses to do what is now called trying the cases referred to them, and that, too, whether they were specially empowered or authorized to report opinions and recommendations for the final action of the House, or only had a simple reference.

I have stated these precedents, because they had, on my mind, much weight and influence; and I stated in the committee, while the report was under consideration, that the current of practice seemed to be in favor of the power of the committee to recommend such action as they judged suited to the case; but that I was not prepared to yield to precedents in the face of a resolution which I thought defined our powers in a more limited sense, or, at most, did not require of us to report what ought to be the punishment; and while I did believe, and do still believe, that we were required to report all the evidence, and to report whether there was a breach of privilege, and by whom committed, with the proof and reasons for that opinion, because it was so ordered by the resolution of the House, by the same rule of construction I concluded that we were not bound to report what should be the punishment of the offence, because the resolution did not order us to do so. When, therefore, the majority and the minority both went beyond what I deemed the letter of our authority and its spirit in the discussion of testimony, or the expression of opinions upon men or subjects not connected essentially with the inquiry ordered, I dissented. I participated in no questions of opinion or conduct beyond that point.

Having these views, and differing from the majority, I have no objections to the course intimated by the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, to vote against postponement of the consideration of the report, and refer it back to the committee, with proper instructions. Upon the coming in of a report without recommendations for the course of the House, it will be disembarrassed in deciding whether to proceed or not.

SPEECH OF MR. BYNUM, OF NORTH CAROLINA.

In the House of Representatives, March 13, 1838.—On the bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year 1838; in reply to Mr. HALSTEAD, of New Jersey, on his motion to strike out the appropriation for the completion of a jet d'eau in the public grounds in front of the Capitol.

Mr. BYNUM rose, he said, to express his utter surprise and astonishment at the extraordinary speech which had just been concluded by the member from New Jersey. He was entirely at a loss for language to express the feelings he entertained for the singular and extraordinary course which that member had seen fit to pursue on that occasion. He declared that he had never before, since he had had the honor of a seat on that floor, witnessed any thing to compare with it, in many particulars. In the whole course of his legislative experience he had never witnessed any thing so unnecessary, so little called for, and so entirely inappropriate to the occasion.

The member had commenced his extraordinary remarks with a view, he said, of opposing an insignificant appropriation for a jet d'eau in the area of the Capitol. Yes, sir, the member, in discussing the appropriation for this little jet d'eau, had taken it upon himself to pour out the bitterness that had probably been generating in him for years, against those to whom he was politically opposed. Without the remotest provocation, he had made a most wanton and unjustifiable attack upon the whole Democratic party, towards whom he had used language which decency and respect for the place he occupied there should have prohibited.

The member had surely forgotten where he was, and whom he represented. He [Mr. B.] could not bring himself to believe that the language or sentiments which he had just heard delivered, were truly representative of the feelings, language, and sentiments, of the freemen of New Jersey, towards the friends of this or any other Administration. He knew such was not the course that had met or would meet the approbation of the respectable portion of that party to which the member professed himself to belong. He had no doubt that such a course would be repudiated by every high-minded man of that party, and would be by any other. He had already heard members of the party uttering expressions of disgust at such a course, at such a time and on such an occasion.

He believed it was the same member, who in a speech at the extra session had distinguished himself in a way nearly as singular and extraordinary. This member then had electrified, no doubt, as he thought, the House some hours, with the most classic quotations, from nearly, he said, from the time that he consumed in delivering them, the third of a volume of Shakspeare's plays, as much from Ovid, and the Lord knew how much of Horace; and from what other school-books he was not now prepared to say.

The member then exhibited himself as a pure classic scholar, and a worthy representative of the true "decency party," to which he believed no person objected, and the member was left unmolested in the full fruition of the honors he had achieved in this school-boy and classic exhibition and, sir, for the honor of the State, and the credit of the member himself, it would have been well for him not to have departed from those innocent classic juvenile exhibitions even here, and so long as the member had been disposed to confine himself to such innocent indulgence, he [Mr. B.] would have been the last there to have interposed, to have cast a single censure upon his course.

But what a contrast had the member from New Jersey's [Mr. HALSTED] conduct then exhibited, with that on the occasion to which he then alluded? What a stupendous fall, had all present witnessed, in the conduct of that member then and on the present occasion! Then he addressed us almost exclusively in the refined language of Shakspeare, Ovid, Virgil, Horace, and other classic poets; now, sir, the whole of the member's quotations have been made, evidently, from tippling shops, pot houses, and cros-road inns. His language and figures are with such exactness, that they bear with them almost the fume of those places.

That member, having certainly lost sight of the place he occupied, in his brilliant effusions had denounced the Democratic party as, as—Mr. Speaker, I am loath to use it—Van Jacks. What a most classic epithet! What a polite, classic, and distinguished taste it exhibits! and from what source comes it? Is it possible that the member could have learned such classic epithets at Princeton? Could he have brought them from old Nassau, at which place, perhaps, he may have been? If so, it certainly does an honor to that venerable institution, of which she will, doubtless, never be found to boast. Van Jacks!

That member surely intended such language for another place, and other ears. "He stands solitary and alone," let me say, I believe, in having the honor of being the first of his party that has ever condescended to employ that epithet for the edification of the galleries here—for, I am sure, he could not have intended it for the ears of the honorable members of this House. Epithets illy suited to the pretensions of a member of a party that professed, and have long since monopolized to themselves, all the "decency" of the country. As much as I have mingled in society for years past, I do not ever recollect to have heard the first respectable man, of either party, however zealous as a partisan, condescend to employ it in serious debate. I never have seen it but once or twice, and then employed by the lowest and dirtiest kennel presses; and certainly had never expected that a member of this House would have so far lost that respect that was due to it, as to employ it here; and the member will certainly hereafter stand so far pre-eminently distinguished above all his predecessors.

The member had used another epithet truly illustrative of his fund of classic epithets; he had denounced the Democracy as the "spoils party." This, no doubt, he has procured from another quarter, whose classic beauty had seized tenaciously on the refined fancy of the member from New Jersey. With this classic epithet, too, the member seemed to be no less pleased than with his "Van Jacks." I think I have heard him use it before, and turn it in his mouth as some precious morsel most agreeable and delicious to his classic taste. Sir, we all have our peculiar tastes, and most assuredly I shall envy not the member from New Jersey for his. "The spoils party!" What was the member and his party after, if it were not the spoils of office, as they choose to call them. They had them once, but used them in such a manner as to induce the people to take them away from them, and this seemed to be the "old grudge," from the classic remarks with which that member had honored the House to-day. The object of these catchwords the people understood, I presume, as well as the member from New Jersey, or nearly so, though they may not possess as much of his classic learning; and if the member intended them for his constituents alone, he had certainly paid a poor compliment to their intelligence and plain common sense, which had ever been so greatly undervalued by the party to which that member belonged. It was to the misappreciation of the intelligence of the plain common people throughout the country, that the invariable defeat and overthrow of that party had ever been attributable, more than to any other cause. It was the "accursed rock" upon which their political bark had so often been wrecked, and it was in the teeth of this oft-repeated lesson of experience that the member from New Jersey was still rushing ahead to repeat again the experiment. Whether he would be found more successful than those who had preceded him of his party, depended mush upon the intelligence of that particular portion of people whom the member might represent here; but unless they were far behind the times, and in the rear of their brethren in other sections, the destiny of that member is already decided. The people are often deceived by their newspapers and public speakers; but, in time, they have never failed to right themselves.

But the member from New Jersey seemed to express an "inherent horror" at the very sound of the word Democracy, as though it were something foul and loathsome to the touch, that stained the mouth that uttered it; nor was he alone in being smitten with this horror, whenever that word was announced there. Sir, what is there so horrific in the word Democracy, that should make gentlemen tremble and turn pale with scorn whenever it is mentioned here, and which they were continually in the habit of speaking of with such dread and terror? What was the true meaning of this word, Democracy? According to my reading, it is derived from the two Greek words demos, the people, and cratia, their rule, or control, and simply means the people's control, or the ruling people. The word Democracy is used, then, in contradistinction to the word Monarchy, the rule or control of one man—a monarch, a king, or tyrant—and an Aristocracy, the rule of a few men—heretofore the patricians and nobility! Sir, there is nothing in this demos cratia, this rule of the people, that is at all frightful to me, nor should there be to any but to those who would usurp their inalienable right to control, and to tyrants.

What, sir, is there then in this Democracy that seems so odious and revolting to certain gentlemen here? Is it the power of the people that they dread? Is it at the idea of their control that makes them tremble and turn pale? Or is it their judgment that they so much deprecate? Are they those that are to be expelled from "your Capitol as the ignorant servile crew," as announced by your proud bank autocrat? Gentlemen should pause and beware, lest the people understand distinctly what they mean by these bitter denunciations of their control, power, and influence in this Government. Sir, they will, and do understand it, and will apply the remedy, as soon as they are disenthralled from the influence of partizan presses, by whose representations they are so often betrayed, bewildered, and deceived, and will in due time teach all false orators the fallacy and folly of their arrogance and presumption in relying too much upon their stupidity, credulity, and ignorance. They all know, and will soon better understand, for what all this denunciation of the Democracy is intended; at whose "control" this "poisoned dart" is aimed. Sir, the word Democracy, let me tell the member, is another word for the people's rights, the people's "control," which, the oftener repeated, the oftener denounced, the more strength it will acquire with those who would be the freemen of this country. Neither his ridicule, nor the sneers and taunts of his party, can or will ever bring it into contempt or disrepute, but with those who at heart are the true enemies of freedom, and of the equal rights of freemen.

What was the true meaning of this tirade, of this ridicule, of this Jeffersonian-Jackson-Van Buren-Democracy, dwelt on with such peculiar delight by the member from New Jersey? Why connect with it his Loco Foco and Fanny Wrightism, but to bring it into disrepute? With whom? With the people themselves, and to disgust them with their own rights, with their own power, with their own control. Could this be misunderstood? What is the whole tendency of this war against the Democracy, but to lessen the claims of the people to self-government, and the character of their claims to control that Government and those that wield it? Sir, all such attacks are aimed directly, or indirectly, at the sovereign power of the people themselves. They are but covert and insidious attacks on their right to control, and of self-government, made under various delusive and deceptive pretences. Such is no new mode now, of assailing popular rights by their enemies; it is their "way," and has ever been since the first dawn of public liberty and equal rights. This Jeffersonian-Jackson-Van Buren-Democracy, that is now attempted to be held up in ridicule, and amidst sneers and scorn, may be the war-cry of future ages, to rally around the standard of Democracy the friends of freedom and equal rights upon every soil where liberty has a devotee.

Connected with these illustrious names, the character of American Democracy can never suffer disparagement by bitter, unrelenting denunciations of disappointed, broken-down, soured, Presidential aspirants, or by the accumulation of coarse and vulgar epithets that may be heaped upon them by their minions, whose daily avocation is to cater for them here.

The member from New Jersey, sir, has entertained us with a dissertation upon "dandies," and the qualities that consitutes one, and here let me say to that member, and I do it with feelings of the best kind, and in no spirit of ill-will, that he has touched upon forbidden and sacred ground. The member seems to have forgotten what has recently clothed this House in mourning, and roused to madness, with public indignation, the people from one extremity of this Republic to the other. The member seems to have forgotten, that he is responsible for what assaults he may make here against a distinguished individual; he cannot presume that any here are too ignorant to understand his insinuations against one of the first officers of the people of this country. The member is certainly grossly ignorant of the character that he has so wantonly, and without the least provocation, assailed; he must be ignorant that he is forming combustibles, that may involve this House by their explosion, in consequences far more deplorable than any which have been recently witnessed, as painful as they may have been to many. Let me say, were that individual present, against whom these extraordinary insinuations have been so unjustly made, it might require a guard of armed men to conduct the member safely to his lodgings. Sir, I am astonished at any rational man, whose conduct here would invite or justify the resort to such consequences, particularly after what has so recently happened before us. The language of the member illy comported with the dignity of that House to repeat: I will not do it in the precise language of the member; a proper respect for the House would forbid it. I understood him to say, however, to use as decorous language, as I well can, that "the Democrats had turned dandies," and that "the dandies had a great liking for dickies," and that dickies had a close affinity to darkies "or blackies."

Sir, what a classical allusion? What refined wit have we here? coming too from one of a party professing all the "decency" and decorum of the country. Were I one of that party, if never before, I should now for the first time feel humbled. I know there are some high-minded men of the party to which the member belongs! Some, sir, that would do honor to any country, and I can but feel, feel, for them on the present occasion.

Such allusions, Mr. Chairman, are unworthy of this House, and of the seat that the member occupies. Sir, he has acted, no doubt, without advisement on the present occasion with the senior members of his party, and to none but the very dregs of his own party, that from often disappointment, have become indifferent to every sense of shame and decency, can such allusions be agreeable or approved of.

Sir, I hope that such loathsome insinuations may be deemed unworthy of notice, and that they may end here; but I have my forebodings, and can but caution gentlemen against the indulgence of such a course, if they appreciate the high character of this House, the good order and peace of society.

So far from the remark being true, that the Democrats are "dandies," the exact reverse is true; and the member must know it. The Democracy are the laboring and working men in every country, and in every section of this. They are mostly of your hard-handed mechanics, laboring men of every description; manufacturers, raisers of produce of every character, planters, farmers, ploughmen of the soil, who aim to procure a livelihood by their honest industry. They are strangers to the follies of foppishness and dress, and have no faith in those that delight in such, and are consequently often ridiculed by your light-headed "dandies" and city cockneys, for the plainness of their deportment and simplicity of apparel: to call such "dandies" is a perversion of terms, bearing with it a species of intended deception, to escape the immediate detection of the most superficial observer.

Of all the artifices to which the enemies of Democracy had yet resorted for the delusion of the people, this was unquestionably one of the most shallow; it was self-contradictory, and could but recoil on those who had advanced it.

The member had forgotten, it was to be hoped, that he was addressing an American Congress. He could not seriously intend such an address for this body: I cannot for a moment believe that he did. This address was most evidently intended for his constituents at home. The member had been truly improvident in making this House the battery from which he was to discharge volleys of abuse against his political enemies at home, to the great delight and glory of his friends there. The selection of the place was truly unfortunate, in many particulars, for such exhibitions, and had ever proved so. This house was never intended as an arena for husting displays, to gull, excite, and delude the people, by a bold and reckless discharge of every species of political balderdash, to the great annoyance and obstruction of all important public business. It was a most erroneous idea, that seemed to be entertained by certain gentlemen, that they were sent here to cater and huckster for low, party purposes, and to serve their Presidential candidates. Sir, this is no part of the duties of a member of Congress. It belongs more appropriately to another place These are matters that should be settled by the people at home; placed far from the influence and excitements of Congressional intrigues. Had the member consulted some of his seniors in making this singular and extraordinary attempt, they would have told him, from sad experience, the inutility of making electioneering harangues on the floor of Congress, with a view of effecting an influence abroad. Sir, the attempt has been before made here, and has failed, and proved worse than abortive. The halls of Congress are the last places that should be converted into political and electioneering arenas, and can never be done but at the expense of the great purposes for which we are constitutionally assembled here.

It has never been attempted without inflicting a wound, either on the feelings of one party or the other, or at the great obstruction of public business, and the important interests of the country.

If such remarks are intended for home consumption, and to effect ulterior interests there, I put the question, as the member professes himself a political economist, if the time he has consumed, and which he will cause to be consumed, will not amount, in fact, to more than twice the amount of expenditure to which he has made his objection. I venture to affirm that the speech of that member has and will cost the Government more than twice the amount of the appropriation upon which it has been made.

This, then, is a specimen of the members economy in public expenditures. If, however, the true object of the member is to address the people of New Jersey from the floor of Congress, would it not be more economical to the Government to write them a circulur, as is usual amongst members, and have it published at his own expense?

Sir, it would be by far more in accordance with that rigid economy that the member has so zealously advocated, and of which I myself approve.

Had that member to pay out of his own pocket the expense for the loss of time to the Government and to the people, by his long electioneering speeches, it is much to be doubted whether we should have them as long and as frequent as the member is disposed now to afflict the House with. It is to be hoped if in future any member is disposed to address his constituents in an electioneering speech, if he is a strenuous advocate for economy, that he may do it at his own expense. He [Mr. B.] could never give his consent that the time of this House, which was intended for higher purposes, should be consumed in mere electioneering bilingsgate, for the edification and instruction of the most reckless and dissolute partisans. A wise man had said that there was a time and a place for all things, and it never was more applicable than to the present occasion. The member seemed entirely to have forgotten that any expense that he and his party might run the Government to, would be at all felt by the people, or objected to. He seemed unconscious that he and his party had concurred in and supported nearly every extravagant expenditure that had been made by the Government for the last ten years or more. He had been exceedingly unfortunate in falling upon the subject of extravagance, as it was the very subject, above every other, of which his party could have been shown to have been most guilty.

Extravagant appropriations and prodigal expenditures, it could be easily shown by the records and journals of the House, were, most of all others, the crime of the party to which the member belonged, and of which they could at all times be most easily convicted, or whenever it might be thought necessary by their opponents to convict them. Should the member in future be disposed to commence his political hustings, it were greatly to be hoped that he would select some other arena than the Hall of the House of Representatives. Such a course was too expensive to the public, and too well calculated to embarrass the public business, to the inconvenience of the great body of the community. He, therefore, hoped that the practice would not be repeated on that floor either by the member or by those who acted in concert with him there, as all could, on its first blush, see its most glaring impropriety.

But, sir, the member had, in his usual mode of pursuing a back trail after the scent had become stale and cold, in his onslaught against the measures of this Administration and the Republican party, fallen back and pounced upon the back of our old, venerable ex-President. He had showered volley after volley of abuse on the head of Gen. Jackson, and had represented him as faithless, imbecile, treacherous, and deceptive, characterised throughout by only one prominent feature, and that was ignorance. Every charge the American people had again and again impliedly pronounced unfounded, and without a shadow of justification. Sir, these charges were resurrectionary, and had long since been consigned to the tomb as thrice refuted calumnies; and it was to be regretted that any could be found who had the boldness now to repeat them? The member from New Jersey, like the honorable member over the way from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BIDDLE,] seemed never to have risen in that House to speak to any subject, however irrelevant or trivial, that the spectre of that time-honored old veteran soldier and statesman did not appear continually to haunt his disturbed imagination! And why was all this? Was there never to be an end to the malignity of a disappointed, unrelenting, defeated party? Why pursue longer an individual who has so often been tried by an inquest of his countrymen, and on every occasion been pronounced "not guilty?" Is it courageous, is it generous, is it magnanimous, to carry on this war against an individual in retirement, who has so often defeated and overwhelmed you with shame and confusion whenever you have dared to meet him before the great tribunal of his country? or is it the mere howling of the jackal after the lion has left the field of prey?

It was unnecessary to characterize the kind of courage that such a course continued to display before the eyes of a discerning public. The effects of all such attacks could only be compared to the file and the gnawing-viper. The fame of that illustrious man could not be affected by the denunciation of the whole host of malignant spirits who now embraced every occasion to riot in his absence, and glut their morbid appetites in pouring out their venom against the character and fame of one whom they can never reach; and between whom and themselves and their friends such is the distance that all comparison is lost. Sir, would it were that these gentlemen could know the immense and unmeasurable space that existed between their friends and them and the object of their hate! And why this more than mortal hatred to this distinguished and time-worn veteran? Is it because the Democratic people, in defiance of the screws and mandates from the "marble palace," have seen fit, in their wisdom, twice to honor him with the first office of the world? Does it spring from that inherent hatred that gentlemen and their party have for the power of the people to control? Does it spring from this innate hatred towards the Democracy, the idea of whose control in this Government filled them with so much horror—the enemies of popular rights?

Sir, this illustrious man is not so much to be blamed for his elevation, as the people are themselves, who alone could have effected it. Why not then speak the truth, and denounce the great body of the American cultivators of your soil, farmers, manufacturers, raisers of produce, mechanics, and laboring men of every description. These are the men who are to blame for President Jackson's election, in opposition to the power and influence of your rag and paper aristocracies, banking institutions and brokers, swindling stock jobbers, privileged corporations, &c. They were the only true antagonistical interests, that had been arrayed against each other, in the election of President Jackson. It was by this array of this latter combination, that the measures of his administration had been so violently opposed, and denounced in the most unmeasured terms; but it was by the former interest, that he had been twice triumphantly elected, and which he never had failed to devote the whole of his energies to sustain, at any and every hazard. It was for his defence of those great interests, that the Democracy had rallied to his support in every section of this Republic, and it was in the furtherance and support of those great and essential principles that that same Democracy had now rallied in the support of the principles of the present Administration.

President Van Buren stood committed in favor of the interests of the true yeomanry of the nation, which compose the producing and working classes of every community: while the opposing interests would be found, when properly examined into, to consist of the non-laboring and unproductive classes of the country, whose ingenuity had been taxed, since the first dawn of society, how to arrest from the hands of the honest laborer the profits of his industry, and of the planter and producer the fruits of their honest toil. These were the great natural divisions in the first organization of society. They were now, as then, the only true antagonistic interests that had been arrayed against each other in this country, ever since the appearance of the veto message of 1832. The influence of the Bank of the United States, and all other similar institutions had never been of a laboring or producing character, and could, consequently, have had no fellow sympathy, or identity of interest, with that class of the community. But not so with the other interests. It was the fostering and prolific parent of every species of non-laboring and unproductive influences; and it was by the aid of this great machine of modern invention, wielded by a most skilful, though a non-laboring and a non-producing interest, that the unprofitable, unproductive classes had acquired such ascendancy in many sections of this country; and should such an influence, with such interests, finally triumph in this Republic over the productive and laboring interests of the country, it would prove a calamity more deplorable and fatal to the best interests of this nation, than all the calamities combined that had ever afflicted this country, since our first settlement as a colony of vassals from the shores of Britain.

Sir, it is impossible, when this game is fairly understood, that the mechanic, manufacturer, planter, producer, and laboring man, can ever consent to place at the control and disposal of a gambling, banking, non-laboring, non-producing class, the profits of their labor, and the produce of their planting. Such a demand is as unnatural as it is illiberal and unconstitutional; a thing to which this people will never submit, except by a temporary delusion, and a diversion from their true positions in society—the arts to effect which, however, have been no less numerous than untiring. By the aid of the great capitalists of these institutions, a great portion of the public presses in every section of the country had been suborned to subserve their interest, and to promote their ambitious and aggrandising views; by the use of such, had the people been so long kept in partial ignorance of the true nature and designs of these opposing parties.

Their facilities to corrupt and establish presses were immensely greater than any that either the people of the country or their Government possessed, nor had any thing been sparing in their efforts, either by direction or indirection, in subsidizing them, wherever it had been found practicable. It was by such means that this non-productive interest had grown with such gigantic strides, and threatened to control the profits of the whole laboring and producing classes of the country, to the importance of which it was impossible that this people should any longer continue indifferent or ignorant.

But the member from New Jersey had been exceedingly unfortunate in his selection of a subject on which to pour out his vials of gall and wrath on the devoted heads of the friends of this Administration. The member had been too impatient for attack to have possessed himself of the proper "vantage grounds." It might have been well for him to have paused awhile, until he had gained the true position of the enemy, and the facts, as they existed on this subject in relation to his own friends. The member could not have been aware of the position they occupied upon the subject before the House, which had called forth his most bitter and extraordinary effusion. The member certainly could not have known that the very measure which had brought forth his very bitter and unrelenting denunciation, was concocted, and originated, and brought in, at the special request and instance of one of his own best friends. Yes, sir; this extravagant proposition—this prodigal measure—this most useless appropriation—which had been the theme of that member's bitterest reprobation, had been introduced and reported at the special request and recommendation of the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings, [Gov. LINCOLN of Massachusetts,] a member fully worthy of the place he occupies, distinguished as a member of this House, and more distinguished as one of the party to which the member from New Jersey belongs. He is no Democrat, and cannot be suspected of having any particular attachment for this Administration, or the measures it pursues. A gentleman in every sense of that word, and whose membership would do discredit to no party in this or any other country.

It had been at the request and instance of that distinguished gentleman that the measure had been proposed, that had been denounced as so monstrous, and as evidence of the extravagance of this Administration. He would not undertake to argue the propriety of that appropriation. He would not look to it It had been reported by the acquiescence of both parties, and he thought it a matter too immaterial to consume the precious time of that House on, particularly after its meeting with the almost unanimous support of both parties in the two committees. The game, he thought, too insignificant to embarrass the important business of the House in playing, though it might ultimately be found to be improper, which seemed from every species of information that had been yet given on this occasion was far otherwise. If, however, there was blame to attach to any party there for the measure, he could assure the member that it would not attach to the Administration, or to the odious Democrats. He would have to look to another quarter on which to saddle its guilt.

In the course of the member's truly singular and eccentric dissertation upon political economy, he ingeniously fortified himself by a most redeeming confession, and surely it had had much weight with him [Mr. B.] After enumerating a catalogue of abuses, and a great number of appropriations for one object or another, and that appropriations had been made for the civil list, the army, and contingent funds—an idea, by-the-by, somewhat bright to inform the House of at this late day of our history—he had declared to the House, by a most precious confession, that he was a "novice in politics," and was little acquainted with the manner and nature of those appropriations. Why, then, if a novice, had the member undertaken to play off there the instructer? It required no ghost from the dead to inform the House of his being a mere novice in legislation; nor did he think that the member himself was under any necessity of informing the House of it.

The member had expressed the greatest desire to learn why such and such appropriations were proposed, and their objects; assuming to himself at once the double capacity of teacher and scholar.

Now, if the House had to learn every gentleman every reason that had influenced it in bringing forward every measure on which it might be proper to act, it would be placed in a most embarrassing condition. It might happen that it would have but little else to do. He did not look upon it as one of the appropriate duties of that body to take upon itself the instruction of its members there. Information upon nearly every subject embraced in the bill had been called for in some shape or other, and placed on the table of every member of the House; and it could do no more: it would not, he hoped, undertake to make members read them. Every latitude had been granted (and he was glad to say by both parties) to the demands for information to be laid before the House; and if gentlemen did not acquaint themselves by that means of the nature of the business, and the reasons upon which it was carried on, he confessed he knew of no better mode by which it could be done. Besides, there was something incumbent on the members themselves. It was their duty to acquire information for themselves, both out of, as well as in, the House.

He hardly presumed that the member professed to stand in need of so much information on the subjects of legislation, while electioneering on the hustings in New Jersey; he doubted much if the member had not then professed to have known all about it. Had it been otherwise, the people of that State would hardly have taken it upon themselves to have sent a learner, "a mere novice," in legislation here, to transact their business.

The member had therefore in another way, paid a poor compliment to the intelligence and sagacity of his constituents. It had, in his judgment, ever been one of the greatest misfortunes to the people, that their representatives, after getting to Washington, learnt too much.

They were too often taught different politics here, from those they professed, when elected. It was exceedingly unfortunate that we came here to learn either our politics or morals. It was by such learning, and from such a source, that the people had been too often placed under the necessity of changing their representatives. They were too apt to learn here, very different lessons from what they had learned at home; and by this means, much of the simplicity of our republican form of Government had been departed from, and no party had ever suffered more severely by such arilling and learning here, than had the old truly Republican Democratic party of this country.

It was here that their representatives had constantly been won over by the splendor of equipage—the intrigues of distinguished leaders—the great conveniences of a great moneyed controlling institution, from the economical simplicity of a plain Democratical Government. It was against this mode of learning and instruction of members here, that he had ever protested, as being repugnant to the best interest of every constituent people of this nation. It was, in his estimation, treason to any party, that when any change was effected in the course of their representative, while here in the discharge of his duties. It was a source of much of that party rancor, that was so much to be deprecated in every community. It was but natural, that when a representative deserted the party here, that had elected him at home, that he should move heaven and earth afterwards, in search of an excuse to justify that desertion: better, far better, in his judgment, that these changes should be effected at home, in the presence of the people, whose agents we professed to be here.

Scenes of this kind had become matters of daily occurence, disreputable alike to the representative body, and the people whose want of sagacity had induced them to select a changeling, to be played off on, by every artful intriguer, and to be used up by any canting politician, who might temporarily stand in need of his services. Sir, it had been such men, after having been literally used by men of superior parts, to justify their desertions of the people's interest whom they represented, had converted mere specks of improprieties into mountains of corruption, and joined in the great chorus of alarms and panics, to divert the attention of the people from the infamy of their own desertion and treason to the great interests of their people. There was no subject to which the great body of the people should look with more intense anxie y, than to that of the desertion of their representative of the principles and interest, to carry out which he had received their suffrages. It was from such apt representatives of the Democracy, who so easily learnt things here, that they had ever had the greatest danger to apprehend, and by whom they had so often been betrayed. He trusted most sincerely that the time had well nigh arrived, when the intelligent people would brook such impositions and base betrayal of their interests, principles, and sentiments, no longer. It was firm and faithful representatives that they stood mostly in need of here. Men that could never be seduced by the blandishments of men of superior tact and design, or the overweening influence of moneyed facilities and conveniences. It is of such influences that the representatives of the people stand in the greatest dread and danger. It is against such that they have to guard with the most sleepless vigilance for the preservation of the great rights and liberties of freemen.

Again, sir, the member has characterized this as an extraordinary appropriation, with other extraordinary measures of this Administration. It is not at all wonderful that any measures of this Administration should seem extraordinary to that member, who would doubtless consider any thing extraordinary that was not of bankish or whiggish manufacture. As extraordinary as it might seem to the member, he confessed that he saw nothing of an extraordinary character about it. Instead of being an extra, he thought it the most ordinary and common-place measure; so much so, that it was about the last on which he had expected the discharge of such a combination of artillery; and from the preparation and show of which mighty onslaught, he had been strikingly reminded of an anecdote, by way of a metaphor, that had been applied in that House, in answer to some remarks that had been made over the way by his very honorable friend from New York, [Mr. CAMBRELENG,] on some former occasion, by a most distinguished and talented member from the State of Kentucky, who, he regretted, had not a seat on that floor at that time; for, whatever failures and imperfections he might have had, he made free to say, though differing with him in general politics, that there never had been a more valuable member of that House, as a vigilant, and faithful, and uncompromising guard of the disbursement of the public revenues of this country, nor a more economical legislator. He alluded to the honorable Benjamin Hardin of Kentucky. That gentleman had observed, in relation to some preparation once made by his friend over the way, which he thought could be with much more appropriateness applied on the present occasion; that he had put him in mind of a company of backwoods hunters, who had gone to the Rocky mountains, armed with the best of rifles and muskets, with a most plentiful supply of both powder and ball, to encounter the grissly bear, and the more rugged and ferocious buffalo; and who, after arriving at the spot or place of contest, had shot away the whole of their ammunition at minks and polecats, before the arrival of the noble animals for which they had gone in search.

After much preparation and parade for an attack upon the enormities of this Administration, which had increased its expenditures by millions and tens of millions of dollars, the member had let loose the whole of his artillery against a little "jet d'eau," requiring an appropriation of some three or four thousand dollars, the painting or papering of some musty mantled room in the President's house of some two or three hundred dollars, and had dwelt with great emphasis and much zeal upon the extravagant increase of expenditures for the printing of public documents. Now there might be some truth in all this, in which, if the member was right even, so diminutive was the game that he struck at, he doubted if the time he had consumed in delivering himself upon these subjects did not cost the Government more in reality than the whole amount of the appropriations here alluded to. He had been exceedingly unfortunate, however, in his allusions to the printing of public documents, though, as the member professed to be a "novice" in these matters, he was certainly in a measure excusable. For any extravagancies incurred by the legislative department, the Executive could not, by any process of justice or reason, be made responsible. The increase of the public printing of voluminous documents had been effected by both branches of Congress, and not by the Executive, as the member would have his constituents to believe; and he had now to learn, for the first time, if the members of the party to which that member belonged had not always been as forward in asking information, and demanding it, of the different departments, as those of the Administration. Had not the opposition party always been ready, when any opposition was made to many, as he supposed, of their unnecessary calls, (as he thought, which was intended more to embarrass the Administration than otherwise,) to rise up there and to accuse the friends of the Administration of a disposition to stifle inquiry, and to prevent the exposure of the truth? Let the member, though a noviciate in these matters, refer to the journals of that House, and observe the yeas and nays upon every subject of the kind.

Sir, said Mr. B. I am proud whenever I can hear gentlemen come out in favor of economy, retrenchment, and reform. Upon those subjects, he would be glad to compare notes with the member from New Jersey, or any other of his party. He would then, and there, pledge himself to go with that member, or any other, or any party, for any reduction or reform that they might bring up in good earnest, and press forward in good faith. He had ever been an advocate of economy in both private and public life, and was ever ready, on all occasions, to test his sincerity in either branch by his practice.

But in undertaking these great measures of reform and reduction, he did not believe that any thing beneficial to the public welfare could be effected by coupling with them bitter lectures, and malignant party rebukes. Such would always carry with them a greater presumptive evidence of influences of party spirit than public good, and would, therefore, contribute greatly to defeat the very object which they proposed to effect.

Again: an attempt of that kind should be directed at some great principle, or object of importance, that might effect some radical change, both in the revenues and disbursements of the public moneys of the nation.

Such were the reductions and reforms of which he was in favor; and to effect which he would pledge himself to go as far as he who went farthest. He doubted very much, whenever a bona fide proposition for reduction and reform was brought forward, whether he should have the aid and support of the very economical and zealous member from New Jersey.

He [Mr. B.] had always believed that there had ever been more collected out of the pockets of the people, than there had been any real or absolute necessity for, which had caused, more than any other one thing that came within his knowledge, an increase in the public expenditures. It had been the great and fruitful source of those liberal and prodigal appropriations that had been so much the theme of denunciation with the Opposition for years past, notwithstanding they had been almost the sole and exclusive advocates and supporters of the very means by which much, if not all, of these extravagances and prodigalities had been effected.

Sir, it was nothing less than the "protective tariff," which was the prolific mother of all these extravagances, and profuse and exorbitant appropriations, that had been indulged in for years past, connected with that notorious and prodigal system of internal improvement, which, united with the protective tariff, bore the political cognomen of the "American System." It was that American System that had given birth to every extravagant appropriation. By its effects more had been collected from the pockets of the people than there had been any necessity for; and it had been an inducement to all parties to look out for new objects for which to make appropriations, rather than to have the money to lie idle in the Treasury of the nation.

He would here ask honorable members, who had been the great champions and advocates of this prolific mother of abominations, what party did it originate with, and by what party had it been sustained?

Never had it been the doctrine of the Democracy, or the controlling people, that seemed so much of late to horrify a certain party in this House, to collect more from themselves than was absolutely necessary for the expenditures of the Government.

Stop your exorbitant levies upon the people, and exactions from the profits of their honest labor, and there could then be but little danger of extravagant appropriations. It was by this "American system" that the sluices of extravagance and prodigality had been so widely opened, and overflooded the whole country with the most profuse, and, in some instances, reckless appropriations. It had been the great fountain of almost every species of governmental corruption, since its earliest organization.

Now, I would ask, in all soberness, said he, will the member from New Jersey, or any of his associates in this indiscriminate party-war against this Administration, join me in forthwith striking down this tariff system, by which so much has been unnecessarily collected from the people, to a mere revenue standard? Is he, or his party, prepared for it? Will he, or they, pledge themselves to vote for any measure to effect it, however slightly? No, sir. No, sir: you cannot get them to touch it, and they yet live in hopes, if they ever should be restored again to power, not to diminish, but to increase, your tariff, and saddle on us again your American system—this most fruitful of all sources of prodigality, extravagance, injustice, and oppression.

By this kind of reform and reduction—that is, to strike down your tariffs immediately to be commenced, in good faith, and to arrest your extravagant system of internal improvements, which had been so effectually crippled by the last Administration—you would effect a reduction and retrenchment in truth, to the amount of millions and tens of millions annually to this Government, an object truly worthy of the time that might be consumed in its discussion, and one of the highest benefits to the great body of the people of this country.

Mr. B. asked if the member from New Jersey, or any of his party, was prepared to go this length with him in economy, reduction, and reform; if not, he would be compelled to doubt the sincerity of all their professions of economy and retrenchment, as being designed to amuse the ear only, while they were intended to deceive the heart.

This cavilling about individual appropriations of petty amounts was a penny-post business, in his judgment little worthy of serious debate in that House, when objects of so much higher moment were continually staring them in the face, and calling aloud for a reform; yet he doubted, greatly doubted, if the member would not be found among the last of that House to lend a listening ear to such a call. It never had been any part of the policy of the party to which that member belonged, to let the money of the people remain in their own pockets. Such doctrines were only to be found in the Democratic creed, but which occasionally had been seized hold of by their bitterest enemies to use for special and temporary purposes.

He was perfectly convinced that there could be no salutary reform, economy or retrenchment so long as there was more money collected from the people than the necessary wants of Government required, and we could never produce the effect without we removed the cause. Any action by Congress less than that, would effect but little, in his opinion, towards economy and retrenchment. He believed, let either party gain the control of the Government, so long as there was money hoarded in your Treasury, that there would be objects found or invented to appropriate it to. This was natural, and would be found to be a necessary consequence, from a variety of reasons, too numerous to enumerate.

That there had been, and would be in all time to come, petty defalcations and want of economy in the different functionaries of Government, and under any and every Administration, he had not the least doubt; and he would always be found as ready, without regard to party, to apply a corrective as any man, in or out of that House. But, never had he, nor would he, place the merits or demerits of any Administration upon the existence or non-existence of such petty abuses. These were subjects over which this House had control, and no Executive should be held responsible alone for such abuses. It was his duty, however, as far as his power extended, to correct them when brought within his knowledge.

If the member will recur to the yeas and nays upon all questions of appropriations in that House, he would find that his party would have but little to brag of for their votes against those that had been considered the most extravagrant; in fact, he, Mr. B. would be willing to risk the character of the friends of the Administration upon that issue. And the member would find too that there was a great difference in the facts, as recorded, and in the mere declamation used here, for political effects and party purposes.

Mr. B. would always be found willing to lend his support to the raising of any scaling committee that the member might propose, provided he would specify the objects to be reduced. None would be more ready than himself to aid any member in any measure that had for its object the reduction of the public disbursements to an economical standard. Economy, he had ever believed, was an essential feature in a Democratical Government, and one from which there should be no departure, except called for by the most urgent necessities. But it was the reverse with almost every other species of Government, which throve mostly in proportion to the excessive revenues which they could exact from the labor and produce of their people. He never had been, nor never could be, found an advocate for extravagance, either as a public man, or as a private individual; and if there was a virtue to be found in it, he confessed that he had lived to the present age without having been able to discern the first part of it. Nor would he, for a moment, remain a friend of any Administration that would, knowingly, sanction, directly or indirectly, any system of extravagance in any one of its departments or functionaries.

He was no baby, however, to be frightened from his long-cherished principles of Republicanism and Democracy, by mere cries of extravagance, emanating from upstart politicians, office-seekers, or malignant broken-down Presidential aspirants, or by the wailings of dismissed secretaries, who had long since lost the confidence of the public; by such he was neither an object to be played upon, cheated or deceived, which seemed to have been almost their sole object since their expulsion from power by the people in 1828. He knew that the charges of extravagance, when made by such, were not intended for investigation, nor for the ear of the well informed upon political subjects, but were made for political effect, to operate upon the more ignorant of mankind. Hence their universal concealment, beneath vague generalities, in the most of their charges, which, they well knew, could never lead to specific investigation. Such for years had been the character of the charges of extravagance against this and the former Republican Administration of President Jackson. He had not, himself, seen any thing new in these charges: they did not even possess the merit of novelty; and the American people, too, had but too well learnt both the character of the charges, and the sources from whence they came, for them longer even to answer the purposes of deception. The public appetite has become cloyed to sickness with these oft-repeated charges by the same sources, and they demanded proof and specification against the Administration; but they had done it in vain. The foul authors of these charges had always found shelter under their vague generalities, that embraced every body and every thing, but could be fixed on none.

But it was the known tactics of a great brag-player to boast most upon the weakest hands. It so appeared with the Opposition. They had always been loudest and most prolific in their charges of extravagance and corruption when in possession of the least proof to substantiate them; a practice with them that had been reduced to a system. They had a common shield, under which they always sought protection, and from which they seldom ever ventured very far, which always consisted in vague and indefinite generalities, too cautious ever to specify facts or to designate individuals. To such vaunting economists he had ever said, name your time, your place, your facts, your individuals, and he would go with them in any and every investigation to ferret out the truth, and to expose the delinquent; but no, that had been going rather too far for them; their purpose had been answered, by simply making the charge with a bold front. It was for political effect and deception, and not that of truth, or to remedy abuses. There had not been a single instance, where a member of the Opposition had brought forward in good faith, any measure of a reform and reduction founded on principles of economy, in which they had not been promptly met, and every means furnished to aid them in their investigations. Had gentlemen forgot what had occurred there but a few years ago with certain famous investigating committees raised by the suggestion, and at the instance of the same Opposition? Had they forgot how they had been caught, in relation to the investigation of the conduct recently of a certain Senator. These happened to be too specific to answer there purposes of abuse and calumny. When had the Administration undertaken to conceal any acts of its extravagance, or shield from exposure the corruptions of its departments or officers? Sir, never. Then why these hues and cries against it, but to deceive and impose upon the innocent and uninformed people, in which attempt, indeed, existed much of the true and real corruption with which our country had been for years so sorely afflicted. If there was corruption to be found with any body of men on earth, it was with those whose continual efforts had been for years to deceive, to excite alarm, and rouse the peaceful people of this nation against their Government, and its free Democratic Republican institutions, and to disparage the idea of a Government being successfully carried on under the control of a Democratic people.

The member had next made his objections to the members of the departments, and clerks of bureaus, taking and reading newspapers, and had exhibited much wit, no doubt, as he thought, in his description of mahogany and hickory bureaus. He knew not to what extent the practice prevailed of furnishing the departments with newspapers for their clerks. It looked to him, however, like another "Rocky Mountain hunt." The game, he thought, was too small to pay for the ammunition that it took to kill it, or the time that it had consumed to prosecute it. They were all matters that should come within the cognizance of some of the committees, and particularly that upon accounts and contingent funds. If there was any thing amiss in this respect, they should have reported it else they have been delinquent in their duty to the country; and if the member wished it, and would move it, he would vote him a committee to examine the facts and report them to the House, and forthwith apply the remedy; but he could not vote for or against any thing upon the mere prejudiced and heated assertions of political partisans of that House. No man could be safe in so doing.

If too, there had been so great a number of hickory-bureaus created for the member, and he thought them more durable than mahogany, why did he not come forward with some tangible, specific proposition that was practicable, for a committee to inquire into the propriety of dispensing with these hickory bureaus? Why content himself with these mere general charges, when he had it in his power to make a practical demonstration of his sincerity? Was it beneath these "generalities" again, that he found it most convenient to take shelter? Or was it because he thought that it would be more difficult to demolish hickory bureaus, than those of "ebony and mahogany;" and that it was necessary for him to call on the people to help him to accomplish it now? Or was it only a part of the system of his party's warfare? Would that member's constituents require nothing more from his hands, than to make mere charges of extravagance and corruption, without a single effort to prove them? If so, happy indeed might he be, who had constituents so silly and so easily satisfied. Sir, it had always been easy to make such charges: it required neither tact nor talent to do it; but the difficulty was in the proof, and it was that, that would be required by every intelligent, thinking and discerning people. All had become heartily tired of these heartless, idle charges, intended merely for excitement and deception alone. The people looked for something else. They were entitled to something more. Such a course was undervalueing their intellect, and treating with contempt their ordinary faculties of mother wit and common sense. It was the folly of children to be influenced by the repetition of charges, and the boldness of assertions without proof, and that there was something more due to the good sense of the people, than such a course to be pursued with them, by any set of men or party.

The member had again alluded to the voluminous documents that had been published by Congress, and the length of the reports of committees, and of the public officers of the Government, and would have his constituents to infer, that for this too the friends of this Administration were alone responsible. As to the committee's reports there was no doubt, and he would challenge proof to the contrary, that those emanating from his own party had ever been found as voluminous, and more so, than those made by the Democratic party; and to attempt to restrict such reports in any shape whatever, would be immediately construed into an attempt to stifle the truth, and would be without its parallel in legislative or judicial history. He believed it was the first attempt he had either read or heard of, and would undoubtedly be found as impracticable as it was novel and without a precedent.

But the reports of the officers of the Government, the Secretaries, etc. were too long, said the member. Now sir, was the like of this objection ever before known or heard of? Certainly not in this House. There could not be found any record of such a one in the whole annals of the legislation of this country. What did it amount to? Why, this House, by a resolution, calls on one of the officers of the departments for information on some particular subject: the officer of the Government complies; reports the information required to the House, in obedience to the call, and immediately objections are made to the report, not for its inaccuracy or defectiveness, but because it contains too much of the facts called for; it is too long; the author of the call did not want to hear so much of it. Now this was to his mind the most extraordinary step that had ever yet been taken by the most reckless of those who had been urged on by the wildest infuriation of party prejudice. Was it the character of this House—had it ever been—to restrict the reports of public officers? Would it not be exercising an inquisitorial censorship, known only to the despotisms of the old world, whose very existence depended on the most limited and restricted statement of facts to go before the public eye. It was one of the veriest appendages of tyranny to bolster up the despotisms of the most oppressive Governments of the world. The whole idea was not less new to him than it was revolting to every principle of liberty, and repugnant to the investigation of truth. It was worse than calling a witness into court, and then telling him how much truth he should swear to in the evidence he was about to give.

But the whole subject was too monstrous to prosecute further. The character of such a proposition was too near self-evident to require further comment or exposure.

One word more as to the "Democratia," the control of the people, or the Democracy of the country; a name which had become so offensive, and productive of the sneers of that member, and the party to which he belonged, in that House. The fickleness of the Democracy had been proverbial from the earliest history of the political world; and though the most honest had ever been the most subject to perpetual change and abuses, no party has ever been so subject to every species of abuse and imposition. There had scarcely been an instance in its history, where it had ever been overthrown or defeated, that it had not been done by the desertion and treason of professing friends. Scarcely a year had passed within the history of this Government, that did not witness striking instances of some prominent members seceding, and attempting to betray the interests of that party into the hands of its bitterest enemies. No body was ever more replete with instances of this kind, than had been the Congress of the United States for the last six or eight years.

The history of the Government did not record as many instances of desertions and betrayers of that party as had taken place here in the same length of time. At every new election that party had sent members here, who no sooner arrived than they appeared to place themselves in the market, to be bid for or won over by their more wily opponents. It was one of the curses with which that party had ever been afflicted. Men seemed now-a-days to seek the confidence of the Democratic people, but with the most wilful intent to betray them. The eye of every friend of Democracy and a free Government should be turned immediately to the correction of an evil that threatened so imminently to sap the foundation of a party who were the upholders of the only free Government on earth—a party whose great object had ever been to secure and give efficacy to the unbiassed control of a majority of the great body of the freemen of this country—and guard them against the insidious approach and allurements of aristocracy, in whatever delusive form or shape its interest might prompt it to assume.

It was a most notorious fact too, though not at all unnatural, that these deserters from the people's party, in attempting to betray the Democracy, had always become their most furious enemies immediately after their pretended conversion. It then became their interest to justify themselves with the people whom they had betrayed at home, to see or pretend to see a thousand corruptions and mal-practices in the party that they had deserted, that had hitherto escaped the most discerning of the greatest and most talented of all the most aged, experienced, and distinguished men, by whom that party had been opposed for so many years.

Yes, sir; no sooner do they desert that party and become converts to the non-laboring and non-productive interests, than they become purified and illuminated, and discover innumerable corruptions, which a long life heretofore, in the ranks of that party, had not enabled them to get even a glimpse of, and this now had become of every day's occurrence. Sir, I have said this was natural; it always would be so; it was done to cover the disgrace of their treachery, and to justify it in the eyes of those whose interests and honor they had betrayed. It was time that the sense of the Democracy and the people should be aroused to this monstrous and preposterous conduct of their Representatives here. Such men had caused much of that party rancor and malignance which had for so many years disturbed our country, and kept up continually the bitterest animosity amongst the people in every section of the nation, and which made every Government, and every Administration, that depended upon such, subject to continual fluctuations, changes, and convulsions. But he would pursue that subject no further, as being impertinent somewhat to the occasion, to which he had been led by the course of the extraordinary remarks made by the member from New Jersey.

One word more to that member, and I shall have done; to whom I would say, the many bitter, petty items that have so much engrossed his magnificent attention, and furnished such a fruitful theme for the venting of malice against those whom he can never reach, could have all been remedied with the greatest ease, by simply calling the attention of the appropriate committees to these subjects, and that on Accounts particularly, that have the most of these subjects especially under their charge, either by instructions to those committees or otherwise, to examine them and report the facts, or apply whatever remedy which might, in their wisdom or that of the House, appear best. Sir, this was the true practical mode of getting at the subject, if gentlemen were sincere in their professions in favor of reduction and reform. Let them pursue such a course, and he was ready to go with them, and they would be sustained by the Democracy of that House; but this they did not wish, and preferred making general, indefinite charges for electioneering purposes, and spurning every specific investigation, that could terminate only in any practical benefit to the people.

As to the character of the assaults that have been made upon the distinguished individuals, he would be permitted to say, what he in the utmost sincerity of his heart regretted to say, from his earliest associations, that New Jersey, one of these United States, in the classic language that the member had used towards a distinguished individual of another body, "stood solitary and alone," in having sent to the Congress of the American people, the first two representatives, (and they were as yet alone,) so remarkable for their decency, courtesy, good breeding, and classic learning, as to have pronounced in their places vulgarly—one in the Senate, that the President elected by the American people, a man who had literally filled the measure of his country's honor, worn down in the service of that country, and grown grey in the arduous discharge of the duties thereof, "a ruthless liar and scoundrel," or words to that effect; and the other here in his place, in the presence of the American people, had just declared, in the filthy language of the kennel presses of his party, that the Vice President of your country, elevated to the eminent station he now occupies, with so much credit to himself and satisfaction to the public, by the great Democracy of this nation, had certain "affinities to darkies," or a negro: language, sir, that is alike insulting to this House, to the nation, and to the whole Democracy of this country. Under such circumstances, sir, were I but an humble citizen of that State which had the distinguished honor of having sent such distinguished representatives to this body, and were told that they had been the first and only two that had so far forgot what was due to their stations, and to the moral sense of this nation, as to have used such epithets in their places here towards so high and meritorious public servants of their country, my face would crimson with shame and confusion at the mention of the name of my State.

RESURRECTION NOTES.

REMARKS OF MR. NILES,

OF CONNECTICUT.

In Senate, Thursday, April 19, 1838.—Upon the bill to prevent the issuing and circulation of the bills, notes and securities of corporations created by Congress which have expired.

Mr. NILES said he did not rise to go into any general discussion of the subject before the Senate, but to notice a remark of the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. PRENTISS,] and to submit very briefly the views he took of the power of Congress to pass this bill. The Senator from Vermont has made a statement of the facts in regard to the putting off, and circulating the notes of the late Bank of the United States: he says they are issued by the officers of the Pennsylvania Bank of the United States at their counter, in the same manner that they are put off by other banks; that the officers do not act or pretend to act as the trustees or agents of the late Bank of the United States, but as officers of the present bank; that there is no ground therefore to charge them with a breach of trust, or an abuse of the authority of the United States, and then asks how this Government can take cognizance of their acts. In reply to this, sir, I have only to say, that it is not necessary to consider the case stated, or to decide upon it. It is not a case that comes within the provisions of the bill before us. The remarks of the Senator are not against the bill; they have nothing to do with it; they only go to show that a case which exists, or which he supposes to exist, does not come within the provisions of the act we propose to pass. Such considerations are of no importance, unless it is to show that the law is not broad enough to reach the evil. If the Senator means that abuses may prevail in relation to the notes of the late Bank of the United States, which the bill, should it become a law, would not reach, I shall not differ with him. Does the gentleman fear that the bill will not reach Mr. Biddle? that he may be able to evade it? Mr. N. had himself fears that such might be the case, and was inclined to believe that it ought to have been more comprehensive in its scope. That, however, is not the question which has been raised, as the objection is, that the bill goes beyond the proper limits of our power. The remarks of the Senator from Vermont would be more suitable before a judicial tribunal, as they are rather calculated to show that the conduct of the officers of the present Bank of the United States, as he understands it, will not come within the provisions of the act, than to prove that Congress has no power to pass it. The Senator states a case clearly not embraced by the bill, and then attempts to prove that Congress has no jurisdiction over such case. This is the way gentlemen reason, and endeavor to prove that we have no power to pass this bill; if they can state cases which are beyond our power, that will not prove that those which are within the purview of the bill, are not subject to our jurisdiction.

The question regarding the power of Congress cannot properly be considered with reference to any particular case, real or suppositious, but by reference to the provisions of the bill. We must see who, and what acts, it is that we propose to punish, by penal enactments, before the question of our jurisdiction can be fairly raised. On whom is this bill to operate? It is not on those who may have in their possession the bills or notes of the late Bank of the United States, nor even on those who may have the property or assets of that institution in their hands. Another, and a very important fact is required, which is, that the person having such property in his possession, must be the agent or trustee of the expired corporation, and possess the assets thereof, for the purpose of paying the debts of that institution. The bill, therefore, by its express terms, is confined to persons who possess the property of the late Bank of the United States for a particular purpose, who assume to act for and in behalf of that institution, and who violate the trust which they have undertaken to perform.

What, then, is the object of the law it is proposed to pass; and what are the means by which that object is to be effected? If either are beyond the jurisdiction of Congress, it must be conceded that the bill cannot be sustained. The object of the law is to compel the winding up and final settlement of the concerns of the Bank of the United States, or any other corporation established by Congress; and this is to be effected by affixing a penalty and punishment to such acts of the agents of any such corporation as constitute a gross abuse of the powers conferred on the institution, and of the authority of this Government. Can there be any doubt that the Legislature which creates a corporation, possesses the authority to see to the winding up of its concerns, and to compel this to be done by pains and penalties, if it shall be found necessary?

Mr. N. said he was considering the question, without reference to the opinions of those, of whom he was one, who do not believe that Congress has any power to incorporate a bank: he should notice that objection before he closed his remarks. Congress established the Bank of the United States, and conferred on the corporation certain powers, which was really a delegation of a part of its own powers: it by the same act created certain rights, which had no existence, independent of the act of Congress. These rights were not natural rights, and pre-existing, but were entirely artificial, and derived their existence from the exercise of the sovereign power of this Government. The act created certain rights in the corporation, certain rights in the United States, and certain rights in individuals, who might become creditors of the corporation. Having created these rights, Congress must have the power, and it must be its duty, to protect and defend them: it must protect the rights of the corporation, the rights of the United States, and the rights of individuals springing from the corporation. To deny this power, would be to maintain the absurdity that Congress could create rights and interests which it had not power to defend, and which could not be protected by the States. The States can have no cognizance of corporate rights originating from Congress. No one, he thought, would maintain a proposition so unreasonable and inconsistent.

That Congress has the power, and that it is its duty, to protect the rights of the corporation and of individuals, originating from it, during the existence of the charter of the bank, no one will perhaps deny. And it is equally clear that, during the life of the corporation, Congress has the power, and that it is its duty, to supervise the acts of the corporation, and see that it does not abuse its powers, to the injury of the United States or of individuals. And hence it is that there was a provision in the charter for the appointment of a committee, by either house of Congress, to inspect the books, and examine into the proceedings of the corporation, to determine whether its acts were in conformity to its charter, and in case such committee should report that the charter had been violated, it was made the duty of Congress to direct the issuing of a scire facias, to vacate and set aside the charter of the bank. In case also the President believed that the charter had been violated, it was his duty to order a scire facias to be issued against the corporation. These provisions in the very law which created the institution, rest on the principle that it is competent and proper for Congress to watch over the corporation, to see that it does not abuse the powers conferred upon it, and to guard the rights of the United States and of individuals. It is on the same principle that the charter contains a provision making it felony, and punishable by confinement at hard labor, to counterfeit the notes of the bank; deriving which, their existence from the authority of this Government, Congress must have the power to protect them, and to protect the public; against an abuse of its own authority. There is no provision in the Constitution expressly conferring on Congress the power to punish counterfeiting, except of the current coin or the public securities of the United States. But if it has power to establish a bank, and to give legal validity to a paper currency, it must possess, as a part of that power, the right to protect the same, and to do this by penal enactments, if deemed necessary. These principles do not seem to be denied, so far as respects the period for which the bank was created, but it is claimed that when the term has expired, the authority of Congress must cease. This cannot be, because both the power and the duty of this Government extend to the final settlement and winding up of the concerns of the corporation. The act of incorporation is regarded as a contract, and it is an essential part of that contract that all the concerns of the corporation shall be settled and closed, and the rights which originated from it become extinguished. When there are no rights remaining, either of the corporation, of the United States, or of individuals, which were created or originated from the authority of the act establishing the bank, then the jurisdiction of Congress will be at an end, because there will be nothing on which it can operate.

The twenty-first section of the act of incorporation provides, "that, notwithstanding the expiration of the term for which the said corporation is created, it shall be lawful to use the corporate name, style and capacity, for the purpose of suits for the final settlement and liquidation of the affairs and accounts of the corporation, and for the sale and disposition of their estate, real, personal and mixed, but not for any other purpose, or in any other manner whatsoever, nor for a period exceeding two years after the expiration of the said term of incorporation."

Upon the face of the act it thus appears that the corporation did not cease to exist at the expiration of the term for which it was created. Its powers of doing business ceased, but it had a legal existence for the purpose of winding up its concerns. This provision in the charter makes it the duty of the bank to collect and pay its debts within two years after the expiration of the charter, and this is a part of the contract obligatory on the corporation. If this has not been done it is a direct violation of the contract. And is it not as clearly within the power of Congress, and as much its duty, to see that this part of the contract is not violated as any other? The bill before us is designed only to enforce the obligation expressly created by the charter; it is not creating a new obligation, but only enforcing one which has always existed. The original act imposed a duty on the corporation, but contained no penalty or sanction to enforce it. We now propose to add a penalty to a gross breach of trust. That this penalty could have been attached to the act of incorporation will hardly be denied. And if it could have been done then, cannot Congress do it now? A violation of the charter, and an abuse of the authority of this Government, involving a fraud on the law and on the public, are acts which Congress must have the power to restrain, and to do it by penal enactments. This was, in part, provided for in the original charter; but, if further legislation is found necessary, either to protect the rights of the corporation, or the United States, or the public, it can be supplied at any time afterwards.

Supposing there had been no provision in the charter against counterfeiting the notes of the bank, could not Congress, at a subsequent period, have passed an act for that purpose? Would this be claimed to be an interference with the contract, and either enlarging or diminishing the powers of the corporation? And upon what principle could this be done? Certainly upon no other than that Congress possessed general jurisdiction over the subject; that, having created the corporation and authorized the issuing of its notes, it must have the power to protect the corporation and the public against a fraud practised upon both. And will it be contended that Congress has power to restrain and punish frauds, by individuals, against the corporation, and not to prohibit and punish frauds committed by the corporation to the injury of the public?

It will hardly be denied that during the two years Congress had power over the corporation, and could have restrained and punished frauds against the institution, or frauds committed by its agents against the public. It could also have punished any gross abuse of the powers conferred on the corporation. But it is said that when the two years expired the corporation was entirely extinct, and that Congress could have no further jurisdiction over the subject. If the institution was entirely extinct, then it would be true that the jurisdiction of Congress would be at an end, because there would be nothing on which it could operate. But the corporation would not be extinct until it had fully and completely executed its trust; and this could not be done until its debts were collected and paid, its property disposed of, and its affairs finally settled. Suppose the agents of the corporation entirely neglected, during the two years following ing the 4th of March, 1836, to take any steps to close its concerns, neither collected its dues or paid its debts, or disposed of its property: what would be the consequence? The corporation could not be sued; and would the creditors be remediless? And if the corporation was entirely extinct, to whom would the property belong? Sir, it is apparent that the institution cannot be regarded as entirely extinct by the mere expiration of the term for which it was created. That only suspends the exercise of its powers, yet it may exist in contemplation of law. By its charter, the Bank of the United States was authorized to exercise its full functions for twenty years; after that period, it was allowed two years to exercise certain of its functions for closing up its concerns. But if its affairs were not closed, by a gross neglect or a fraudulent non-user of its powers, can it be said that the jurisdiction of Congress over the subject is gone? Can it be said that the institution is extinct whilst all its assets, its contracts, debts, credits, all remain? Certainly not, as this would be to expose the stockholders, creditors, and all any way interested in the institution, to the grossest injustice and fraud. It would leave them without remedy.

In such a state of things the functions of the corporation would be suspended, but they might be revived, or Congress might appoint trustees to take possession of the assets of the bank and close its concerns, and could punish the agents of the institution who had its assets in their hands for refusing to deliver them over to trustees. During the present session we have passed an act to extend some of the functions of the bank, to enable it to maintain suits and to be sued. We have, therefore, expressly recognised the corporation as being still in existence, so far as it regards the winding up of its concerns.

Suppose, that under the provisions of the charter to which he had referred, a scire facias had been issued, and the charter, during the twenty years, had been adjudged to be forfeited, and had been annulled and set aside, how would its concerns have been settled? There is no provision in the charter, no power conferred on the Federal courts, to proceed any further than to adjudge the charter forfeited, and to annul it. Would it not have been competent for Congress to have passed a law providing for closing its concerns? and could it not have punished any fraudulent act of any agent of the corporation, who should convert the property, or expose the public to injury by issuing the notes, or exercising any of the powers of the corporation, after it had been adjudged to be void, and had been annulled?

Sir, the power of Congress attempted to be maintained is exercised by all the State Legislatures. They all punish frauds committed by the officers and agents of banks during the existence of their charters, and provide for closing their affairs after their charters expire or are forfeited. In some of the States, this power is conferred upon the courts, which are authorized to grant injunctions, to appoint trustees, and to superintend the final winding up of their affairs. But the authority of the courts is derived from the Legislature, which must possess jurisdiction over the whole subject, and can exercise it as it thinks most expedient. In the view he had taken of the subject, his argument proceeded on the ground that Congress possessed the power to establish a bank; and if such power existed, it could not be denied that it was as full and complete a power as that possessed by the States. There is no limitation in the Constitution; and if the power to create a corporation exists, it must embrace the power to protect it, and to protect the rights of others from being injured by an abuse of its franchise, and the power to enforce the settlement and winding up of its concerns.

But, Mr. President, the principal difficulty in the case remains to be considered, which arises from a doubt or denial of the power of Congress to have established the bank. Those who do not admit this power—and he was one of the number—seem to suppose that an unconstitutional law cannot give Congress any jurisdiction over the subject to which that law relates, no more than though the law had never been passed. This, as an abstract proposition, is no doubt correct; a law which is unconstitutional, which is void and a mere nullity, can certainly confer no power on Congress, and it can create no rights in a corporation or in individuals. The ground on which he had endeavored to maintain the jurisdiction of Congress was, that the rights of the corporation, and of individuals growing out of it, were created by Congress; that they had no existence independent of its authority; and that having created them, it must have the power to protect them; and having conferred certain powers on the corporation, Congress must possess the authority to see that they were not abused, and to protect individuals against such abuse. The jurisdiction of Congress, therefore, is derived from the existence of rights which have originated from its authority, and which no other authority is competent to maintain or protect. If an act of Congress, therefore, is unconstitutional and void, so as to create no rights, either in the corporation, the United States, or individuals, it is clear that it could in no way impart any jurisdiction, either to Congress or the Federal courts, over the subject matter of such law. If no rights were created, if none exist by our authority, then there are none to protect, and no subject matter on which to exercise our jurisdiction. An unconstitutional law, in strictness of language, is a solecism; it is no law; it is a mere nullity, or an attempt, on the part of Congress, to pass a law. Such an act might be repealed, because the repeal of a law is not the exercise of jurisdiction derived from the act repealed; it is only undoing what has been done, or what has been attempted to be done.

The true question, Mr. N. said, when doubts exist as to the constitutionality of a former law, he considered to be this: whether the law had had any legal operation—whether rights had been created by it? In the latter case, he did not see how it could be treated as an unconstitutional act, as such a law could produce no results, could create no rights, and there would be no interests originating from it requiring subsequent action on the part of Congress. But a law which had been executed, and which, by the competent authorities at the time, had been adjudged valid and within the Constitution, which had created private rights and interests, must be regarded as a constitutional law, so far as respects the rights originating from it, and which it had become the duty of Congress to protect. The law having gone into operation, and been decided to be valid, a subsequent Congress, which might regard it as having been passed by a stretch of power, cannot undo what has been done; they cannot abandon the rights which have been created by the authority of this Government. The rights of the corporation, of the United States, and of individuals, being in existence, and by the act of Congress, it becomes our duty to protect them. We cannot annihilate the rights of this corporation, or of individuals springing from it, if it would be just to do so; and the fact of the existence of rights created by this Government, and sustained by the judicial branch of it, gives Congress the power, and imposes on it the duty, to protect those rights. All that can be claimed is, that the exercise of a power not within the Constitution, although decided to be a constitutional act by the competent authorities at the time, shall not interpolate new powers into the Constitution; that the Constitution cannot be enlarged, and its provisions extended, by such stretch of power; and when the question again arises, it is to be decided in the same manner as though the power had never been exercised.

A contrary doctrine would lead to the most serious and absurd results. To consider the charter of the Bank of the United States, after it has been executed and adjudged to be valid by the competent authorities, as a mere nullity, and giving Congress no jurisdiction over the rights and interests originating from the execution of the act, would be not only to abandon the rights of the corporation, and of individuals, which come into existence from the authority of Congress, but also to abandon all the interests of the United States growing out of said corporation. We must consider the whole that has been done as a nullity, and not only abandon all jurisdiction, but all rights of property, originating from the connection of the Federal Government with the corporation. We must refund the bonus of a million and a half of dollars, and give up the bonds we hold for our stock in the expired corporation. It will not do to insist on our own rights, arising under an act of Congress, and abandon the rights of others, on the ground that the act was unconstitutional and void. The act having been executed, Congress must regard it as valid, so far as respects the rights which have existed, or which may now exist under it, and must exercise the jurisdiction necessary to protect such rights, in the same manner and to the same extent as though no doubts existed as to the constitutionality of the original act.

Mr. N. said he could not understand how it was that the opponents of this bill could entertain doubts of the power of Congress to pass it. They were not the men to be scrupulous on questions of constitutional power. They do not doubt the power of Congress to establish the bank; and can they deny its power to put an end to its existence? Objections of this kind come with an ill grace from that quarter. Those who admit the power of Congress to create and regulate the currency in the broadest sense, could not, Mr. N. thought, consistently, doubt its power to punish a fraud in relation to a currency which derived its existence from the authority of Congress. Do they hold that Congress has power to create and give validity to a currency, but not not to withdraw that authority? If we can create, can we not destroy? He did not exactly understand the source of the remarkable scruples of gentlemen, who were not often troubled in that way; but he presumed they did not proceed from any special regard for the corporation, or the persons who might be affected by this bill.

If this view of the subject is correct, what doubt can there be as to the power of Congress to pass this bill? It is simply a question whether we have power to compel the final settlement and winding up of the concerns of a corporation which we have created. This is the only object of the bill. It is true, it proposes to do this by punishing the agents of the corporation for a breach of trust, and a gross abuse of the authority of this Government; for exercising the functions of the corporation, after they have expired, and in direct violation of the charter. But it is said we can have no criminal jurisdiction. If we have jurisdiction over the subject at all, we can exercise it by penal enactments, as well as by civil provisions. The question is, whether we have jurisdiction over the subject? Whether we have the right to compel the closing up of the concerns of the expired corporation, and to inhibit the exercise of its functions, after its charter has expired? If we can do this by civil regulations, we can by criminal enactments. As regards the criminal character of the bill, that is not a question of power, but of propriety, and depends on the nature of the act which is to be punished.

And what is that act? It is the reissuing and circulating the dead notes of the defunct corporation. Whether these notes have any validity, whether the late Bank of the United States, or the present bank, incorporated by Pennsylvania, is bound to pay them or not, are questions he did not propose to investigate. There may be a claim against the late bank, so far as it has assets, but it cannot be prosecuted in the usual way, as that corporation is not liable to be sued; and the present bank, having received these notes as a trustee of the expired bank, may be liable on the ground of a breach of trust; but the notes prohibited from being reissued are not the notes of that bank, and no suit at law can be maintained against it. If there is any remedy against either corporation, it must be by a proceeding in chancery, which would be dilatory and expensive, so that the holders of the notes would hardly think of having recourse to such a remedy, and of engaging in litigation with a powerful corporation. If there is any legal or equitable remedy, it is not one which can be made available for any practicable purpose. The public, then, have no security for the payment of these notes except the will and pleasure of the Pennsylvania Bank of the United States. These notes have no legal validity, and carry with them no legal obligation. They purport to be notes issued by the late Bank of the United States, and to be binding on that institution. But they are no such thing. If originally issued by that bank, they have been received back and paid by it, and have since been reissued by the present Bank of the United States, who came into possession of them as the trustee and agent of the expired bank. Such reissuing of them is clearly an unlawful act, and manifestly a violation of the charter of the original bank, as that charter required that its concerns should be finally closed within two years from the 4th of March, 1836, and during the two years it was not authorized to issue its notes. It is also a violation of the charter of the Pennsylvania Bank. The reissuing of these notes, then, is indisputably an unlawful act; and it is not only unlawful, but a palpable fraud—a fraud upon the law, and upon the public. Is not the putting into circulation a spurious and illegal currency a base fraud? Admitting that there may be some validity in these notes, or some liability on the part of one or the other of these institutions, still they are not what they purport to be, and consequently are false, deceptive, and fraudulent.

The notes of the Bank of the United States were designed for a general currency, and were required to be paid on presentment in specie; and to counterfeit them, was made felony; this high punishment was inflicted for the purpose of preserving the purity of this currency, and guarding the public against fraud.

But what is the difference between counterfeit notes of the Bank of the United States, and the dead and spurious notes of the same bank. The last as well as the first are illegal, false, and fraudulent. The only difference is that the fraud in the one case is greater than in the other: the first are entirely worthless; the other may have some value: the counterfeit notes created no obligation on the bank; the dead notes may not be entirely void; they are worth something, there may be a liability some where to pay them, in whole or in part; but neither the expired bank which originally issued them, nor the present bank which has reissued them, will pay them on presentment, or is liable to a suit on the promise which appears on the face of the note. If the holder has any remedy, it is entirely different from what the notes purport on their face; it is a remedy which is too troublesome and expensive to be pursued; so that whether the holder of these notes will receive any thing for them or not, depends entirely on the will and pleasure of the party which has wrongfully put them into circulation.

The act which this bill is designed to restrain and punish, is not only illegal and fraudulent, but is an offence very similar to that of knowingly circulating counterfeited bank notes or coin. Is it not perfectly proper then, that it should be treated as a crime, and punished as such?

But it is said that we are punishing the officers or agents of a State institution over which we have no control; that if their conduct deserves punishment, it is a matter which belonges to the State which incorporated it. This is a mistake. The bill has no reference to the Pennsylvania Bank of the United States, or any of its officers. It is confined to the officers, agents, or trustees of the late

Bank of the United States, or other persons who may have the property of that bank in their possession, for the purpose of paying the debts of the same.

If the president or other officers of the Pennsylvania bank are in this situation—if they have become the assignees or trustees of the Bank of the United States, and have its assets in their hands for the purpose of discharging the debts of the expired corporation, and shall, in violation of their trust, reissue the notes of the original bank, to be circulated as money, they will be liable to punishment under this law, not, however, as officers or agents of the Pennsylvania bank, but as trustees of the Bank of the United States; or as individuals possessing the property or effects of that bank, and whose duty it is to collect and pay its debts. They will be liable to punishment for illegally and fraudulently putting into circulation the dead notes of that institution which no one is legally bound to pay. Having accepted the trust, to collect and pay the debts of the Bank of the United States, it was their duty to cancel its notes when paid. But, instead of this, they have been reissued, in violation of their trust, in violation of the original charter, and in contempt of the authority of the United States. These dead and illegal notes are now in circulation to the amount of more than six millions of dollars. These notes are issued on the authority of the United States, when that authority has long since ceased.

The country has thus been flooded by an illegal, spurious currency, purporting to be issued on the authority of the United States, and to be payable by a corporation which has expired, and in which the United States was a large stockholder. Can any conduct be conceived more reprehensible, and that calls more strongly for severe penal enactments? Because this breach of trust, and illegal conduct, proceeds from persons who are officers of a State corporation, is that any reason why we cannot punish them? It is not for their acts as officers of a State corporation that they are to be punished, but as agents and trustees of a corporation created by Congress, whose property they possess, and attempt to exercise the powers of such corporation after its charter has expired, and in direct violation of the same, which required that its concerns should be closed and wound up within two years after the expiration of the period of its existence.

Believing that there is no doubt as to our jurisdiction over the subject, and regarding the offence of putting into circulation a large amount of illegal and spurious notes, as a fraud upon the law, and a fraud upon the public, he regarded it as a case in which Congress was called upon by the strongest considerations, to put a stop to such dishonest practices, carried on by a gross abuse of its own authority.

RESURRECTION NOTES.

REMARKS OF MR. CLAY,

OF ALABAMA,

In Senate, Friday, April 20, 1838—Upon the bill to prevent the issuing and circulation of the bills, notes and securities of corporations created by Congress which have expired.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama said he thought it had been well remarked, that the principal difficulty upon the bill under consideration arose from the idea that it was intended to apply specially and exclusively to the late Bank of the United States. Gentlemen on the other side, he said, had argued as if it were intended to operate solely upon Mr. Biddle. Now, it ought to be recollected, said Mr. C. that, in its terms and provisions, it embraces all banks which have been chartered by Congress. It is intended to prohibit the reissue of the bills of any bank, which has had its existence in an act of Congress, after the expiration of the time limited by the charter, whether that period has already, or may hereafter expire. Nor, said Mr. C. does the bill operate, or purport to act, upon the Pennsylvania Bank of the United States, nor upon any other existing corporation. Its effects are confined to the agents constituted by ourselves, or their sub-agents and trustees. It is intended to restrain them from violations of the law, enacted for their government, and the protection of the rights of other citizens generally. Whether the law, if passed, would operate on Mr. Biddle, Mr. C. said was a judicial question; let the proper tribunal decide.

Sir, said Mr. C. I agree with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. PRESTON] that we have ceased to be a stockholder, and that our having been a stockholder gives us no power; nor is the bill predicated upon any such idea. It is founded upon our supposed right and duty to enforce the limitations imposed by our ourselves upon those to whom we may have granted the great privilege of banking, and who, by the very acceptance of their charters, assented to be bound by those restrictions.

The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. PRESTON] said Mr. C. asks us if the reissuing the bills of the late Bank of the United States is an offence. And has it become a question whether a violation of law by the officers or agents of that institution constitutes an offence? The charter declares that, after the expiration of twenty years, "it shall be lawful to use the corporate name, style, and capacity for the purpose of suits for the final settlement and liquidation of the affairs and accounts of the corporation, and for the sale and disposition of their estate, real, personal, and mixed, but not for any other purpose, or in any other manner, whatsoever, nor for a period exceeding two years after the expiration of the said term of incorporation." Thus it expressly prohibits the reissue of the bills, by confining the power of its officers, after the expiration of the charter, to "the final settlement and liquidation of the affairs and accounts of the corporation." Even if we had no power to grant the charter, it by no means follows that we cannot restrain them from doing what it professed to authorize, if those things in their nature involve the responsibility or credit of the Government. Again: the Senator inquires where we get the power to punish the acts made unlawful by the bill. Sir, said Mr. C. my answer is ready; my mind is fully and conclusively made up: I derive the power to punish in the cases contemplated from the same source whence I derive the power to punish other crimes against the Government, and injurious to the welfare of our citizens—I derive it from the Constitution.

Mr. C. said he believed no Senator had objected to the passage of the bill on any other ground than its supposed unconstitutionality. There were, he said, a number of banks in this District, which had been chartered by Congress, whose charters no doubt all contained the usual provision, that after they had severally expired, no business should be done under their authority than to wind up and settle their affairs. Could any one contend that Congress had not power to pass laws to prohibit the business of banking, and the reissuing of the bills of any of these institutions, after the expiration of their respective terms, under such penalties as were calculated to restrain them? Were we to rely on the good faith of those corporations alone, that they would close their affairs according to the terms of the laws to which they owed their existence? This would be strange, indeed! It would be according to them, or to the individuals composing them, an exemption from the ordinary frailty of our nature, to suppose them incapable of a violation of law; and would, in effect, be conceding to them a perpetuity of privileges, if they desired it. If they could be made to incur no penalty for continuing the exercise of their privileges beyond the terms of their charters, the grant being once made, for whatever period, might be never-ending. He said he did not think gentlemen could be prepared to assent to such a doctrine.

But, said Mr. C. the objection of unconstitutionality is mainly urged in reference to the late Bank of the United States. It is said that the Bank having been originally unconstitutional, we consequently have no power to pass any law touching its affairs. This objection, of course, must be confined to those who believed Congress had no constitutional power to create a national bank; for, if we had that power, all must admit that it carried with it all the incidental powers with regard to its management, and the final settlement of its affairs. But, Mr. C. said, he saw no force in the objection in any point of view; whether Congress had the constitutional power to create a bank or not. Does it follow that, because Congress has not the constitutional power to cause a given thing to be done, that it has not power to restrain others from doing the same thing, in the name, and by the assumed authority, of the United States? If we cannot constitutionally cause bank notes to be issued and circulated in the name and authority of the United States, can we not restrain others from doing so, when the manifest tendency is to deceive and defraud the community, by falsely assuming such credit and authority? The States can pass laws, inflicting the highest penalties for forging or counterfeiting any paper they may think proper to describe, in anticipation, falsely purporting to bind, either their own Governments, or their individual citizens. Could we not, by our enactments, prohibit the like fraudulent and unauthorized use of the name and credit of this Government, by inflicting such penalties as our discretion may indicate to be proper, for making, uttering, or passing, paper, purporting on its face to bind or involve the liability of this Government to any amount? Mr. C. thought, if we could not pass such a law, and all who thought proper to forge or circulate any description of paper, purporting to bind the United States for money, or any thing else, could do so with impunity, this Government was much more imbecile than he had ever supposed it.

Mr. C. further said, on the assumption that the late bank of the United States was unauthorized by the Constitution—the term of its privileges having expired—as it was the fault of the Government that it ever had existence, the obligation to restrain the reissuing, and again putting in circulation its paper, purporting on its face to be upon our authority and credit, was even heightened. What, sir, said Mr. C. if Congress even unconstitutionally authorize the issue, by any agents, of paper purporting to be binding on the credit and resources of the Government, after the time limited for its existence has expired, and it has returned to the hands of the same agents, whose duty it is to cancel it, is it possible that we have no power to prevent such agents from again throwing it into circulation? If we employ certain agents to do an unconstitutional thing for a certain period, can it be possible we have not power to prohibit the same agents from repeating the same unconstitutional acts afterwards, in our name, under any sanction we may think proper? Sir, said Mr. C. I cannot believe it. All must admit, that if we pass a constitutional law authorizing and requiring certain acts to be performed, we may repeal such act, and prohibit, under any penalty in our discretion, the doing the same acts, under its pretended authority, afterwards; and can it be possible that there is so much more virtue in an unconstitutional law, that, being once passed, we can never never revoke or control the authority it merely purported to impart? This, sir, would involve the absurdity of making an unconstitutional law better and more obligatory than a constitutional one. Powers and rights under the latter may have an end; but, once possessed under the former, they are interminable.

Sir, to test still further the soundness of the proposition, that the law creating the late Bank of the United States having been unconstitutional, we have no power to control the agents employed in its execution, I will, said Mr. C. submit this case for the consideration of Senators. I assume it to be unconstitutional for this Government to issue mere bills of credit; but suppose Congress were, notwithstanding, to authorize the Treasurer, or any other agent, to issue and throw into circulation a certain amount of them, which, after a limited period, should cease to circulate, and, when received by such officer or agent, be cancelled. Because it was unconstitutional to have issued them originally, will any man contend that we cannot declare it unlawful to reissue them, and impose whatever penalty we think necessary and proper to restrain it? I think, said Mr. C. that no one will deny us this power in the case supposed. What difference is there in principle? It cannot be because they might be issued by the Treasury, for we are equally authorized to direct them to be issued, and the whole business to be performed, by any other agent. Nor would it change the principle, to say we had only pledged our resources to a part, instead of the whole amount of liability, or of our resources to discharge it.

Now, said Mr. C. Congress passed the law creating the late Bank of the United States. By the same law this Government became a stockholder and partner with individual stockholders in that bank. We called it the Bank of the United States, and authorized certain agents, appointed under our authority, to issue notes and bills, resting on the joint credit, capital, and good faith of the stockholders (the United States included) for their redemption. We also undertook to participate in the management of this joint capital. Do not the bills so issued at least purport to involve the responsibility of this Government? and could we have divested ourselves of that responsibility, moral as well as legal, merely by the payment of our part of the capital? I think, sir, doubts may well be entertained whether we could. The law creating the bank, as well as the form of its bills, gave them currency and credit, as well upon the supposed responsibility of the Government, to a certain extent, as upon the capital invested. The bills so issued, under our authority, by agents appointed by our direction, have returned, or may return, as this bill contemplates, to their hands, or to those of sub-agents constituted by them, when all semblance of right to throw them again into circulation has ceased. Can it be supposed that we are so powerless that we can neither restrain or control our own agents? This would seem to me to involve a manifest absurdity. No, sir, it cannot be; and if we can restrain our agents from acting in the manner alluded to, personally and directly, it follows, necessarily, that we can restrain them from so acting by or through the instrumentality of others.

The power to control, or restrain, our agents, from a violation of the trust reposed in them, being admitted or established, the manner and means we shall employ to accomplish that object are mere incidents. A jurisdiction, or power, cannot exist, or be conferred, without attaching all the means of its exercise, or carrying it into execution. Give a court jurisdiction, and it implies that it shall have all the process, and other incidental powers, to give it complete effect. So when Congress, or any other legislative body, are vested with power to pass laws, compelling or restraining individuals, the manner in which they shall do it, whether by mild or severe penalties—by the scaffold or the penitentiary—is mere matter of sound discretion.

But, sir, gentlemen say we are not bound by these bills of the late bank, and therefore we cannot, and ought not, to pass the contemplated law. Suppose we are not bound; neither would we be bound by forged notes, nor any other counterfeit securities, purporting to involve the liability of the United States; yet no person could deny our power, or duty, to restrain and punish the making, or the issuing, of such forged or counterfeit paper. Nor can there be any difference in principle, as before intimated, whether such spurious paper purports to be on this Government wholly or in part.

But, sir, whatever difficulty those who usually support the Administration may feel in legislating in the manner proposed, how can the Opposition refuse to vote for the bill, unless they are willing to sanction the reissue of such extinct paper. They certainly can have no scruples about the exercise of the power. They maintain that we not only have the power, but that it is our duty to create a paper currency; and, if we have the power to create, no one can doubt we have the power to regulate such a currency. According to their doctrine, as often avowed on this floor, we have heretofore constitutionally created such a currency, through the agency of the late United States Bank—constituting, as they and their friends affirm, "the best currency in the world." In exercising the power of regulating it, we authorized its circulation for twenty years; after which, we provided it should cease, and the affairs of the institution be wound up. Had we the power to do all this—to create this "best currency," for a limited period, at the same time declaring it should not continue beyond that period—and yet have no power to carry this regulation into effect? No power to enforce a compliance with a law, or to punish infractions of a law, which, at least, according to the doctrines of our opponents, we had ample power to enact? Why, sir, certainly no one should be found to maintain propositions so obviously inconsistent.

If we do not possess, and do not also exercise, this power, what will be the consequences? Why, sir, one result is, that we have conferred a temporary authority, expressly limited to a certain period in the grant, and yet our creature, in defiance of the very law of its creation, is beyond our control, and may continue its most important functions interminably! Another result will be to inflict on the community a spurious paper currency, to the amount of as many millions as have been manufactured by the late United States Bank, and may now be in existence as long as it may suit the will and the interest of those whose duty it is to redeem and cancel it; to leave it in the power of those who are interested in pursuing that course, to let it float among the people unredeemed, till it shall, in truth, become utterly irredeemable, or be worn out, and fall a dead loss upon their hands. Is it not then in the highest degree expedient, that, possessing the power to prevent or mitigate these evils, we should exercise it, and that in the most efficient manner? We all agree that one of the very worst evils that can afflict any people, is a depreciated and fluctuating currency. Here, then, is a proper occasion for all to unite in giving to the country evidence of their sincerity. No case more palpable or flagrant can well occur. More than twenty millions of the paper of the late Bank of the United States have been thrown into circulation, not only without the sanction, but against the express enactments of the law of its creation; not only against law, but in flagrant violation of all moral principle, and all the obligations held sacred amongst honorable men; insomuch, that not one of the most zealous and ardent friends and advocates of that institution, heretofore, have thought proper to justify or vindicate its conduct.

Sir, no man can justify it. We were partners in this bank: the other partners were entrusted with the duty of winding up and settling the partnership affairs; and, instead of doing so, they are, and have been, reissuing the paper liabilities of the old firm! If the partner of any commercial house, charged with the performance of the like duty, were, after taking them in, to reissue the notes and bills of the late firm, would not the fraud meet the condemnation of all honest men? Or, if an executor or administrator, whose duty it is to call in and cancel the notes and bonds of his testator or intestate, were to pay, or send them out again to satisfy his own debts, or for the advancement of his own interest in any other manner, what member of the community would not be indignant at the violation of moral principle, as well as the obligations of law? Sir, in such case as this, there would be no difference of opinion: execrations upon such conduct would be loud and universal. Is there any real difference between the cases supposed and the conduct of the officers and trustees of the late bank, charged with the settlement of its concerns? None whatever. The object of this bill is to correct this evil; to prevent the repetition of such offences; and to punish perpetrators in future. It seems to me to be the least we should do—the least our constituents have a right to expect of us. With these impressions, Mr. C. said, he should vote for the bill, and earnestly hoped it would become a law.

RESURRECTION NOTES.

REMARKS OF MR. CALHOUN,
OF SOUTH CAROLINA.

In Senate, April 20, 1838—Upon the bill to prevent the issuing and circulation of the bills, notes, and securities of corporations created by Congress which have expired.

Mr. CALHOUN said, that as the question was about to be put on the engrossment, he rose not to discuss the subject at large, but simply to state the reasons which would govern his vote. The hour was late, and the Senate impatient to adjourn, and he would promise to detain them but a few minutes.

When the bill was taken up yesterday, he had never turned his attention seriously to the subject, and he listened attentively, in order to make up his mind, both as to our power, and the expediency of passing the bill. The result was, that he found himself in precisely the same state of uncertainty which the Senator from Virginia described himself to be, and was relieved when he (the Senator) moved an adjournment, with a view to obtain time for farther deliberation. Had he been forced to vote then, it would have been against the bill, as it was an invariable rule with him, when he doubted on constitutional questions, to vote in the negative. Since then, he had calmly and deliberately investigated the subject, and the result was a thorough conviction that we possessed the power, and ought to exercise it, and he proposed now to assign his reasons.

He held that the right proposed to be exercised in this case rested on the general power of legislation conferred on Congress, which embraces not only the power of making, but that of repealing laws. It was in fact a portion of the repealing power. No one could doubt the existence of the right to do either, and that the right of repealing extends as well to unconstitutional as constitutional laws. The case as to the former was in fact stronger than the latter; for, whether a constitutional law should be repealed or not, was a question of expediency, which left us free to act according to our discretion; while in the case of an unconstitutional law, it was a matter of obligation and duty, leaving no option; and the more unconstitutional, the more imperious the obligation and duty. Thus far there could be no doubt nor diversity of opinion.

But there are many laws, the effects of which do not cease with their repeal or expiration, and which require some additional act on our part to arrest or undo them. Such, for instance, is the one in question. The charter of the late bank expired some time ago, but its notes are still in existence, freely circulating from hand to hand, and reissued and banked on by a bank chartered by the State of Pennsylvania, into whose possession the notes of the old bank have passed. In a word, our name and authority are used almost as freely for banking purposes as they were before the expiration of the charter of the late bank. Now he held that the right of arresting or undoing these after-effects rested on the same principle as the right of repealing a law, and, like that, embraces unconstitutional as well as constitutional acts, superadding, in the case of the former, obligation and duty to right. We have an illustration of the truth of this principle in the case of the alien and sedition acts, which are now conceded on all sides to have been unconstitutional. Like the act incorporating the late bank, they expired by their own limitation; and like it, also, their effects continued after the period of their expiration. Individuals had been tried, convicted, fined, and imprisoned under them; but so far was their unconstitutionality from being regarded as an impediment to the right of arresting or undoing these effects, that Mr. Jefferson felt himself compelled on that very account to pardon those who had been fined and convicted under their provisions, and we have at this session passed, on the same ground, an act to refund the money paid by one* of the sufferers under them. The principle is too clear to require further illustration, and the difficulty which some have felt in voting for this bill, because they believe that the charter of the late bank was unconstitutional, and apprehended that the passage of the bill would indirectly recognise it constitutionality, would, he trusted, be entirely removed by what he had said. So far otherwise, it imposed a duty on us to act as far as we may have the power; and this brings up the question how far we have the right, in this case, to arrest or undo the consequences, still resulting from the charter of the late bank, notwithstanding its expiration.

Those on the opposite side, who believe that this Government has unlimited control over the actual currency of the country, whatever form it may assume, or under whatever authority issued, can have no difficulty in the decision of this question. According to their conception, the Government has a right to act on the thing itself—to prohibit the circulation of the notes of the old bank, in whosever hands they may be, and to call them in, just in the same manner as they could any worn-out or debased coin, the circulation of which they might choose to prohibit. But we, who think differently, must find some other ground to justify our support of the bill. If, then, we cannot act on the notes themselves, on what can we act? Certainly not on the people at large, who are only subject to our jurisdiction in specified cases, of which the present is not one. It follows, if we can act at all, it must be on those who are personally subject to our jurisdiction, and this is precisely what the bill proposes to do. It is limited to those only who are the trustees, or agents for winding up the concerns of the late bank, and it is those, and those only, who are subject to the penalties of the bill for reissuing its notes. They are, pro tanto, our officers, and, to that extent, subject to our jurisdiction, and liable to have their acts controlled, as far as they relate to the trust or agency confided to them; just as much so as receivers or collectors of the revenue would be. No one can doubt that we could prohibit them from passing off any description of paper currency that might come into their hands in their official character. Nor is the right less clear in reference to the persons who may be comprehended in this bill.

Whether Mr. Biddle or others connected with his bank are, in fact, trustees, or agents, within the meaning of the bill, is not a question for us to decide. They are not named, nor referred to by description. The bill is very properly drawn up in general terms, so as to comprehend all cases of the kind, and would include the banks of the District, should Congress refuse to re-charter them. It is left to the court and jury, to whom it properly belongs, to decide, when a case comes up, whether the party is, or is not, a trustee, or agent, and, of course, whether he is, or is not, included in the provisions of the bill. If he is, he will be subject to its penalties, but not otherwise; and it cannot possibly affect the question of the constitutionality of the bill, whether Mr. Biddle, and others connected with him, are, or are not, comprehended in its provisions, and subject to its penalties.

It remains to be considered whether it is expedient to pass the bill. This point has been discussed with such ability by the Senators who preceded him on the same side, as to leave him but little to add. Congress has determined not to continue to exercise the power of authorizing banking, and permitted, accordingly, the charter of the late bank to expire; but, notwithstanding, the function of banking was still continued under its name and authority, by those whose duty it was to wind up the business of the defunct institution. The notes of the old bank are issued as freely as if the institution was still in existence, to the great profit of those who have no right whatever to use them, and who are not responsible for their redemption, and, at the hazard of the ultimate loss of the community, and especially of those who were stockholders in the old, but not the present institution. Such being the facts, the dignity of the Government, and a regard to its interests, as well as that of the community, clearly demand our interposition.

With these impressions, he was in favor of the passage of the bill, and never gave a vote with a clearer conviction, both of right and expediency, than he would give for its passage.

THE LATE DUEL.

SPEECH OF MR. TOUCEY, OF CONNECTICUT,

In the House of Representatives, April 27, 1838—Upon the motion to postpone and print the report of the select committee on the death of the late JONATHAN CILLEY.

Mr. SPEAKER: The House imposed on this committee a delicate and responsible duty. They have discharged it, have executed the order of the House, and now submit the result of their labors. They have not been anxious to inquire who would stand by them in this matter. If it be the pleasure of the House to desert them, to retrace its own steps, to rescind the resolution under which they acted, and the various orders enjoining upon them the consideration of the vast multitude of memorials with which they were charged, and to leave them stranded on the shore, it will be no part of their duty to complain of others for instability or infirmity of purpose.

But when the House has ordered a duty to be performed, and it has been performed strictly, precisely, according to the spirit and the letter of the instructions, without objection from any quarter, with the implied knowledge and acquiescence of all, and in exact conformity with the invariable practice and usage of both Houses of Congress, I do protest against the injustice of censuring those who have only obeyed you.

What, sir, is the question? It is whether the report of this committee shall be suppressed—whether all their proceedings, and the entire result of this investigation, the evidence, and the resolutions, shall be thrown under the table; for the objection which has been made was, if it be valid, presented in its true form and extent by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. ROBERTSON,] and urged by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] when he first addressed the House, that the committee had no power to go into the investigation at all; that when it appeared to them that members were to be involved, they should have stopped, reported that fact to the House, and should not have proceeded to take any accusatory evidence whatever. This is, beyond doubt, the rule of parliamentary law laid down in the Manual, which has been so often quoted. It will not be questioned by me. It is a sound and salutary rule, and has been the rule of this House and of the Parliament of Great Britain from the earliest times: "When a committee is charged with an inquiry, if a member prove to be involved, they cannot proceed against him, but must make a special report to the House; whereupon the member is heard in his place, or at the bar, or a special authority is given to the committee to inquire concerning him."

"If a member prove to be involved;" if it turn out that a member is involved; if it be brought to light that a member is involved, the committee shall give notice of that fact to the House, and the House may then hear the member, or may grant special authority to the committee to inquire concerning him. The object of reporting that fact to the House, is to give notice to the House that a question of privilege has arisen involving a member; and the object of the notice is, that the House may itself take up the subject, or may refer it to the committee for inquiry. The rule itself, therefore, shows that the House, whenever it has notice that a member is involved in a question of privilege, may, at its discretion, refer it to a committee for investigation.

I admit, sir, in the fullest manner, that in all cases to which this rule of parliamentary law applies, the committee have no power to proceed. They must stop, if I may so express myself, before they begin, because they have no power over the question of privilege which thus suddenly springs up, involving a member, but must report the fact to the House, and obtain the authority of the House to proceed, before they can take one step in the investigation of that question. I deny that, in any case which falls within this rule, it is in the power of a committee of Congress to proceed behind the back of a member, and to collect a mass of accusatory evidence against him, and hurl it like a thunderbolt into this House, without the authority of the House first fully given. The rule protects any and every member against the investigation of his conduct, in any manner, in any degree, by any evidence, before any committee, in a case affecting the privileges of the House, without the clear authority of the House. The rights and privileges of the House, the peace and safety of its members, the public interests committed to their charge, could not be preserved without the due enforcement of this rule of parliamentary law.

The privilege of a member is not his own; it is the privilege of the whole House. He cannot waive it. Should he attempt to do so, he would himself be punishable for a breach of privilege; because it is not his own privilege, created for his own benefit, but a right secured for the preservation of the legislative body to which he belongs, of the rights of the constituency represented by him, and of the interests of the whole country, which are more or less committed to his care. No committee, therefore, created for any general or for any particular purpose, can take jurisdiction of this transcendent right of the whole House, affecting its very organization and existence, without a clear grant of power by the whole House. But the power may, at any time, and on any occasion, be granted; and whether it is granted in any particular instance, is a question of intention and construction. If the House intended to grant it, and has made use of language which will clearly confer it, there no longer remains any question as to its existence or its exercise. In the present instance it was expressly granted, in language clear, explicit, and unequivocal.

The gentlemen who have maintained with the greatest ability that the committee in the present instance were restrained by this rule and have exceeded their powers, indeed almost all, who have addressed the House on that side of the question, especially in the earlier stages of the debate, have abandoned, yielded, given up the whole ground, upon which they took their stand: for they now, with here and there a solitary and strange exception, fully admit that the whole mass of accusatory evidence was rightly taken, and properly reported to the House. They yield up the whole objection, and virtually admit, either that the rule has no application, or has been complied with, on the present occasion. They admit that the committee had ample powers to go into this investigation, and to take and report all the evidence which which they have reported in the present case, although it directly and deeply involves the right and privilege of members of this House; which could not have been done, if that rule were applicable here, and had not been complied with.

Sir, I advance three propositions, and I propose to establish them so clearly and conclusively, that no human intellect under the dominion of truth and reason, shall withhold its assent, or deny that any one of them is not well founded:

In the first place, the House conferred upon this committee of investigation full power to do precisely what they have done: and conferred the power, that it might be exercised.

In the second place, the committee have acted in precise conformity with every precedent which has been set from the foundation of the Government to the present time.

In the third place, the resolutions proposed are not adjudications, but mere propositions submitted to the House, involving inquiry by the House; and to be adopted, rejected, or otherwise dirposed of, after a full hearing of the members implicated, and in the usual mode.

The House conferred upon the committee full power. It was conferred by the resolution of the 28th of February:

"Resolved, That a committee consisting of seven members be appointed to investigate the causes which led to the death of the Hon. JONATHAN CILLEY, late a member of this House, and the circumstances connected therewith; and further to inquire whether there has been, in the case alluded to, a breach of the privileges of this House, and to report thereon to the House."

And power was given to the committee to send for persons and papers, and to sit during the sessions of the House. The language of this resolution is exceedingly broad. It conveyed a special authority and direction:—first: To investigate the causes which led to the death of Mr. Cilley, late a member of the House; secondly: To investigate the circumstances connected therewith; thirdly: To inquire whether there had been, in the case alluded to, a breach of the privileges of the House; and fourthly: To report on those three subjects directly to the House. The committee was "appointed to investigate," "to inquire," "to report."

This special authority was conferred on the committee, in the first instance, without any previous investigation or inquiry. The House knew "by common fame" what had occurred; and that is a sufficient ground to proceed upon in any legislative body, in directing an investigation by witnesses. The same manual of parliamentary law, which is recognised by the standing rules of this House, to which gentlemen have resorted, and on which they rely, for their objection to this whole proceeding, lays down the law upon this subject also: "Common fame is a good ground for the House to proceed by inquiry, and even to accusation."—Jefferson's Manual, page 133.

It was known, therefore, in a strictly parliamentary way, in a strictly legal manner, for all the purposes of instituting an investigation, that the principals and the seconds, in the tragedy ordered to be investigated, were exclusively members of this House. This was known to every member of this body, from common fame, and from a printed statement, published in the newspapers, under the signatures of the seconds, in the hands of every one. And the fact, that members of the House of Representatives were involved, was spoken of in the debate on the resolution of inquiry, and made a ground of objection to the passage of that resolution. And now, sir, it is asserted that this fact is the only one which this committee were authorized to inquire into and report to the House; or, in other words, that when the House adopted that resolution, it was a dead letter in all its parts, authorized no investigation into the causes which led to the death of Mr. CILLEY, into the circumstances which attended it, or into the breach of the privileges of the House, which was involved in it; and that all this was well known to more than three fourths of the members of this House, who recorded their votes for the passage of that resolution.

This would seem to me to be an exceedingly frivolous, absurd and unaccountable proceeding if the committee had no power. The House of Representatives, well knowing, in a legal and parliamentary way, that its own members were directly, principally, and, perhaps, exclusively, involved in the inquiry, did, notwithstanding, direct the investigation to be made into "the causes," "the circumstances," and "the breach of privilege;" did direct the committee to report upon the whole subject-matter of the investigation, and did clothe them with the power to send for persons and papers for that purpose. The House, at the very outset, granted the special authority, in the fullest manner, "to inquire whether, in the case alluded to, there had been a breach of the privileges of the House," which, necessarily, involved the inquiry, by whom acts of violation had been committed. The whole question of privilege had, at the outset, intentionally and specifically, been referred to the committee, and it had been worse than useless to have reported to the House a fact which the House knew before, and to have obtained a new grant of the same authority which the House had already granted.

But, sir, the various orders of the House, referring to this committee the great number of memorials, signed by more than twenty thousand citizens, praying an investigation of the facts of this transaction, and some of them praying an expulsion of the principal and the seconds, not only by description, but by name—praying expressly for the expulsion of Messrs. GRAVES, WISE and JONES—would have conferred upon the committee full power to investigate and report, had the resolution itself been more limited in its terms. By those memorials, the House referred to the committee, for inquiry and report, the transaction itself, which resulted in the death of Mr. CILLEY, the names of the principal and the seconds involved in it, and the question whether the prayer of those memorials, for their expulsion, should be granted. That reference was equivalent to an express order to investigate and report in reference to the persons charged. This is one of the most familiar principles of parliamentary law and practice, illustrated by daily experience, and well known to every member of any legislative body.

And yet the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr ADAMS,] the boasted champion of the right of petition, upon a subject clearly within the jurisdiction of Congress, upon memorials which he himself has presented, seems, in effect, by his course, to deny the power of a committee, charged with the consideration of those memorials, to report whether, in their opinion, the prayer of them ought, or ought not, to be granted. If, sir, the committee had not that power, if they had not the right to consider the subject of the memorials referred to them, in its full length and breadth, and to report to the House whether the prayer of the memorialists should be granted or denied, the right of petition is a mockery, the whole system of parliamentary law and practice is but a name.

The committee, therefore, had full power, both by the resolution of the 28th of February, and by the memorials referred to them, to examine this matter, and to sift it to the bottom. They had the most ample authority to report what were the causes which led to the death of Mr. Cilley, what were the circumstances which attended it, whether the privileges of the House had been violated, who were involved in their violation, and to propose any measure for the action of the House, even to the extent of expulsion. And when, in the course of the debate on the adoption of the original resolution, it was intimated that this was a perilous service; that those who engaged in it might find it necessary to be armed to the teeth; I, for one, did not feel at liberty to shun it, nor do I now feel disposed to shrink from any part of the responsibility consequent upon its performance.

The course pursued by the committee, on the present occasion, is the same which has been pursued in every other case of privilege referred to a committee, from the foundation of the Government to the present time.

The first precedent to which I will refer is that of Humphrey Marshall, Senator from Kentucky, in the year 1796. A memorial from certain members of the Legislature, and a letter from the Governor of Kentucky, showing that that Senator had been charged with fraud and perjury, were presented to the Senate of the United States, and referred to a committee, who were ordered "to consider and report thereon to the Senate." The committee reported the facts, their opinion thereon, their reasons, and what, in their view, should be the final action of the Senate. They reported, in that case, that "the memorial ought to be dismissed."

In the same year arose the case of James Gunn, a Senator from Georgia, and Frederick Frelinghuysen, a Senator from New Jersey. The one had sent, the other had borne, a challenge to Abraham Baldwin, a member of the House of Representatives from the State of Georgia, for a cause not connected with his duty as a member. The correspondence, which was presented to the House by Mr. Baldwin, was, together with a letter from Mr. Gunn, and one from Mr. Frelinghuysen, referred to a committee, of which James Madison was chairman. Mr. Madison made the report. The committee, in this case also, reported the facts, their opinion, their reasons, and what, in their view, should be the final action of the House. They reported that the two Senators were guilty of a breach of privilege, that their apologies should be deemed satisfactory, and that, therefore, no further proceedings were necessary: in all which the House concurred.

The next year (1797) arose the case of William Blount, a Senator from Tennessee. A message of the President of the United States, and papers accompanying it, relating to a certain letter, purporting to have been written by Mr. Blount, were referred to a select committee, to consider and report what, in their opinion, it was proper for the Senate to do thereon, and power was granted to send for persons, papers, and records. In this case, also, the committee reported the facts, their opinion, their reasons, and what should be the final action of the Senate. The resolution, which they reported, was in these words: "Resolved, That William Blount, esq. one of the Senators of the United States, having been guilty of a high misdemeanor, entirely inconsistent with his public trust and duty as a Senator, be, and he hereby, is expelled from the Senate of the United States." And this resolution was considered in the Senate, witnesses were examined, counsel were heard, and it was finally adopted by a vote of 25 to 1, and William Blount was thereby expelled from the Senate of the United States.

In 1798, a member of this House insulted another member in the presence of the House. Mr. Sewall, of Massachusetts, immediately, in his place, submitted a resolution, "that Matthew Lyon, a member of this House, for a violent attack and gross indecency committed upon the person of Roger Griswold, another member, in the presence of this House while sitting, be, for this disorderly behavior, expelled therefrom." This motion was referred to a committee, with instructions to inquire into the whole matter thereof, and to report the same, with their opinion thereon, to the House. The committee did report the facts, their opinion thereon, and a resolution for the expulsion of the offending member, and recommended its adoption by the House. The report was committed to a Committee of the Whole House, witnesses were heard, and the testimony reported to the House; and while the trial was proceeding, or rather before it had terminated, another case of privilege arose. Mr. Griswold took the redress of his grievances into his own hands, and a personal rencontre ensued just as the House was assembling. A resolution was immediately submitted by a member, "that Roger Griswold and Matthew Lyon, members of this House, for riotous and disorderly behavior committed in the House, be expelled therefrom." This motion was referred to the same select committee, "with instructions to report their opinion thereupon to the House, together with the evidence in writing upon which they formed their report." They reported the evidence, with their opinion that the resolution be disagreed to.

The case of Capt. James McKnight and Lieut. Michael Reynolds occurred in the year 1800. The President of the United States communicated to the House of Representatives a letter from John Randolph, jr. of Virginia, complaining of an insult offered him by certain officers of the army or navy for words spoken in debate. The message and the letter were referred to a select committee, of which Mr. Chauncey Goodrich of Connecticut was chairman. They called witnesses, and heard the parties. Commending the President highly, and censuring Mr. Randolph severely, they reported the facts, the evidence, their opinion, and their reasons, together with resolutions for the final action of the House.

I will now call the attention of the House to the proceedings of a committee, of which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] was chairman. That gentleman has seen fit to denounce the course of the select committee on the present occasion in severe terms. He has seen fit to declare in his place that they have committed a greater breach of the privileges of this House, in making their report, than any of which they have complained; or, in other language, greater than if their hands had been imbrued in the blood of a fellow member; and this charge he has made against us, for following the only unexceptionable part of the example which he himself set for us in his younger days, some thirty years ago, when he was a member of the other branch of Congress. I will not deny that the precedent which he furnished us on that occasion, had some influence upon our course in discharging the duty of making a report. But there are other parts of that precedent which our own sense of justice and propriety did not permit us to follow. We did not feel it to be our duty to call the accused member from the lobbies or from the promiscuous crowd, and to move that he be arraigned before the assembled multitude, with all eyes fixed upon him, to hear read one of the most extraordinary documents to be found upon our legislative annals—most extraordinary for its vituperative energy, for its biting sarcasms, for its withering invective, and its galling accusations. We did not pursue that mild and merciful course. We did not deny the accused the right to defend himself before the committee, and insist that his defence should be before the Senate only. We did not insist that all the rules of law in favor of innocence, until guilt was established, were to be discarded. We did not insist that the accused should be aspersed upon ex parte evidence, should be denied the privilege of cross examining the witnesses against him, or should be tried and condemned upon proof, which the laws of every State in this Union, in a matter of a penny's value, declare to be no proof at all. We did not insist that either House of Congress was a high tribunal, of such exalted character and transcendent dignity and importance, that all the principles of evidence, and all the rules of law, which the wisdom of ages had established for the protection of innocence and the defence of the accused, were to be trampled under foot, when a humble individual was on trial for all that was most dear to him in life. Our course, in all these respects, was exactly the reverse of that pursued by the member from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] in the well known case of John Smith, a Senator from Ohio. We adhered to the rules of law. We presumed innocence until guilt was established. We held no man, acquitted by the verdict of his peers, to be an acquitted felon. We allowed no ex parte evidence. We permitted the parties implicated in a charge to be present, to meet the witnesses against them face to face, to cross-examine them in the most rigid manner, to call witnesses in their own defence, to be witnesses for each other and indirectly for themselves, and finally presented the whole mass of the evidence on all sides, simultaneously, to the House, and, through it, to the country. We did follow the precedent of the gentleman from Massachussetts in one respect, though in a somewhat different spirit. We reported the facts, the evidence, our opinions thereon, our reasons, and what, in our view, should be the final action of the House. We reported, as he did, a resolution for expulsion.

On the 27th of November, 1807, a resolution was presented, which was adoped by the Senate, "that a committee be appointed to inquire whether it be compatible with the honor and privileges of this House, that John Smith, a Senator of the State of Ohio, against whom bills of indictment were found at the Circuit Court of Virginia, held at Richmond in August last, for treason and misdemeanor, should be permitted any longer to have a seat therein; and that the committee do inquire into all the facts regarding the conduct of Mr. Smith as an alleged associate of Aaron Burr, and report the same to the Senate." That committee examined the evidence against the Senator, such as it was; and Mr. Adams, the chairman, in their behalf, reported it with a summary statement of the facts, with reasons and arguments, a resolution for the expulsion of the offending Senator, and a recommendation that it be adopted by the Senate. I will read the words of the resolution, as the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] reported it:

"Resolved, That John Smith, a Senator from the State of Ohio, by his participation in the conspiracy of Aaron Burr, against the peace, union, and liberties of the people of the United States, has been guilty of conduct incompatible with his duty and station as a Senator of the United States: and that he be therefor, and hereby is, expelled from the Senate of the United States."

Upon this resolution, thus reported by the committee, John Smith was heard before the Senate, by his witnesses and his counsel; and when the final vote was taken upon its adoption, it did not pass for the want of a single vote.

The case of Captain Isaac A. Coles was in the year 1809. He had assaulted General Nelson, a member of the House from the State of Maryland, in the north wing of the Capitol, after the House had adjourned, and for a cause not conneeted with the duties of General Nelson as a member. A committee was appointed to inquire into the circumstances attending the occurrence, and to report a statement of the facts, with their opinion thereon. Governor Taylor of South Carolina was chairman, and Mr. Pitkin of Connecticut was a member, of this committee. They reported the facts, the evidence, their opinion thereon, that Mr. Coles had been guilty of a breach of privilege, that his apology should be deemed satisfactory, and a resolution also that no further proceedings should be had.

The case of Russell Jarvis, in 1828, who assaulted the private secretary of the President of the United States while passing from the hall of this House to the Senate chamber, although not the ase of a member, is deserving of notice. Mr. McDuffie of South Carolina was chairman of the committee. They heard the witnesses, and the parties, by consent, reported a summary statement of the facts, all the evidence, their opinion thereon, and a resolution declaring Mr. Jarvis guilty of a breach of privilege, deserving the censure of the House, and that no further proceedings be had thereon.

In the case of Lieutenant Lane, who assaulted Mr. Ewing, a member of this House from the State of Ohio, in the year 1835, the subject was referred to a committee, who reported a summary statement of the facts, together with the evidence; but the Congress expiring in a few hours, they, for that reason, recommended no action by the House.

In the case of the affray between two Reporters, (Wheeler and Codd,) in 1836, within this hall, while the House was in session, the committee reported the facts, the evidence, their opinions, and resolutions for the final action of the House.

The case of Mr. Ruggles of the Senate, so sadly connected with the occasion of the present investigation, is fresh in the recollections of all. The committee there, also, have reported the facts, the evidence, their opinions, and a resolution for the final action of the Senate.

Such has been the course of precedents. They are uniform, invariable, extend through every period of our political history, and it remains to be seen whether they are all to be subverted to meet the exigencies of the present moment. I only desire that it may be known and understood by the House, and by the country, that if, for the purpose of suppressing this report, and getting rid of the resolutions of expulsion and censure, the whole subject shall be recommitted, with instructions, directly or indirectly to suppress them, it will be in open violation of the whole practice and course of both Houses of Congress from the earliest to the present time.

The review of this long course of precedents has anticipated, and rendered unnecessary, what I had intended to have said upon my third proposition. It has been already seen that we have acted only in conformity with precedent, in submitting resolutions for expulsion, and censure. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] has relieved us from any necessity of explanation. In his report upon the case of John Smith, he says "The committee have never conceived tnemselves invested with authority to try Mr Smith. Their charge was to report an opinion relating to the honor and privileges of the Senate, and the facts relating to the conduct of Mr. Smith. Their opinion, indeed, cannot be expressed in relation to the privilege of the Senate, without relating, at the same time, to Mr. Smith's right of holding a seat in this body; but in that respect the authority of the committee extends only to proposal, and not to decision." And yet the committee, in that case, reported a resolution for the expulsion of John Smith, and he was heard, and tried, before the Senate upon that resolution, though upon the final vote it did not pass by the constitutional majority, and he was therefore not expelled. The committee did not, in the present case, conceive themselves invested with authority to try the members accused. They knew that their authority extended only to proposal, and not to decision. They knew that the trial, if trial there was, would be before the whole House; that the first question would be whether the members implicated had violated the privileges of the House; and that the second question would be, whether they should be expelled or censured therefor. They knew full well that the committee, in presenting these resolutions, had done no more than any one of them upon his individual responsibility, or any other member of the House, might have done when this report was presented. It was not believed that the concurrence of four or seven in a proposition, which any one of them was competent to make, upon a subject referred to them explicitly, would take from them combined the power, which each one of them separately possessed, even without the additional grant of power.

The whole subject is under the control of the House. They can modify these resolutions or reject them. They can proceed with the trial or refuse to do so, upon the motion of any member. They can get rid of the resolutions and the trial also, by referring them back to the committee, with the report and the evidence, with instructions to suppress them. Whatever course is taken, the committee have discharged a duty which they neither sought nor shunned, and it now rests with the individual members of this House, and they are responsible to their constituents and to the country.

PUBLIC LANDS—GRADUATION BILL.

SPEECH OF MR. BENTON, OF MISSOURI,

In Senate, April 12, 1838.—The "bill providing for the reduction and graduation of the price of the public lands" having been taken up for consideration—

Mr. BENTON said he rose with peculiar gratification to speak on the present occasion. The Graduation Bill was an old and favorite measure of his, commenced twelve years ago, prosecuted with various success, impeded sometimes by unexpected opposition, baffled at one period by the scheme to distribute money among the States, but never abandoned nor despaired of. Conscious of the justice and rectitude of the bill, and a firm believer in the eventual triumph of all that is morally and politically right, he had never suffered himself to be discouraged by opposition, or disheartened by defeat. He had always believed in the final success of the bill, and the period for success seemed now to be approaching.

The bill comes to us now under more favorable auspices than it has ever done before. The President recommends it, and the Treasury needs the money which it will produce. A gentleman of the Opposition [Mr. CLAY] reproaches the President for inconsistency in making this recommendation; he says that he voted against it as Senator heretofore, and recommends it as President now. But the gentleman forgets to tell us that Mr. Van Buren, when a member of the Senate, spoke in favor of the general object of the bill from the first day it was presented, and that he voted in favor of one degree of reduction—a reduction of the price of the public lands to one dollar per acre—the last session that he served here. Far from being inconsistent, the President, in this recommendation, has only carried out to their legitimate conclusions the principles which he formerly expressed, and the vote which he formerly gave.

The bill, as modified on the motions of the Senators from Tennessee and New Hampshire [Messrs. GRUNDY and HUBBARD] stands shorn of half its original provisions. Originally it embraced four degrees of reduction; it now contains but two of those degrees. The two last—the fifty cent, and the twenty-five cent reductions, have been cut off. I made no objection to the motions of those gentlemen. I knew them to be made in a friendly spirit; I knew also that the success of their motions was necessary to the success of any part of the bill. Certainly I would have preferred the whole—would have prefered the four degrees of reduction. But this is a case in which the homely maxim applies, that half a loaf is better than no bread. By giving up half the bill, we may gain the other half; and sure I am that our constituents will vastly prefer half to nothing. The lands may now be reduced to one dollar for those which have been five years in market, and to seventy-five cents for those which been ten years in market. The rest of the bill is relinquished for the present, not abandoned for ever. The remaining degrees of reduction will be brought forward hereafter, and with a better prospect of success, after the lands have been picked and culled over under the prices of the present bill. Even if the clauses had remained which have been struck out, on the motions of the gentlemen from Tennessee and New Hampshire, it would have been two years from December next, before any purchases could have been made under them. They were not to take effect until December, 1840. Before that time Congress will twice sit again; and if the present bill passes, and is found to work well, the enactment of the present rejected clauses will be a matter of course.

The bill will operate, not upon the whole body of the lands of the United States, but on comparatively a small part: seventy millions of acres is the nominal amount which the bill will reach, but in reality its effect will be confined to half that quantity. We have authentic reports upon this subject, made under the requisition of the Senate, by the registers and receivers of all the land districts. These officers were required to report upon the quantity, quality, and value of the unsold lands within their respective districts. These reports were made several years ago, and exhibited this result: the whole quantity of unsold lands, then remaining unpurchased at $1 25 per acre, was seventy-one millions of acres; of that quantity, thirty-four millions of acres were returned as unfit for cultivation and worth nothing; the remaining quantity was reported at various and average prices, from eight or ten cents per acre up to the Government price. The quantity of land then, on which this bill can operate, will be about thirty-five millions of acres; and the quality will be the refuse of sales, donations, and many years' cullings and pickings. Nominally the bill is to apply to lands which have been five years, and ten years, in market; in point of fact it applies to those which have been twenty, fifty, a hundred, and even a hundred and fifty years in market, and that not merely at $1 25 per acre, but, in many instances as a mere donation. Take the case of Missouri. The Spanish Government was established in Upper Louisiana in 1764—say seventy-five years ago—and the lands were offered as a free grift to the settlers. At the change of Government in 1804, the same lands were picked by head rights and settlement rights, and when the land system of the United States was brought to bear upon it, it was again picked over, first by pre-emptions, then at public auction, and afterwards at private entry. Thus, these lands have been picked for three quarters of a century, and under three different sovereignties—the French, Spanish, and American—not in fact over the whole State, but over a great part. The concessions under the French and Spanish Governments extended four hundred miles up and down the Mississippi, within the present limits of the State of Missouri, and above a hundred miles back from the river. In Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama, Florida, and some parts of Arkansas, a good part of their lands have actually been picked over for a century and a quarter. The French and Spanish settlements commenced in those places about the year 1700; and the best lands were disposed of by donations under the bountiful system of free gifts which prevailed under the Kings of France and Spain. In Illinois, Indiana, and Michigan, there are lands which have been picked for a century and a half—since the year 1680—when the French first took possession of those countries. The same countries have since been picked under our system of auctions, pre-emptions, and private entries; and it is not only unjust in itself, but derogatory to the Republican Government of the United States to be holding up the refuse of these lands—the mere remnants and relics, the offal and leavings, the dregs and lees—of so many years' pickings and cullings, at one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre.

This is the quantity, and this the quality, of the lands on which the bill will operate—about thirty five millions of acres, the residuum of years and centuries' donations and sales, and scattered over nine States and two Territories. If the whole quantity lay in a body, it would make but an inconsiderable extent, but it is scattered over almost a boundless region—scattered in detached parcels from the Gulf of Mexico to the Northern lakes, and from the Atlantic coast of East Florida to the frontiers of Texas.

Every interest which can be brought to bear on the subject requires these lands to be immediately sold; and to sell them, the price must be reduced to their value. It is due to the Federal Treasury—to the State Governments—and to the whole body of the agricultural community. The Treasury is empty, made so by a distribution of twenty-eight millions of the public moneys among the States, and the deferred payment of nine millions due from merchants and banks. It is empty, and must be replenished. Loans and Treasury notes are both humiliating resources, and are only justifiable as temporary expedients. The thirty-five millions of acres of refuse lands is the natural and adequate reliance of the Treasury in this emergency. At reduced prices they would sell immediately, and for a respectable sum. They lie in the settled parts of the States, mixed among the farms, and are desirable for their locality, if not for their intrinsic value. They would be purchased immediately at prices adapted to their value, and would throw several millions into the Treasury in a few months. Fifteen or twenty millions might be expected from them in two years if the graduation was complete, down to twenty-five cents. To the new States the sales of these lands are necessary to the completion of their sovereignty within their own limits. The unsold public lands are exempted from their jurisdiction—as much so as if they belonged to the Indians. They pay no tax; they contribute nothing to the support of the State Government; they are desert barriers between settlements. Every reason which required the extinction of the Indian title within the limits of the States, also requires the extinction of the Federal title. Under the Federal title the lands are useless to every party; they contribute nothing to taxation, to cultivation, to improvement. Federal dominion over land is a barren sceptre, under which nothing grows; individual ownership is the fruitful sceptre which makes the soil available for every public and for every private benefit. No State should feel its sovereignty complete while the Federal Government wields a barren sceptre over any part of its soil. Every one should labor for the extinction of the Federal title; and every one has so labored. Numerous are the memorials which have been forwarded to Congress on this subject. The Graduation bill is the feasible mode of accomplishing this great object; and in favor of that bill, the Legislatures of Indiana, Illinois, Missouri, Michigan, Arkansas, Louisiana, Alabama, and Mississippi, besides the Territories, have repeatedly sent us their memorials. Never has there been so general and so lasting a concurrence in favor of any one measure among so many States. Surely something is due to the wishes of so many States, so unanimously and so perseveringly presented to us. To the farmers and cultivators of the soil, the passage of the bill is eminently due. It is due to the whole body of the cultivators, whether rich or poor, whether with or without land at present. Some gentlemen treat it as a mere relief to the poor—as a plan merely to supply the poor with homes. That is a partial and imperfect view; it is only true in part. Doubtless many poor will thereby obtain homes, and become freeholders, who would otherwise have remained tenants; but there is no propriety in requiring from a rich man double or treble its value for a piece of refuse land which is necessary to complete his farm, or to supply him with wood, or water, or pasture, or to give him a quarry of stone, or the possession of which is merely necessary as an outlet, or to keep off a bad neighbor. Many are the persons of considerably property to whom these parcels of refuse lands will be desirable for these purposes, and from whom it would be unconscionable to demand double or treble price merely because they are able to pay it. It may be assumed, without the fear of contradiction, that there will not be a first rate quarter section of land to be sold out of the whole thirty-five millions of acres on which this bill will operate. There will not be one in which there is not a mixture of sterile, or broken ground, unfit for cultivation. Our surveys are all made to the cardinal points; the lines go straight forward, without regard to good or bad land; the corners are made at given distances, without regard to soil. Often a patch of good land s cut into two parts by a line; often it is thrown into three or four different quarter sections by a corner made in the middle of it. Creeks and branches may have narrow bottoms of good soil, bordered by steep hills unfit for cultivation; and bodies of good land may be cut up by lines and corners. In all such cases, while a poor man may find space for his small field on a single quarter section, yet a man of some property must purchase four or five quarter sections to combine as much soil fit for cultivation as his force requires. To demand a dollar and a quarter all round for such land, is to demand four or five dollars an acre for all that is fit for use. The rich and the poor, then, are both interested in this bill. It concerns the whole agricultural population of eight States and two Territories. It concerns the farmers and planters of Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, and Florida; of Arkansas, Missouri, Illinois, Indiana, Michigan, Wisconsin, and a part of Ohio. It is a bill which will carry benefits, and give satisfaction, to a greater number of States, and to a greater number of individuals, than any bill which ever came before Congress. The eyes of one-third of the Union are upon us, watching the issue of this bill, to them the most important measure which ever came before Congress!

This, then, is a bill for the benefit of the agricultural part of the community, and is it not right that something should be done for the benefit of that numerous and meritorious class? Few know the value of their labor to the country? Few calculate the amount, small in the detail, but enormous in the aggregate, of their meritorious labors. I see in a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, made to Congress at the commencement of the present session, that the bread alone consumed in the United States, estimated at the low rate of three cents a day of each individual, is worth one hundred and twenty-four millions of dollars. This comes from the agricultural class, and is only one item in the long list of its productions. The meats may be deemed of equal value with the bread. Then comes the food for all the domestic animals, and, after that, the animals themselves, of almost inestimable value. The cotton, the wool, the hemp, the flax, the leather, which furnish the material for the raiment of the greater part of fifteen millions of souls, come from their hands. After all this, there is an annual surplus of a hundred millions of dollars of exportable productions, to be sent abroad to foreign climes, to bring back the comforts, the luxuries, the necessaries of life from all foreign nations, with gold and silver, and healing medicines. The same exportable productions, in the return form of foreign merchandise, pay the taxes which support the Government. Upwards of eight hundred millions of taxes have been derived from that source, all bottomed upon the productive industry of the farmer. Nor is this all. The manufacturer, the navigator, and the merchant, find their occupation in the productive industry of the cultivator of the earth. The factory is furnished with its material, and the ship with its freight, from the labor of his hands. The opulent merchant, who counts his wealth by millions, has derived his estate from the mere filtration of the farmer's productions through his hands; and the banker, with his bales of paper money, what would he be were it not for the annual millions of gold and silver which the exported productions of the earth cause to be brought into our country? Confining our estimate to the direct annual product from agriculture, its annual product in food and raiment to man, and food for beasts, and in exports, and one thousand millions of dollars may not exceed its value! All other interests put together are insignificant, compared to this great one. Compare the farmer with the banker, now the object of so much legislative care and encomium in our country. He produces nothing. He takes an old handkerchief, worn out in service, has it made into silk paper, cuts it up into little slips, and sprinkles it over with figures for dollars. In this way these cherished and exalted characters have made what is called about a hundred millions of dollars. Grant that it is really a hundred millions—that every paper dollar is good for a real dollar—what then? why, the whole is only the tenth part of the annual product of the cultivation of the earth! The whole is only worth thirty-six days' labor of the agricultural interest! But their hundred millions of paper is not worth dollar for dollar; vast defalcations will be encountered when the day of realization arrives; and if three-fourths are made good, it will be a happy deliverance for the country. Peradventure the whole of the bank notes now afloat in this Union are not worth twenty-five days' labor of the agricultural class; yet this class can scarcely conciliate a majority for a pre-emption law, or a graduation law, while the support and applause of the banks command the first cares and labors of the legislative bodies.

Besides their productive industry, the agricultural class is the great fountain and nursery of the Republican spirit. Other laboring classes divide that noble prerogative with them; still, from the vast superiority of their numbers and the peculiar adaptation of their occupation to the cultivation of the independent spirit of man, the cultivators of the earth must be looked upon as the great and perennial fountain of that Republican spirit which is to maintain and perpetuate our free institutions. Gentlemen of the Opposition affect a great alarm for the overthrow of the Republic by military chieftains. Let them moderate their terrors. Let them remember that no conquering general ever overturned the civil institutions of his country until the faction, corruption, and venality of politicians had first rendered them odious and contemptible; and let them see in the productive classes of the United States,—the laborers of all kinds as well as the agriculturalists,—the incorruptible mass which will long save our country from that fate. The Roman Senate had been twice bribed by Jugurtha,—an African and almost a negro,—Cato had been defeated for the consulship by Clodius,—before Cæsar marched his legions to the capital. Let us cherish our productive classes; let us promote their independence; let us multiply our freeholders and all the producers. Let us enhance the consideration of him whose labor draws wealth from the earth, and from its mines—from the forests and from the waters—and of him whose skill and industry imparts a new value to whatever the earth, the sea, the forest, and the mines produce. Let us cherish and advance these classes, and far distant is the day when a Cæsar, a Cromwell, or a Buonaparte is to be feared in our America.

This bill is one of the means, and the most essential one ever brought before Congress, for advancing the agricultural interest. The pre-emption bill which passed the Senate some weeks ago, does much for them; but the benefits of this bill will be far more extensive and diffusive. It will reach thousands where the other will reach hundreds. And now, what are the objections to this measure? What are the objections to it? For the human mind is so constructed that there must be variations of opinion upon every subject, and more or less opposition to every measure. This beneficent bill is opposed! Called for by the united voice of the whole West, it is opposed by the voice of a single Western State! The gentlemen from Kentucky [Messrs. CLAY and CRITTENDEN] oppose it; the undivided phalanx of Senators from Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Missouri, Michigan, Arkansas, Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama, and Tennessee, support it. Kentucky stands alone in he Great West, sole opponent, on this floor, to this great Western measure!

And what are the objections which are brought forward? What are they? Are they such as have any foundation in reason, in fact, or in propriety? Is there any Senator who argues that sterile land is as valuable as fertile—that the last choice is as good as the first—that ridges, hills and swamps, knobs and mountains, arid prairies, pine barrens, post oak flats, stony points and brushwood jungles—the refuse of scores of years' of sales and donations—is there any Senator to stand up and maintain the affirmative of these propositions, and to justify, upon the principle of a uniformity of value, the uniformity of price, for all these varieties of soil? No, sir: no one is found to stand up and expose himself to such a glaring absurdity. Other reasons must be sought for. The region of imagination—the field of wild conjecture—the visionary creations of fancy, must be resorted to, in order to conjure up something that can be paraded before the Senate. In this far distant search after arguments, a motley array of baseless reasons has been gathered into he service, the whole of them invalid, and a part of them such as would discredit the political economy of boarding school misses.

It is assumed that the Federal Treasury is to lose a quarter of a dollar an acre upon every acre of land that is sold for one dollar; and fifty cents per acre upon all the sales for seventy-five cents; and so on through the whole scale of graduation. This is assumed; and then an imposing table of calculations is made out, and presented to the Senate, exhibiting tens of millions and hundreds of millions of dollars to the loss to the Treasury. It is difficult to reply to such objections without using language which the moderation of parliamentary debate forbids. In the first place, the assumption is absolutely unfounded! It is an absolute error in point of fact! for these refuse lands are not worth a dollar and a quarter an acre; and, therefore, there is no loss in selling them for less. Even if they should be worth some cents more in the acre than they are sold for, the Government becomes the gainer by passing them into private hands, to pay taxes to the State, to contribute to the mass of cultivation and to the quantity of productions for home consumption, or for exportation. It would be true wisdom in the Government to make a donation to every cultivator of as much as would make him a reasonable farm. But gentlemen say, keep the land long enough and it will bring the dollar and a quarter. This, again, is untrue in point of fact, and is unjust and unwise in point of policy. Some of these lands will never rise to $1 25; others will not rise in centuries; in the mean time the actual value of the land, at simple interest, is sunk every sixteen years, and the States are injured for want of them. The actual value has already been lost two or three times over in the loss of the interest upon so much dead capital.

Sinking the price of all lands all over the Union, is another of the fine objections brought forward against this bill. It is pretended that it will have a universal effect on the price of property; that it will reduce the value of real estate in every part of the United States, and that every landholder will find his estate diminished in proportion to the reduction which this bill makes in the price of the refuse public lands. Sir, this is an argument to fear and avarice. It is an argument to alarm landholders in the old States, and to work upon their sense of interest in opposition to a sense of right. It is an absurd and ridiculous attempt to frighten and seduce the people of the old States. Why, sir, who ever heard of the price of good land being governed by the price of bad land? This bill operates only on the refuse, and it does not bring that refuse as low as the price of such refuse now is in every State of the Union. Go into any State, no matter what one, and you will find millions, and in some States tens of millions, of acres, which can be purchased for less than a dollar and a quarter an acre—for less than a dollar—less than seventy-five cents, or fifty cents, or twelve and a half cents! and millions of acres for which no price at all can be obtained. This is a truth which every Senator knows; and, therefore, every Senator must feel the absurdity of the argument which is brought forward. Philosophers tell us that a pea thrown into the Atlantic ocean will disturb the equilibrium of the waters on the coast of China; but no navigator has ever reported that his ship was endangered by such a disturbance. So of this objection. Orators here affirm that it will affect the price of real estate all over the Union; the event will prove that it will have no more effect upon the price of land in the Atlantic States than the pea in the Atlantic ocean would have upon the sailing of Chinese junks in the Gulf of Tonquin.

The derangement of the whole landed system of the United States, is another of these objections brought forward to impede the passage of the bill, and is about as well-founded as all the rest. It has no foundation at all! not even a particle of truth to rest upon! The change of price has nothing to do with the structure of the land system. The system consists of the scientific mode of surveys—the land offices—and the patents derived from the United States. These compose the system, and the bill before us touches none of these things. It affects the price only, and in that it only follows the act of 1820—that act which reduced the price of lands from two dollars to one dollar twenty-five cents per acre. It follows that act, which no one pretended was an overthrow of the land system. It follows that act; but does not go its length; for the proposed reductions are not equal to the reduction then actually made. The reduction was then seventy-five cents in the acre; it is only proposed now to make reductions of twenty-five cents, and of fifty cents in the acre. The bill then has an example in our own legislation which answers the objection now brought forward; and it is to be remembered that the reduction of 1820 was opposed by the same arguments, and, so far as they remain in Congress, by the same persons, who opposed the reduction of 1820.

The loss of their population, by the old States, is another of these fine objections. Elaborate tables of comparison between the increase of population in the old and the new States are exhibited here; and the balance is shown to be to the prejudice of the old ones. It is shown that they are losing their population—that the new States are out-growing them—and that it is necessary to keep up the price of public lands in order to slacken the tide of this emigration. Sir, this is a strange objection. It is anti-national, anti-social, and anti-Western! It is an argument founded in sectional feelings, and calculated to array the old States against the new ones. It is an argument which turns its back upon the West, and caters to the jealousy of the East! It is an argument which counteracts the genius of our Constitution, and goes to array one half of the Union against the other. By the genius of our Constitution, the whole Union is considered as one country, and the right of every citizen is fully acknowledged to promote his happiness, and to better his condition if he can, by pursuing his own notions of his own interest; but by this objection the West is considered as an alien country! and the inhabitants of the Eastern States are contemplated as Russian serfs, attached to the soil of the lords paramount, and without the privilege of removing from it without the permission of their feudal barons. It is an objection which smells strongly of the high tariff system.

Such are the best of the objections urged against this measure; and these being the best, how miserable must be the remainder! Too miserable, surely, to merit a moment's consideration. Yet there is one which cannot be overlooked, though it is difficult to see with what propriety it was dragged into the debate. It is that famous Treasury Order of July 11th, 1836; which, in addition to its beneficial effects in favor of the public Treasury, has operated as a PRE-EMPTION LAW in favor of settlers and cultivators. That noble order drove the speculators, with their bank facilities—with their bales and bundles of bank notes—it drove them out of the field! It freed the settlers and cultivators from the competition of these harpies—the only competition which they have to fear; for no HARD MONEY MAN ever bids against a settler to take his home and his improvements for nothing. It is the PAPER MONEY SPECULATOR who performs that operation; and, therefore, the Treasury order, which expelled these speculators from the field, relieved the settlers and cultivators from their only dangerous competitor, and secured to them their homes and settlements at Government prices. As long as that noble order is maintained, just so long will the settlers and cultivators of the soil be free from the competition of speculators, and actually blessed with the main advantages of a general, permanent, and universal pre-emption law.

It is to no purpose that politicians, or speculators, or those interested in the banks, shall cry out against that order as imposing a hardship on the settler—as compelling him to purchase specie at a premium to enter land. Even if he had to do so, he would still gain by the operation; for it would be a great gain by paying two or three per cent. to get rid of the competition of a bank facility speculator, to whom fifty or a hundred dollars, more or less, in the price of a quarter section, is no object at all. The two or three per cent. frees him from a competition which might cost him fifties or hundreds of dollars. But it is not so. The farmer, the cultivator, and the settler, has no money but good money. He takes care to have hard money for the produce of his hard labor. He has the hard money any way, and has no business with treacherous paper. Seven millions of dollars in gold and silver paid into the land offices last year, and the whole of it by cultivators, attests the facility with which the farming interest can supply themselves with hard money. Notwithstanding the stoppage of the banks, seven millions were paid without difficulty last year. A far greater sum can be paid without difficulty this year, and next year, and every year to come. The specie in the country was estimated at eighty millions last year; it now exceeds ninety millions; and it will exceed one hundred millions before Christmas. Never did gold and silver flow so fast as at the present moment into the country. The gold bill, and the hard money policy of General Jackson, are now triumphant over the sneers and machinations of banks and politicians, and are saturating the land with the precious metals. Every farmer can now have all his productions paid for in hard money, and it is his own fault, and it may be his own sorrow, if he does not. To attack the Treasury order, is to attack the shield and ægis of the farmers! To revoke that order is to remove their protection, and to lay them open to the competition of speculators. To receive the notes of the banks for lands, is to give that credit to the banks which is denied to the citizens; for what is a bank note but a promissory note to pay money? Far better would it be to credit the farmers, if any credit is to be given. Far better would it be to take their promissory notes! for the farmers would never combine, as the banks have done, to dishonor their notes, and to leave the Government without revenue.

Mr. B. concluded with presenting the bill as a measure emphatically for the benefit of the agricultural interest—that great interest, which he declared to be the foundation of all national prosperity, and the backbone, and substratum of every other interest—which was, in the body politic, front rank for service, and rear rank for reward—which bore nearly all the burthens of Government while carrying the Government on its back—which was the fountain of good production, while it was the pack-horse of burthens, and the broad shoulders which received nearly all losses—especially from broken banks. This bill was for them; and, in voting for it, he had but one regret, and that was, that it did not go far enough—that it was not equal to their merits.

MR. CLAY'S RESOLUTION.

DEBATE IN THE SENATE,

WEDNESDAY, May 2, 1838.

On motion of Mr. CLAY of Kentucky the following resolution, submitted by him, was taken up, and read the second time:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That no discrimination shall be made as to the currency or medium of payment in the several branches of the public revenue, or in debts or dues to the Government; and that, until otherwise ordered by Congress, the notes of sound banks which are payable and paid on demand in the legal currency of the United States, under suitable restrictions, to be forthwith prescribed and promulgated by the Secretary of the Treasury, shall be received in payment of the revenue and of debts and dues to the Government, and shall be subsequently disbursed, in course of public expenditure, to all public creditors who are willing to receive them.

Mr. WRIGHT moved to refer it to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky said if the Senator from New York would assign any sufficient reason for the reference, he would not object to it. The resolution, he said, or some measure like it, was not only called for by the situation of the country, but its adoption would be attended by the most practical benefits. It contained two principles: first, to do away with all discrimination in the payment of the revenue, whether derived from the lands or the customs, and as, on that subject, the Senate had already expressed its opinion by an almost unanimous vote, he could not see the necessity of a reference of it. The second provision was that, until otherwise ordered by Congress, the notes of sound and specie-paying banks shall be received and paid out in the receipts and expenditures of the Government. Now it appeared to him that that principle was so simple that every Senator could comprehend it, and therefore, there was no necessity for referring it. He was only anxious for a speedy action on the subject.

Mr. WRIGHT had no objection to state the views which governed him in making this motion, and he hoped they would induce the Senate to think that the matter was not so clear as the Senator from Kentucky supposed. He was well aware that the first branch of the resolution was in terms, such as the Senate by a strong vote incorporated in the bill in relation to the finances sent to the other House; and it seemed to him that would supersede the necessity of a repetition of it, in sending it again to the House. That, however, was not the question. The last clause of the resolution was on a subject that had constituted part of the legislation of the country, from the commencement of the Government; and it did seem to him that an examination was proper, to see how far the resolution would conflict with the existing laws. The resolution proposed to go much farther than any act of Congress had ever gone. But we well know that we have recently passed laws on the subject, (the deposite bill of 1836,) in reference to notes that may be received. He recollected in 1834, when the political friends of the gentleman had predominance in the Senate, provisions were passed in reference to bills to be received by it; and now the provision is that the bills shall not only be received, but paid by it. How far it was designed by the resolution to repeal all former legislation, without saying so, in terms, he did not know, but it was quite certain that an inquiry to see how far the resolution would conflict with the existing laws, was highly necessary. No act of Congress has ever made it imperative on the Treasury to receive and pay out bank bills as contemplated by the resolution. In proposing the reference, Mr. W. did not wish to delay the action of the Senate on the resolution. He was only for satisfying himself and others on the points he had adverted to.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky said he had attended very respectfully to all that had been said by the Senator from New York, and he owned that he had heard nothing to satisfy him of the propriety of a reference. Mr. C. then went into an argument to show the expediency of passing the resolution. Now he said was the accepted time to act, and to signify to the whole country that there was no intention to persevere in a course of discrimination with regard to the money to be received in payment of the revenue.

Mr. WRIGHT did not design to protract the discussion. He would say one or two words in answer to the Senator from Kentucky. The first design in passing the resolution, was to sustain the banks in resuming specie payments. The banks of New York had resumed, and he discovered by public papers, that several of the banks of Boston had also resumed; and he discovered from the same source of information, that the collector of the customs and the post office were receiving their notes. The resolution would, therefore, do no good, for the notes of the banks that have resumed are received and disbursed, precisely as they were before the suspension of specie payments.

Mr. CLAY: am I to understand that the notes of these are received and disbursed by the public agents.

Mr. WRIGHT said so he understood by the papers; and, so far as he was concerned, he would agree to receive and pay out the notes of all sound and specie-paying banks. But it would be in vain for the Government to issue a notice in advance, that the Government would receive the notes, till the banks put themselves in a position to render them receivable under the existing laws. He could not agree that the Senate should legislate with reference to bank notes, and put them on the same footing with our own paper. One objection to the resolution had been confirmed by the remarks of the honorable Senator; and that was, that all the money to be received, from New York, for instance, in bank paper, was to be disbursed in whatever portion of the country disbursements were to be made. Then what position did you put the country in? You must send the New York bank notes to the extreme South; and there, if the public creditor refuses them, he must be paid in specie, which is to be transported there at great trouble and expense. This might be a very great advantage to the New York banks to compel their notes to be paid out for one-half the expenditures of the Government. He would detain the Senate no longer, but ask for the yeas and nays on the question.

The yeas and nays were accordingly ordered.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky, said it appeared to him that the reference was urged, not for the purpose of an examination into the merits of the resolution, but for the purpose of opposing it altogether. The Senator tells us, said Mr. C. of the resumption of the banks of New York, and says that, therefore, the resolution with regard to them is unnecessary. Now, the resumption of the New York banks was not in consequence of their ability to resume, but of the law of that State, which made it imperative on them to do so by the 9th or 10th. There was a wide difference between actual resumption and the nominal resumption of the New York banks, not venturing to put out their notes. But it seemed the collector and postmaster was doing what the resolution proposed they should do—that they were doing, without law, what he proposed they should do in consequence of law. As to sending the notes of New York to the extreme South or West, to pay them out for the expenditures of the Government, it would be a bungling operation. He supposed the Government might authorize some one to draw for them on New York, and the drafts would sell for a heavy premium. Mr. C. spoke of the great benefits that would result to New York from the measure, and concluded by expressing the opinion that nothing but the establishment of a National Bank would effectually remedy the evils of a disordered currency, and that without it, the country would be perpetually exposed to the difficulties and embarrasments under which it was now suffering.

Mr. CALHOUN said he was gratified that the Senator from Kentucky had introduced this resolution. The banks were about to resume specie payment, or rather had actually resumed, and this in the most easy manner, and in the shortest period, that resumption had ever been effected, notwithstanding all the predictions to the contrary, so confidently made on the opposite side, that resumption was impossible without the aid of Government.

The movement was an important one, and demanded our immediate attention, in order to determine what relation we ought to assume in reference to the banks, in the new condition in which they now are, or shortly may be. The resolution offered a favorable opportunity for the consideration of the subject, which he thought ought to be embraced.

He had turned his attention partially to the subject, and intended to do so much more fully, before the resolution was taken up for discussion; but with the slight consideration which he had given it, he felt a strong conviction that a reunion with the banks, as proposed by the resolution, would, at no distant day, be followed by another shock, such as that in May last, but still more terrific. He would not enter on the discussion now, but hoped an opportunity would be afforded him, in the progress of the resolution, to assign his reasons for this belief, and when, he trusted, he would be able to satisfy the Senate that it was well founded.

In the mean time, acting under its influence, he, for one, would do no act to countenance, in any way, a reunion with the banks. Indeed, he could not see how even those who are in favor of a reunion, could justify a vote in its favor, unless some measure should first be adopted to guard against a recurrence of a calamity which he regarded as so obviously inevitable, without some effectual remedy to prevent it. As to himself, he believed that a National Bank was totally out of the question, and, if it were not, it would prove, if adopted under existing circumstances, one of the greatest calamities that could befal the country.

Thus thinking, it appeared to him, that this resolution should undergo a full and deliberate investigation, and, for that purpose, if the chairman of the Committee on Finance was in his seat, he would ask him to withdraw his motion for a reference, in order to assign an early day, say Monday or Tuesday next, to take up the resolution for discussion. After the views of the Senate had been fully expressed, if it should be thought advisable, it might then be referred.

After some remarks from Mr. DAVIS,

Mr. BENTON rose and addressed the Senate in favor of the reference. His remarks were given in last night's paper.

Mr. CLAY did not rise with a view to reply to any thing that had been said by the Senator last up, but merely to make a single remark in answer to the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN.] That Senator had said that the banks were about to resume without any assistance from Government or any agency on its part. He wished it were so; but what were the facts in the case? With the exception of a few banks in New York, and probably one or two in New Jersey, none others had admitted their readiness to resume. Some of these institutions had named the first of January as the earliest period, while others again thought a much longer period would be required. We all knew that those of Tennessee, Arkansas, and Mississippi would not be ready under two years. What he, Mr. C. meant to say was, there would be no general resumption. He had never said that a United States Bank was indispensable to a resumption of specie payments. What he had said, and what he would say now, was, that under the present deposite system, without the agency of a United States Bank, if they did resume they could not continue for any length of time. Mr. C. said he was well aware that the discussion of the the question of a United States Bank was foreign to the matter before them just then; but he was for a Bank of the United States, and wished it so pronounced, so understood, that every man, woman, and child, should know it; and he would take some suitable occasion hereafter to present his views in relation to a United States Bank, such as he thought would be required by the exigency of the times. What his resolution proposed was to give the sanction of law to this measure, and not leave it to the whim and caprice of the Postmaster General and the Secretary of the Treasury. He thought there was no necessity for a reference; there was no objection to the phraseology of the resolution; it was the principles contained in it which caused the opposition; and to refer it to a committee, a majority of whom were known to be decidedly hostile, would be contrary to all parliamentary usage, and he hoped it would not be referred.

Mr. CALHOUN said that in making the declaration he did, that specie payments had been resumed, he did not suppose that any Senator would understand him as affirming that all the banks had commenced paying specie. He only meant to say that a commencement had been made; and that in spite of the declaration, so confidently made, that it could not be without the aid of the Government. He ventured little in saying, that what had been commenced, would, under the operation of the causes that had produced it, go on till there would be a general resumption; and that an event so desired would be accomplished in the shortest time, and with the least pressure, under the action of natural causes, without the aid of quackery. Under this impression, he had from the first opposed all intermeddling on our part. He had always, as he expressed himself at the extra session, dreaded the doctor more than the disease.

He could not agree with the mover of this resolution, that this was an improper time to discuss the merits of a National Bank. He (the mover) as well as the Senator from Massachusetts farthest from the Chair, agreed that unless some effectual remedy should be adopted, another bank explosion would in a few years take place. The thing is inevitable, and how can they or any one who thinks with them, justify their vote in favor of this resolution, which proposes to unite the Government with the banks, without applying the only remedy, which, according to their conception, can prevent so great a calamity? If the application is impossible now, it would only prove, even according to their own conception, that the time for a reunion with the banks has not yet arrived.

As to himself, he agreed that there were but two measures which could possibly prevent a repetition of the explosion, which it is now contended on all sides must follow, without the application of some effectual remedy: a complete and an entire divorce from the whole system, or the establishment of a National Bank; and, of the two, he considered the former as by far the most safe and effectual. This resolution proposes an entire abandonment of the divorce, without substituting the Bank, or any other preventive measure in its place, which appeared to him by far the least defensible course that could be adopted. The plainest dictates of prudence demanded that we should adhere to the remedy we have, till another could be substituted. At all events, this was the suitable moment to determine on our future course; and the opportunity which this resolution afforded for discussion and deliberation, ought not to be permitted to pass in silence. Specie is flowing in with a strong current from all quarters, just as it did previous to the late suspension; and unless some measure be adopted to prevent it, it will become the means of enlarging banking operations, instead of entering into the general circulation of the country, in the same manner as it did then. The result will inevitably be another expansion, and another explosion more calamitous than the late, unless, as he had said, some effectual measure be adopted to prevent it. He, and those who thought with him, believed that the most safe and effectual was a complete and entire divorce from the banking system; while those who differed from us, for the most part, believed that a National Bank was the only safe and effectual measure. Now was the time for a thorough examination and comparison of the two measures. Indeed, he could not see how even the friends of a reunion could vote for this measure, without previously adopting some remedy against the danger which even they admitted. The country could not stand another explosion. It would not only overthrow the banking system, but would shake our institutions to their centre.

The Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAVIS,] said, as he understood him, that the late explosion was caused by the Independent Treasury scheme Such he conceived not to be the fact. Instead of being the cause, it was but the consequence. The existing laws provided, that on the banks ceasing to pay specie, they should cease to be the fiscal agents of the Government, and have their notes received in the public dues. The Independent Treasury was the result of this provision, and has, in fact, been in existence ever since the explosion. Under its operation, the banks are gradually resuming specie payments, and the currency returning comparatively to a sound condition. But for that, it would have become daily more and more bloated, till the disease would have been utterly incurable. Every State would have had a direct interest in enlarging its circulation; for the more expanded the circulation, the greater would have been the depreciation, and the greater the depreciation at any point, the more certainly would the commerce of the country have been attracted to it, just as was the case after the late war. The reason is obvious. The greater the depreciation, the less in reality would be the amount of duty paid. It was thus that the divorce had not only checked the increase of the evil, but had, in a great measure, counteracted it; and it was a safe conclusion, that a remedy which had proved so efficacious in remedying the disease, should prove not less so, if persisted in, to prevent its recurrence.

The mover of the resolution thinks very differently. He believes a National Bank to be the only effectual remedy, and promises to suggest a project for one during the present session. He was glad to hear him say so. Now was the time, and he hoped that he would be prepared to suggest his plan when his resolution should be taken up for discussion.

Mr. C. said, that as the chairman of the Committee on Finance was now in his place, he would renew the expression of his hope that he would not insist on a reference. He thought the better course would be for the discussion to precede the reference; but he would, notwithstanding, vote for it, if insisted on, as he did not wish to embarrass any arrangement the committee may have made.

Mr. DAVIS opposed the reference, as he saw no necessity for sending it to a committee, and particularly to one known to be opposed to all the principles contained in the resolution. Mr. D. said he had expressed an apprehension that there would be another explosion, and he thought it just as likely to occur under the Sub-Treasury scheme as any other. A United States Bank would act as a regulator, a kind of a balance wheel, to the other institutions, and preserve soundness and order in the currency. So far as we had any experience, the nation had cause to be proud of such an institution—and almost all the ills we had suffered, were caused by the improper war made on that bank. The deposite system had resulted, as we all knew, disastrously, and the Sub-Treasury which was supposed to be a healing measure, was proved to be any thing else.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky said the banks in New York were to resume he was aware, but there was an immense difference between a nominal issue and a safe issue. Under the present state of things the banks could not lend; they did not know how long it might be the pleasure of those officers—the Postmaster General and the Secretary of the Treasury—to sustain them. They might come down upon the banks at their pleasure, demand the dues of Government in specie, and cripple those institutions in their business. What was wanted was some security in the shape of law, designating the medium in which the dues should be paid; and would it not be better to give them this security than leave them to the tender mercies of the Treasury and Post Office.

Mr. CALHOUN said he certainly did not think that the Senator from Kentucky "was so silly" as to introduce a bill to charter a Bank of the United States, after the sense of the Senate had been so unequivocally expressed against any such institution. He even considered him not a little indiscreet in promising to present the outlines of a bank, considering the object which he has in view. It was manifestly his intention to turn the public attention as strongly as possible towards a bank, as the only measure of relief. What he [Mr. CALHOUN] wanted, on the other hand, was some definite plan of such an institution to be proposed by its friends, in order to have something tangible, between which and the Sub-Treasury a comparison might be drawn. He felt very confident, whenever it was presented, that it would not be difficult to demonstrate the superiority of the latter to the former. He might be mistaken, but he could not but feel, after much reflection, that the establishment of a National Bank, under existing circumstances, for the purpose of regulating the currency, would prove a curse to the country. If made sufficiently powerful to effect that object, it would be too strong for our liberty; but, if not strong enough, it would be too weak to effect the object proposed, and, of course, would not prevent the explosion in the currency which, it is conceded on all sides, must again take place, if the Sub-Treasury be surrendered, and no effectual remedy be applied to prevent it.

Under this impression, he thought it highly desirable that the Senator should present his project now. He saw no reason for the delay; but, on the contrary, he regarded the present occasion, when we were called upon by the mover of the resolution to abandon the measure which has thus far proved effectual, and again to reunite the Government to the banks, as the most suitable of any to bring forward his plan.

Mr. PRESTON opposed the reference in a speech of some length. He animadverted on the course pursued by some of the Administration members, who contended that all connection between the Government and banks was dissolved by the suspension of specie payments, and voting against all banks as fraudulent and corrupt institutions, unworthy of public confidence, and now came forward and lauded these same institutions as great and glorious, and doing every thing for the good of the country. Mr. P. admitted that another explosion was not at all improbable, if they went on in the same wild way in relation to the Deposite System. The great object of Government should be to limit these moneyed corporations, and to regulate them by means of a United States Bank. He thought it infinitely better to regulate the system by law than to leave it to Executive usurpation.

Mr. NILES then spoke against the resolution. His remarks were given in last night's paper.

Mr. BUCHANAN did not rise to prolong this debate, but merely to state the reason, without entering into any argument, which would induce him to vote for the reference of this resolution to the Committee on Finance. He was anxious to place his vote upon this question in such a light that it could not be misunderstood. If he had been successful in obtaining the floor at an earlier stage of the debate, he thought he could have demonstrated, that in every statesmanlike and in every practical view of the subject, the resolution of 1816, in regard to the receipt of the notes of specie paying banks, was better than the resolution proposed by the Senator from Kentucky. If his resolution had merely proposed to revive the resolution of 1816 in regard to the public lands, and to place them upon the same footing with the customs, it should have received his [Mr. B's] support. The purposes for which the Specie Circular was called into existence, had long been accomplished. No reason any longer existed to continue the discrimination between the currency receivable in payment of the public lands and in payment of duties. There was now a powerful reason why this discrimination should cease. How could it be expected that the Western banks would resume specie payments, under the operation of that circular? If all the public lands must be paid for in gold and silver, (and extensive sales had recently been advertised,) whilst the customs were paid in bank paper, would not this produce a run upon the Western banks, and drain them of all their specie, in case they resumed? He would place the Western and Eastern banks precisely on the same footing; he would interpose no obstacle in the way of resumption; and then he would call upon them all to redeem their notes in specie. Had the resolution of the Senator, therefore, been confined to a repeal of the discrimination which now existed, he must have voted for it, or abandoned his fixed opinions, which had already repeatedly received the sanction of the Senate.

As the proposed resolution was not confined to this object, he hoped that it might be referred; and when the report of the committee should be made, he would then undertake to prove that the resolution of 1816, the construction of which had become settled by a practice of more than twenty years, was better for the Government, better for the banks, and better for the people, than the change now proposed to be adopted.

Mr. B. said the ordinary and proper course was to refer all such resolutions, after they had been twice read, to the appropriate committee, which, in this case, was the Committee on Finance. He felt a high respect for the intelligence and financial knowledge of this committee, and he would not give any vote which might be considered disrespectful to them in the slightest degree. Besides, he was anxious to have a report from them on the second branch of the proposed resolution. He thought such a report might be made as would satisfy even the Senator from Kentucky himself, that the resolution of 1816 was preferable to his own.

Mr. B. as an individual member of the Senate, would not undertake to propose such an amendment to the Senator's resolution as would make it satisfactory to himself, when we had been assured that we might speedily expect a report from the committee. He could see no want of fairness in making this reference. On the contrary, he should consider it a want of courtesy towards the committee to vote against the motion which had been made by their chairman. In no event could it prevent the Senator from Kentucky from bringing his proposition fairly before the Senate.

After some remarks from Messrs. TIPTON, KING, and CLAY of Kentucky, the question was taken on the reference, and it was carried—yeas 28, nays 19, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Lyon, Morris, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Trotter, Wall, Williams, Wright, and Young—28.

NAYS—Messrs. Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Knight, Merrick, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Robbins, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Spence, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Webster, and White—19.

The Senate then adjourned.

REMARKS OF MR. BENTON, OF MISSOURI.

In Senate, May 2, 1838—On the resolution of Mr. CLAY of Kentucky for the receipt and disbursement of bank notes in the revenues and expenditures of the Government—the question being on its reference to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BENTON rose to make some remarks on the distress which had just been resuscitated for the occasion, and made to play its part again in discussions on this floor. He knew of no distress, except at New York, where they had more gold and silver than they knew what to do with, and from which nobody would relieve them by coming and taking a part; and except among the advocates of a National Bank, whose distress is agonizing at seeing specie payments resumed without the creation of a National Bank. These were the only cases of distress now visible; and they were real and afflicting cases, especially the latter. The advocates for a National Bank saw all their predictions defeated by the event; their thousand millions of asseverations that there never could be a resumption until a National Bank was rechartered, were all blown sky high! Resumption had begun, and they could not defeat it, and their distress was not only great, but without sympathy; for it was sorrow in the midst of universal joy.

This resolution of the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] is to aid the banks to resume—to aid, encourage, and enable them to resume. This is its object, as declared by its mover; and it is offered here after the leading banks have resumed, and when no power can even prevent the remaining solvent banks from resuming. Doubtless, immortal glory will be acquired by this resolution! It can be heralded to all corners of the country, and celebrated in all manner of speeches and editorials, as the miraculous cause of an event which had already occurred! Yes, sir, already occurred! for the solvent banks have resumed, are resuming, and will resume. Every solvent bank in the United States will have resumed in a few months, and no efforts of the insolvents and their political confederates can prevent it. In New York the resumption is general; in Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Maine, and New Jersey, it is partial; and every where the solvent banks are preparing to redeem the pledge which they gave when they stopped—that of resuming whenever New York did. The insolvent and political banks will not resume at all, or, except for a few weeks, to fail again, make a panic and a new run upon the resuming banks, stop them if possible, then charge it upon the Administration, and recommence their lugubrious cry for a National Bank.

The resumption will take place. The masses of gold and silver pouring into the country under the beneficent effects of General Jackson's hard money policy, will enable every solvent bank to resume; a moral sense, and a fear of consequences, will compel them to do it. The importations of specie are now enormous, and equalling every demand, if it was not suppressed. There can be no doubt but that the quantity of specie in the country is equal to the amount of bank notes in circulation—that they are dollar for dollar—that the country is better off for money at this day than it ever was before, though shamefully deprived of the use of gold and silver by the political and insolvent part of the banks and their confederate politicians. On this point a document would soon be forthcoming to establish its truth. The document called for this morning in relation to the local banks, and which the Treasury will furnish, will show the amount of the bank circulation; and that amount will not exceed the quantity of gold and silver now in the country, or known to be coming into it. A hundred millions of specie may be assumed to be the amount in the country before the rise of the present Congress; and out of that amount every solvent bank in the Union can supply its wants. None admitted they had any wants when they stopped except the New York banks; all the rest stopped without standing a run or admitting a want. They stopped upon example, and not upon necessity, and pledged themselves to resume when New York did. New York has resumed, and they are bound to redeem their pledge, or admit its falsity. More than that, New York offers supplies of specie to all other banks. She has no need for the quantity she has received; she cannot use it; she is offering it to all other banks, especially to the non-resuming Bank of the United States. She is calling upon all solvent banks to come and get supplied; and if she cannot get it taken off her hands in the United States, she will be forced to reship it to Europe; for the quantity is too great to be used in her own business. There is specie enough then in the country to enable every bank to resume, and the moral sense of some, and the fear of consequences in others, will induce a resumption by all except the insolvent and the political ones. Many are the banks which have resumed and will resume from a sense of what is right—from a feeling of honesty—from a determination to pay what they owe; many others will resume from the fear of consequences, and because they know that protracted suspension must end in the total destruction of the whole banking system. The solvent banks will resume, and Congress cannot prevent them if it tried. They have received the aid which they need in the $100,000,000 of gold and silver which now relieves the country, and distresses the politicians who predicted no relief, until a National Bank was created. Of the nine hundred banks in the country, there are many which never can resume, and which should not attempt it, except to wind up their affairs. Many of these are rotten to the core, and will fall to pieces the instant they are put to the specie test. Some of them even fail now for rags; several have so failed in Massachusetts and Ohio, to say nothing of those called wild cats—the progeny of a general banking law in Michigan. We want a resumption to discriminate between banks, and to save the community from impositions. The renowned Sancho Panza has told us that all cats are of one color in the dark; so of the banks: they are all alike during the suspension. Resumption will discriminate them, and that resumption is at hand. It has began where the suspension began—in New York. It has began where the main cause for the stoppage existed—in that city where the public moneys were accumulated, and where they were suddenly called for in masses, at short intervals, to be distributed among the States. The banks had lent that money under our sanction; to call for it suddenly, was to reduce them to the alternative of breaking their customers, or breaking themselves. I was one of half a dozen who opposed that law: I then said in my place that it must be fatal to large deposite banks; that they would have to choose between ruin to themselves, or to their customers. These banks had cause for stopping; they are the only ones, according to all the declarations, which had a cause for it. The rest stopped, or professed to stop, upon example; and pledged themselves to follow the example of resumption as promptly as they had followed that of suspension. Some redeem this pledge; others violate it, and at the head of these violators, is the Bank of the United States. But New York has not merely set the example of resumption; it also offers the means of resumption to all others. The insolvent and political banks alone refuse the means; and, covering their conduct with false pretexts, exert themselves to perpetuate the reign of shin-plasters and irredeemable paper money.

Distress! to relieve the distress! this is declared to be the object of the resolution! and the mover seems to be in furious haste to get it through quick, lest the distress will be all gone, and the glory of relieving it will be lost. This resolution is now to do what nothing but the creation of a National Bank could do—it is to relieve the distress! Sir, the distress is gone; it has gone off like the panic distress of 1833 went off; it has fled before an avalanche of gold and silver. An arrival of twenty millions of specie frightened off distress in 1834; an arrival of twenty-five or thirty millions has chased it off again. The only real distress is that of the New York banks, which have more specie than they can use; and that of politicians, who see that General Jackson's policy is victorious—that the gold bill and the hard money policy are filling the country with specie, and drawing the line between the solvent banks on one hand, and the insolvent and political ones on the other.

We have gone through a similar scene to that of the panic session of 1833–34. Then there was a ditty incontinently sung upon this floor, and taken up and sung again all over the country. It ran in these words: "That the removal of the deposites made the distress; and nothing could relieve the distress but the restoration of the deposites, or the recharter of the bank." This was the musical ditty with which the ears of a continent were entertained for six months; yet the deposites were not restored, the bank was not rechartered, and the distress did cease. Even while this pretty little ditty was still in the course of rehearsal here, the Bank, as if in contempt of all its votaries, wheeled about, stopped its pressure, commenced relief, and ran out in six months an expansion of twenty millions of loans and ten millions of circulation. Seeing that the arrival of the specie had put an end to the distress, the Bank changed her tactics; and having failed to crush the local banks by compression, the next step was to burst them by distension. So of this resolution. Since May last, we have had the incessant cry, "That the Treasury order made the suspension, and nothing could produce a resumption but a repeal of the order and the recharter of the Bank of the United States." This song has had its day. It has been sung to death; it is dead. It has shared the fate of the sweet little ditty about the removal of the deposites. The Treasury order is not repealed, the Bank of the United States is not rechartered, and the solvent banks have resumed, or will do it. The river Pactolus has poured its golden flood into the country. Every body sees and feels that the country is relieved; and now this resolution, like a Harlequin leaping upon the stage, jumps up before us to claim the honor of accomplishing that which already exists. The professed object of this resolution is to aid the banks—to aid banks which are already full of specie, and offering it to others! This is the professed object. Its effect will be to do what was done in 1834—to run out another expansion—create another season of delusive prosperity—followed by another catastrophe, to be charged again upon the Administration. It is found that the country cannot be depressed for more than one year at a time—that the export of a single crop relieves it. The mode of operating must then be changed. Another expansion, followed by another catastrophe, to be accomplished in the summer of 1840, may turn the scale of the Presidential election at that time; and two years are enough to organize an expansion and explosion. The last expansion and explosion was commenced and completed in two years. It began in June, 1835, and finished in May, 1837. Another one can be accomplished in the same time. Begin it now, and it can be consummated in the summer of 1840, in the exact time for the Presidential election of that year. Pass this resolution, or any thing like it, and a grand expansion will immediately ensue, to be followed by a grand explosion—to be laid, of course, upon the Administration. What is this resolution? It is to make all the notes of all the banks in the United States a legal tender to the United States in payment of lands and customs, and all debts and dues, and a forced tender from the Federal Government to all its creditors. It is a PAPER MONEY and SHIN-PLASTER RESOLUTION! the adoption of which would surrender the public lands to nine hundred banks for a fund to redeem their notes—would fill the Treasury with notes which could never be redeemed—would dispense with the use of gold and silver at home—would occasion the exportation of the one hundred millions which the Jacksonian policy has collected in the country—would reduce the country to broken bank notes and shin-plasters in two years, and raise another cry for the establishment of a National Bank. These would be the consequences of the adoption of the resolution; and I announce them in advance, that I, for one, may warn the country of the impending mischief, and exhibit this proposition at once in its hideous and revolting colors.

We wanted specie, and we have got it Five years ago—at the veto session of 1832—there were but twenty millions in the country. So said the Senator from Massachusetts who has just resumed his seat, [Mr. WEBSTER.] We have now, or will have in a few weeks, one hundred millions. This is the salvation of the country. It compels resumption, and has defeated all the attempts to scourge the country into a submission to a National Bank. While that one hundred millions remains, the country can place at defiance the machinations of the Bank of the United States, and its confederate politicians, to perpetuate the suspension, and to continue the reign of rags and shin-plasters. Their first object is to get rid of these hundred millions, and all schemes yet tried have failed to counteract the Jacksonian policy. Ridicule was tried first; deportation of specie was tried next; a forced suspension has been continued for a year; the State Governments and the people were vanquished; still the specie came in, because the Federal Government created a demand for it. This fatal demand has frustrated all the schemes to drive off specie, and to deliver up the country to the dominion of the paper money party. This demand has been the stumbling block of that party; and this resolution now comes to remove that stumbling block. It is the most revolting proposition ever made in this Congress! It is a flagrant violation of the Constitution, by making paper money a tender both to and from the Government. It is fraught with ruin and destruction to the public property, the public Treasury, and the public creditors. The notes of nine hundred banks are to be received into the Treasury, and disbursed from the Treasury. They are to be paid out as well as paid in. The ridiculous proviso of willingness to receive them on the part of the public creditor is an insult to him; for there is no choice; it is that or nothing. The disbursing officer does not offer hard money with one hand, and paper with the other, and tell the creditor to take his choice. No! he offers paper or nothing! To talk of willingness, when there is no choice, is insult, mockery and outrage. Great is the loss of popularity which this Administration has sustained from paying out depreciated paper; great the deception which has been practised upon the Government in representing this paper as being willingly received. Necessity and not good will, ruled the creditor; indignation, resentment, and execrations on the Administration, were the thanks with which he received it. This has disgraced and injured the Administration more than all other causes put together; it has lost it tens of thousands of true friends. It is now getting into a condition to pay hard money; and this resolution comes to prevent such payment, and to continue and to perpetuate the ruinous paper money payments. Defeat the resolution, and the Government will quickly pay all demands upon it in gold and silver, and will recover its popularity; pass it, and paper money will continue to be paid out, and the Administration will continue to lose ground.

It is the duty of the Federal Government to diffuse the specie which its policy has brought into the country. This specie arrives at the sea ports, and a part of it has thence to be transferred to the interior of the country, and to the remote frontiers. Government payments will effect this diffusion. Hard money payments for lands will occasion gold and silver to be carried to the new States; specie payments to the army, militia, volunteers, laborers upon public works, and Indians, will diffuse it among the people. If not diffused, the specie now in the country will be exported, or will go to the creation of new banks, to flood the country again with paper money, and to make another expansion, followed by another explosion. The policy of General Jackson was to use the specie when it was brought; the effect of this resolution is to prevent it from being used, and to drive it away. His policy was to suppress all bank notes under twenty dollars, and to make gold and silver the medium of payment for all sums under that amount.

This resolution is to compel the repetition of the error which has already been so often fatal to the country. The original error of the Government, in relation to the currency, was in dispensing with specie, and resorting to the use of paper. General Hamilton effected this, first by violating the act of 1789, and next by establishing a national bank, with a charter right to pay its notes to the Government, and a de facto right to pay them out. The Federal Government having dispensed with the specie standard, all the States followed the example. They all dispensed with it, and substituted the paper of their banks, in the payment of their revenues. They created banks, with chartered privileges to pay the State revenues in their paper; of course the States had nothing else to pay out; and when the banks stopped, the Government stopped, or took depreciated paper. What the Government did the people were obliged to do. All had to dispense with the specie standard, and betake themselves to paper. This total dispensation of specie by the General Government, and the State Governments, left the country bare of hard money, and produced the catastrophes of 1814, and of 1819. Now for the first time in forty years the Government is determined to avoid General Hamilton's error. It is determined not to dispense with specie. It is determined to preserve the specie standard, and, by doing so, to create a demand for it, and a use for it, which will bring it in the country, keep it in the country, and diffuse it over the country. This resolution is to defeat that policy. It is to conquer the last remaining advocate for specie, and to inundate the whole Union with paper money. The General Government conquered, and the triumph of the paper money party is then complete. To this conquest all efforts are now turned. The whole struggle of the Federal party has been to force paper money upon the General Government. From this policy they have never deviated from the time of General Hamilton to the present day; but all their efforts put together fall short of the revolting effects of this desolating proposition.

The resolution proposes to make the notes of 900 banks the currency of the General Government, and the mover of the resolution tells you, at the same time, that all these banks will fail! that they cannot continue specie payments if they begin! that nothing but a National Bank can hold them up to specie payments, and that we have no such bank. This is the language of the mover; it is the language, also, of all his party; more than that it is the language of Mr. Biddle's letter—that letter which is the true exposition of the principles and policy of the Opposition party. Here then is a proposition to compel the Administration, by law, to give up the public lands for the paper of banks which are to fail—to fill the Treasury with the paper of such banks—and to pay out such paper to the public creditors. This is the proposition, and it is nothing but another form of accomplishing what was attempted in this chamber a few weeks ago, namely, a direct receipt of irredeemable paper money! That proposition was too naked and glaring; it was too rank and startling; it was rebuked and repulsed. A circuitous operation is now to accomplish what was then too rashly attempted by a direct movement. Receive the notes of 900 banks for the lands and duties; these 900 banks will all fail again; so says the mover, because there is no king bank to regulate them. We have then lost our lands and revenues, and filled our Treasury with irredeemable paper. This is just the point aimed at by the original proposition to receive irredeemable paper in the first instance: it ends in the reception of such paper. If the resolution passes there will be another explosion; for the receivability of these notes for the public dues, and especially for the public lands, will run out another vast expansion of the paper system, to be followed, of course, by another general explosion. The only way to save the banks is to hold them down to specie payments. To do otherwise, and especially to do what this resolution proposes, is to make the Administration the instrument of its own disgrace and degradation—to make it join in the ruin of the finances and the currency—in the surrender of the national domain for broken bank paper—and in producing a new cry for a National Bank as the only remedy for the evils it has produced.

The motion before the Senate is to refer the resolution to the Committee on Finance. It ought to be referred. It runs foul of too many laws and principles to be hurried on without the usual examination of a committee. If not referred, I shall be ready for it here, come when it may. I ask no time to prepare to encounter such a proposition. It is a mass of deformity, iniquity, and mischief. It goes to plunder the public lands, to ruin the revenue, to defraud the public creditors, to involve the country in shame and disaster, to re-establish a National Bank, and to perpetuate a paper-money Government. It goes to disgrace and destroy the Administration. It is a rebuke to all who voted for the Independent Treasury bill, and a modest request to them that they will stultify themselves by voting for a proposition standing in contradiction to every principle which they voted for in that bill. It goes to contradict every principle of General Jackson's hard-money policy—that policy which has received the sanction of an immense majority of the American people.

If referred, gentlemen may rest assured it will be back time enough for them. It is such a proposition as ought to be discussed, and will be discussed. It is a proposition to fix the attention of a continent. It goes to fundamental principles, and presents the fairest occasion for the array of parties which has yet been seen in Congress. It is paper-money and bank Government to the backbone; and, far from keeping such a resolution in a committee to avoid debate, I am for bringing on debate with all due speed. I rejoice that such a proposition is brought in, and shall make my thanks to all such customers for all such favors. I mean to speak to it when it comes back, and merely give it a passing compliment as it now goes out.

REMARKS OF MR. NILES,

ON THE SAME SUBJECT.

Mr. NILES said he felt reluctant to prolong the debate, yet would ask to be indulged in submitting a few remarks. The resolution he considered as a very extraordinary one, and the observations of the three gentlemen who had supported it were scarcely less remarkable. This resolution, consisting of ten or a dozen lines, has been treated by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] who introduced it, as though it was a trifling thing, which would be adopted almost as a matter of course. It required, in his view, no reference and no discussion; was a plain, simple proposition, which every one must be prepared to act upon. But brief as the resolution is, it contained principles of vital importance—principles which covered the whole ground occupied in the debate in which the Senate had been engaged for nearly four months during the late and present session. And he might say more than this: it embraced principles which lay at the foundation of the legislation of Congress since the commencement of the Government. And it proposes to reverse and set aside the fundamental principle, by which the legislation of Congress has been governed. It contains the novel and dangerous principle of legalizing a paper currency in the transactions of the Government. This has never been done, except so far as respects paper deriving its authority from Congress. The notes of State banks have never been made a legal currency in the collection and disbursement of the revenue. This resolution proposes to introduce that principle, and yet it is treated as of so little importance, as not to require to be disposed of in the usual way, and referred to a committee. The resolution contains two propositions: one, that the same currency shall be received in the different branches of the revenue; the other, that the notes of banks which are payable and paid in specie on demand shall be received and disbursed by the Government. The first of these propositions has been adopted by the Senate as an amendment to the Treasury bill that passed this body; the other was prepared as an amendment to that bill, and rejected by a considerable majority. That the Senate have changed their views on this subject, he had seen no reasons to believe.

It is said that because there are no details to be examined, there is no occasion for the reference. But considering the importance of the principles involved, and their connection with the legislation of Congress, is it not necessary to examine the operation of these principles upon existing laws? The resolution proposes to renew the connection between the Government and the banks; and this is to be done without any limitation or restriction whatever. The resolution would therefore repeal, or supersede, all the existing laws on the subject. So far as bank notes are now authorized to be received and disbursed, it is subject to certain regulations, limitations, and restrictions. The joint resolution of 1816, the deposite act of 1836, and an act passed the same session, in regard to the payment of bank notes, all contain restrictions and limitations which this resolution would entirely sweep away. At a time when a majority of the Senate have decided to disconnect the Government from banks altogether, it is proposed to unite them more closely than they have ever been—a union which is to be beneficial on one side only; which is to favor the banks without any corresponding advantage to the Government; which is to open the Treasury door wider than it has ever been, and expose it to be filled with paper of every description, without any check or restraint whatever, either as to the denomination of the bills, or the limits within which the receiving officers shall be required to take the paper of State banks. A receiver in Arkansas would be bound to take the notes of a bank in Bangor, and judge of its soundness; and the collector at the latter place would be required to receive the notes of a bank in Arkansas. Mr. N. said he was aware that there was a provision in the resolution authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to prescribe regulations as to the receipts and disbursements, but that would give him no power to limit the operation of the resolution. He could no more do this than he could repeal the law. To limit its operations would be to repeal it in part. The resolution would make the receipt of the notes of all specie-paying banks, wherever located, obligatory on all collectors of revenue. This is perfectly clear. For several years it has been the policy of this Government to endeavor to exert a salutary influence on the paper currency through the operations of the Treasury; and all the laws designed to effect this purpose, to which the Senator from Virginia [Mr. RIVES] attaches so much importance, are to be superseded by this resolution, and that without even a reference of it.

But, sir, what is the object of this resolution? what purpose is to be effected by it? what is the necessity for it? The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. PRESTON] has used a very strange argument. He says the measure for divorcing the Government from the banks has failed; that it has been decided that the separation shall not take place, and, therefore, it has become necessary to provide for regulating the connection between the Treasury and the banks. Does he suppose there is any want of laws to regulate this matter? The disconnection has not been from a repeal of, or defect in, the laws, but from the failure of the banks, which threw them out of the pale of your laws. When the banks resume the laws will again be in force, and the banks will be entitled to the benefits of them. It will be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to employ them as depositories, and he will no doubt authorize the receipt of their notes, subject to the restrictions of the law. What occasion, then, is there for further legislation? The majority of the Senate have decided in favor of disconnecting the finances of the Government from those of the banks; but, if this measure shall fail, we have only to fall back on the existing laws, and, when the banks resume, things will be precisely where they were. The connection revives without the aid of Congress. There is no occasion for legislation, unless it is proposed to change the existing laws, and effect a more intimate connection between the Treasury and the banks, entirely free from the restraints and regulations which they impose. Is this the object of the resolution? If not, what is it? Is it called for, because the laws are not properly executed, or a proper construction put upon them? because the Secretary of the Treasury is pursuing a course hostile and illiberal towards the banks? Is there any foundation for such an opinion? It has already been stated in this debate, that the notes of banks which are paid in specie, except so far as they are restricted by law, are directed to be received, and are in fact received, at the custom houses and post offices. But we are told that this is unauthorized, and without legal sanction. How consistent, to charge the Government with being hostile to the banks, and at the same moment to complain of the Secretary of the Treasury for receiving and paying out bank notes without any legal authority for doing it! This point is well understood by every one, and there is no occasion to illustrate it. There is no compulsion on the Secretary to take bank notes, but he is fully authorized to do it. If there was ever any doubt about the construction of the resolution of 1816, the question has been settled by a practice of more than twenty years. Although there is nothing compulsory as to the receipt of bank notes, yet it has been the practice of the Treasury to receive them, and pay them out, under certain restrictions and regulations.

Sir, there can be no object in this resolution, unless it is to change the existing laws; to give the banks privileges which they do not now enjoy. We are told that it is proper for the Treasury to aid them in the resumption of specie payments, and that this is only a temporary measure for that purpose. How a temporary measure? It is to continue during the pleasure of Congress, and no law can continue any longer. But if this is the purpose, the resolution rests altogether on a false assumption. It is assumed that the banks cannot resume without aid from the Government. This has been declared by the head of the chief banking institution. And are we to be called upon to act to carry out his purposes, or establish his predictions? What foundation is there for this opinion? Have not the banks already resumed in New York, in Boston, in Albany, and some others? And what difficulty is there in all sound banks resuming? Circumstances are so favorable for it, that they cannot avoid resuming. Exchanges have been for a long time decidedly in our favor, and instead of specie going out of the country, it is coming in with a flood tide. The quantity received is without any example in the history of the country; ten millions have been received within a few weeks, principally gold. The premium on specie is gone, and the country is flooding with gold; and yet we are told the banks cannot resume payment without the aid of the Government. All solvent, sound banks can resume when they please; and those which are not sound, which have not reduced their circulation, diminished their loans, and concentrated their resources, cannot resume, whatever aid they may receive. Have not the banks said that they did not require or want any assistance? This is true of the banks of New York, where the Executive and Legislature proffered their assistance, not in their ordinary business, but in case war should be waged against them by the principal bank in the Union, having a capital nearly equal to all the banks in the State of New York, by loaning them the credit of the State to the amount of six or seven millions, which they declined. They wisely chose to stand upon their own strength, and not to be propped up by any Government, State or National. They felt strong enough to sustain themselves not only against ordinary difficulties, but against the threatened hostilities of the great bank autocrat.

Sir, the sound banks do not want any aid from this Government; we cannot benefit them, but we might do them an essential injury, as well as the country. They are beginning to resume, and the best service we can render them, or the monetary affairs of the country, is to let them alone; let them stand upon their own strength, and return to a sound and healthful action as fast as they can. If they understand their own interest, they will say to us "hands off," the "let-us-alone policy" is all we ask of you. But, if it was in our power to aid the banks, would not a sudden and powerful stimulus from the Government, at a time like the present, be highly dangerous? What is most to be feared is, that their action will be too rapid and violent; that, recovering from their torpid state, they will spring into life with all the vigor of a giant. From the long suspension of business, and the vast influx of the precious metals, there is a powerful stimulus operating upon them.

Do gentlemen forget what was one of the principal charges against the late Administration: the importation of gold for the French and Neapolitan underwriters. The charge was, that the importation of specie gave a dangerous stimulus to the banks, and was the principal cause of their excessive issues. If there was any truth in these charges which the Opposition made against the late Administration, what will be the effect of the immense importations of gold which have recently been made? Now, the importations of gold have had no connection with the Government, and, perhaps, on that account, it may not have so dangerous an influence. Whatever the Government does, is sure to injure the banks, and he thought, therefore, the better course for both parties was to have as little to do with them as possible.

Mr. N. said he could not forbear to notice a remark of the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] which he had heard with surprise, and which might seem to authorize an unfavorable inference as to the object of introducing this resolution. He would by no means say that he believed such to be the object, but only that the language of the Senator seemed to authorize such an inference. The Senator said that the conduct of the majority, in relation to this resolution, would place them before the country in their true postion; it would test their sincerity, and satisfy the country whether they were hostile to the banks or not. If they seek to evade action upon it, or oppose its adoption, it will then be seen what sincerity there is in the denial of their hostility to the banks. Are we to understand that this is the purpose for which the resolution was introduced? Has the Senator introduced a resolution containing principles which he has reason to believe that a majority of the body cannot approve, and which they have recently decided against, that its rejection may furnish evidence to the country in support of the charge of their being hostile to the banks? Is this a measure in co-operation with a bold movement from another quarter, which has attempted to array this Government in hostility to the banks? This charge has been deliberately made and proclaimed to the country by the great bank autocrat, in a formal manifesto, designed to rally and unite all the banks in the Union against the Government, which is charged with waging war upon them. Is it thought that the just and liberal course of the Secretary of the Treasury towards the resuming banks is calculated to put down this unfounded charge so boldly put forth, and that some new facts were necessary to give it some little countenance? Is the object to keep up the agitation, and prolong the present state of things? to continue the delusion which, to some extent, has prevailed in the public mind, of the hostility of the Government to the banks? Is the country to have no repose? Do gentlemen think to continue the panic, and prevent the resumption of the banks and the restoration of business, by keeping alive the clamor and delusion about the hostility of the Administration to the banking and credit system? These bold denunciations and charges, which had been made by one claiming to speak for the moneyed interest, were losing their force; the prejudices and fears which had prevailed were subsiding, and the public opinion is settling down; and nothing can be more important than this for the revival of business, and the restoration of confidence. Is it the purpose to prevent this quieting of the public mind, and to continue the alarm about the hostility of the Government? Mr. N. said he could not believe that any such purpose existed, although the language of the Senator from Kentucky would seem to authorize it. But if there were any such views, he forewarned gentlemen of the consequences of endeavors to prolong the panic, and prevent the restoration of the business of the country. He told them that this state of things could not be prolonged; it was not in the power of politicians, if so disposed, which he did not believe, to prolong it. It has already continued one year, and even those who rejoice at the political fruits of it, feel that they have paid dear for them in private sacrifices; they feel that they have suffered in their business all that they could afford to suffer. If they love political power, they also love money, and are now desirous for a return of those pursuits by which it is to be acquired. They think they have suffered enough for the benefit of the Opposition cause, and now wish to return to their accustomed pursuits of business. He really hoped that gentlemen would be satisfied with the results of the panic which had been realized. It had worked well for them; they had carried most of the elections, his own State among others, and perhaps somewhat to his own loss. He really hoped gentlemen would show some little moderation in their triumphs, and try to be satisfied with what they had obtained. They had certainly turned the suspension of business and the distresses of the times to a good account: they had made the most of them whilst they lasted; and he really hoped they would be satisfied, and suffer the public mind to become quiet, without which business could not revive. But the people are beginning to understand this matter; and whatever course politicians may pursue, the present state of things cannot be prolonged. The banks want none of our aid; they will resume without it. Circumstances force it upon them; and solvent banks cannot avoid resuming, and business must and will soon revive. This resolution is not called for, and can do no good. Its tendency will be to keep the public mind unsettled; but if there is to be any action upon it, it ought to be referred, and its principles examined in reference to the existing laws.

RESURRECTION NOTES.

SPEECH OF MR. GRUNDY,

OF TENNESSEE,

In Senate, April 16, 1838—upon the bill to prevent the issuing and circulation of the bills, notes and securities of corporations created by Congress which have expired, and, also, upon the late letter of NICHOLAS BIDDLE to JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, recommending a non-resumption of specie payments by the banks.

MR. PRESIDENT: this bill presents two questions for the consideration and decision of the Senate—

The first is, does Congress possess the constitutional power to enact its provisions.

The second is, if the power exists, is it expedient to exercise it?

My intention is to discuss both these propositions in the order I have named them. But, before I proceed to establish the affirmative of each, which I believe I can do, I wish to call the attention of the Senate to one of the most extraordinary productions which has been presented to the public in these extraordinary times. It is intimately connected with the subject matter of the bill now before the Senate. Should I be tedious upon this branch of what I have to say, my apology will be found in this, that my lips have been sealed, by the mandate of the Legislature of my State, during the whole discussion upon the currency question. Now, that I have obeyed the injunctions which it was their pleasure to impose on me, not only in their letter, but in their spirit, I feel as free as any Senator here. But, let it be distinctly understood, that, in regard to the bill which has passed the Senate for the collection, safe-keeping and disbursement of the public money, and upon which I was instructed, I have not one word to say, either for or against it.

The extraordinary production, to which I have referred, is a letter, written by the president of the Pennsylvania Bank of the United States, and addressed, in form, to the Hon. JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, but evidently designed as a manifesto to the public of the principles upon which the institution, over which he presides, intends to act, and also as a declaration of war against the present Executive of the United States. I am not mistaken; nor have I spoken too boldly, or said what I cannot make good.

In the concluding paragraph of this letter, the following language is employed:

"The banks should remain exactly as they are, preparing to resume, but not yet resuming. They should begin as the Bank of England did, under similar circumstances, by paying the small notes, so as to restore coin to all the minor channels of circulation; but not make any general resumption until they ascertain what course the Government will pursue; employing, in the mean time, their whole power to forward the crops to market. The American banks should do, in short, what the American army did at New Orleans, stand fast behind their cotton bales until the enemy has left the country."

Now divest this paragraph of its rhetoric, and what is its plain import and meaning? The author, in the whole preceding part of this paper, had been laboring to prove, (unjustly, as I will show) that the present Chief Magistrate was hostile to all State banks, and had resolved on their destruction, and then concludes with the language I have quoted. Yes, the counsel given clearly is, that as the American army stood fast behind their cotton bales until the enemy left the country, so the banks should retain their present non-specie paying position until the present incumbent shall cease to occupy the Presidential chair; or, in Senatorial language, "until the Goths are driven from the Capitol." In other words, this great national calamity of a suspension of specie payments is to be continued until the people of the United States shall be tortured into a change of the administrators of the Government; and their afflictions are to be continued and increased in intensity, until, as happened in ancient times, they shall be constrained to say, "Give us a King to rule over us, that we may be like the other nations of the earth;" that is, give us a Bank of the United States, not to regulate the currency only, but to regulate the politics of the country, and save the people the trouble and inconvenience of governing themselves, or electing their own agents to manage their own public affairs.

Sir, if I am not mistaken in the character of the American people, this paper will do more than any thing which has been, or can be done, by the exertions of any individual or set of individuals in this nation, to prevent the accomplishment of that which its author designed. Until the 4th of March, 1841, when the Presidential term of the present Chief Magistrate expires, the banks are to remain intrenched behind their bales of bank paper. Then, when "the enemy has left the country," when "the Goths have been driven from the Capitol," the people may be suffered to enjoy the advantages and benefits arising from a resumption of specie payments; but not before. This is the fiat of Mr. Biddle; this is the decree of the president of one out of eight hundred State banks that now exist in the United States.

Here is a moneyed corporation, created by the authority of a single State, denouncing the Chief Magistrate of all the States, and demanding his exclusion from office at the expiration of his present term, under the penalty, that until it be done no resumption of specie payments shall take place.

I have said that the charter or recharter of a Bank of the United States is also required by the writer of this letter as the price of a resumption. He says, referring to the Congress of the United States:

"The only reform in the currency which that body has yet made, is the issue of ten millions of irredeemable paper money, and a proposal for ten millions more."

One passing remark upon this statement. The impression it is calculated to make is, that ten millions of dollars, in Treasury notes, have been issued by the Secretary of the Treasury, and that they are now in circulation. The fact is, eight millions only have been issued, and one half of them have been redeemed, leaving only four millions in circulation. Nor can these, with the least propriety or justice, be designated as "irredeemable paper money." They are received by the Government as equivalent to gold and silver; the revenues of the country may be paid in them without depreciation; they are transmitted from one part of the country to another at an equal value; in no sense can they be properly spoken of as irredeemable paper money; with no justice can they be classed with the depreciated and unredeemed paper of non-specie paying banks.

But I proceed with the letter. It continues:

"Is it worth while, then, so long as Congress fails to exercise its legitimate powers, to waste the strength of the country in efforts to accomplish what we all know to be impracticable? To resume now, without some understanding with the Government, seems to be throwing away the benefits of experience, and the lessons of misfortune. We have gone through all the mortification and all the inconvenience of suspension. Let us endeavor to profit by them; to fix the future on some solid basis; have some guaranty of the stability of the currency, and not set every thing afloat again without knowing where we may be drifted. For, compare the situation of the banks at the last resumption and now. After a suspension of nearly three years, Congress applied all its power to induce, to persuade, and to assist the banks in their efforts to resume. They passed the resolution of 1816, authorizing the receipt of the notes of specie-paying banks. But this alone was insufficient; and at the same time, they established the Bank of the United States, with a capital of thirty-five millions. That bank called a convention of State banks, and agreed that if they would resume specie payments, it would, 1st. Assume all their debts to the Government of the United States; 2d. Discount, to those who had payments to make to the Government, the whole amount of their bonds; and, in addition, 3d. Discount, to those not indebted to the Government, two millions in New York, two millions in Philadelphia, one and a half milions in Baltimore, and half a million in Richmond; and, 4th. Would sustain the resuming banks in case the resumption brought them into difficulty."

Of this the evident meaning is, that a bank charter from the General Government, and nothing short of it, ought to be obtained, before, in the opinion of the writer, specie payments, so far as may depend on his power and influence, shall be resumed; and all will admit that his power and influence are considerable, and difficult to be resisted. From this view—drawn from the manifesto of this institution itself—the inference is irresistible that no relief, so far as this bank is concerned, is to be extended to the country by a resumption of specie payments, until Congress shall yield and charter a Bank of the United States. For myself, I say that I will yield to no such arrogant pretension. I will never consent that the flag of the country, the flag of the Constitution, shall strike to any such intruder or invader. No, sir: every such high-handed attempt of a moneyed corporation to influence or coerce the public councils of the country into its measures, should be promptly met and unyieldingly resisted by the people and their public functionaries. When I first read the Constitution of the United States—and every subsequent reading has but confirmed my first impression—I learned that for certain specified objects, for which the State authorities acting separately were incompetent, a Federal Government was formed, to consist of legislative, judicial, and executive departments; and by these the Government was to be administered. The framers of the Federal Constitution believed that the Government they had formed could be carried on by the functionaries employed in these departments. Modern wisdom, however, has discovered that there is a power outside of, and beyond, the limits of the Constitution, which should control the Government and all those engaged in its administration; and this power, so far as the bank in question can wield it, is now actually engaged, with all its influence and authority, in dictating to and coercing the Government into its measures.

Here is a corporation whose duty it is, under its State charter, to carry on its business of banking according to the limitations and restrictions imposed on it by the law of its creation. By these it is imperatively enjoined to pay its debts honestly and punctually. Yet it is at this moment laboring to convince the public, that for reasons of State or policy, it is expedient and proper that neither it, nor any other bank, shall pay their debts according to their solemn engagements. And why not pay? Not because of inability—the only allowable excuse in any case for a refusal to pay—for the means of this institution are declared to be amply sufficient to meet all its engagements. I do not pretend to judge—I do not pretend to know what code of ethics prevails among banking corporations, or what is considered dishonest or immoral among them, for I never have been an officer in any institution of this kind—but I think I understand reasonably well what is considered honest or dishonest among private individuals; and certainly, among them, he who has money to pay his debts, and refuses to do so when required, could never satisfy the public that he was acting honestly. If you had my note for a sum of money, and were to demand payment, and I had the money in my desk, and not only enough to pay your debt, but all the other demands I owed, I think I should pay you, and if I refused, it would be difficult to convince you that I acted honestly; nay, though I should talk to you as plausibly, as politically, and as lengthily as Mr. Biddle has written, the conclusion of the whole matter would be, that you would want your money, and would not accord to me the character of an honest man unless I paid it. This was the old fashioned way of thinking and acting when banks were few and punctual. Nor have the people yet learned this new rule of morals, which teaches that a bank can stand justified in refusing payment of its just debts when it possesses the ability to pay, and I trust it will be long before they do learn it. It seems to me that banks should be placed, in this respect, upon the same footing with individuals. If either be unable to pay their debts, a refusal to pay does not prove them dishonest. The causes which led to, or produced, the inability, must be examined before a just judgment can be pronounced upon their conduct. The correctness of my own opinion upon this subject is confirmed by the report of the delegates of the banks of the city of New York, made in November last. That committee consisted of Albert Gallatin, George Newbold, C. W. Lawrence, Cornelius Huger, John J. Palmer, Preserved Fish, and G. A. Worth, some of whose names are as well known, and as much confided in, by the American public, as that of the writer of this letter. They say, in their report:

"That whatever explanation may be given concerning the past, since nothing but actual inability can be alleged as an excuse for having ceased to perform the express condition on which the privilege to issue a paper currency had been granted, it is equally obvious that nothing can justify a protracted suspension but the continued inability to resume and sustain specie payment. This principle is indeed so evident, that, as an abstract proposition, its correctness is universally admitted. All agree in expressing their thorough conviction, that nothing can excuse the continuance of suspension, after the necessity which demands it shall have ceased."

These gentlemen, although presidents of banks, less ambitious to bring the moneyed power of the country to bear upon the Government and its politics, content themselves with laying down a rule of action which I supposed, until lately, would govern the conduct of every banking institution in the whole country. It is this. If a sudden revulsion in the monetary affairs of the country shall compel the banks to suspend specie payments, from an inability to meet their liabilities, they should hasten to relieve themselves from their inability; and so soon as this shall be effected, instantly to resume. The authors of this report seem to have anticipated the very ground now assumed by the president of the Pennsylvania Bank, and have rendered their judgments of condemnation against it. They say, in their report:

"When we see such extensive, general, and, we may say, intolerable, evils, flowing from a general suspension of specie payments by the banks, it is monstrous to suppose that, if they are able to resume and sustain such payments, they should have any discretionary right to decide, or even to discuss the question, whether a more or less protracted suspension is consistent with their own views of the condition and circumstances of the country. There would be no limit to such supposed discretion. Thus, for instance, should the hope of a favorable action of Congress on the currency be still alleged as a motive for delay, would not this be tantamount to a protracted suspension for an indefinite period of time? 'The banks are bound, by the strongest legal and moral obligations, to resume specie payments whenever they are able to maintain such payments. It is the paramount duty, to which every other consideration must yield. Their ability to perform that duty is the only question which they have a right to discuss, and which they are bound to examine with the utmost care and candor."

This committee, although composed of banking men, expressly disclaim all other considerations except their ability to pay, and recognise the principle, that the laws of the land and of public morals require a strict compliance with their engagements, when the ability exists, without any reference whatever to the action of political bodies. Not so with Mr. Biddle. The legal obligation, the moral obligation, he is under to pay the debts of his bank, seem to have been overlooked altogether, so anxious is he to rectify the politics of the country.

The writer of this letter ascribes the suspension of specie payments to three causes only. They were, he says:

"The Specie Circular, which forbade the receipt of any thing but gold or silver at the land offices; the mismanagement of the deposites, which scattered them to the frontiers; the clamor raised by the Executive against bank notes, which alarmed the people for their safety, and caused a run upon the banks for specie. Now has any one of these causes ceased? On the contrary, have they not acquired ten-fold force? The Specie Circular is not repealed; on the contrary, it has been extended, for bank notes are proscribed, not merely from the land offices, but from all payments of every description to the Government. The distribution of the surplus is over, because there is no longer any surplus to distribute; but the great disbursements on the Southern and Western frontier, operate as injuriously, by requiring the transfer of so much revenue from the points where it is collected; lastly and mainly, the alarm about bank notes, propagated by the Government, has been deeply spread throughout the country, till what was at first a passing outcry, has settled into an implacable hostility. No man, I think, can doubt for a moment that the Executive of the United States seeks to maintain his power by exciting popular passions against the credit system, and that the whole influence of the Government is employed to infuse into the minds of the people distrust and hatred of all banks."

I will contrast with this the opinions of the minority of the Committee of Ways and Means in the House of Representatives. It is composed of Opposition members, and Mr. Sergeant, who drew the report, as is understood, is as well acquainted with this whole subject as Mr. Biddle himself. He says:

"Avoiding a recurrence to the primary causes of the suspension of specie payments by the banks, and omitting for the present to refer to the action of the Government, it seems to the minority of the committee to be very easy to discern the immediate agency which disturbed and disordered our circulation. While the United States were receiving specie, England was parting with it. Finally, the Bank of England discovered that her stock of gold was rapidly being diminished to an alarming extent, and for her own protection from a continuance of the drain, sought to discover, and of course to stop, the channel through which it was made. It was found to have been opened by means of credits of the United States upon England, ordered to be remitted in gold. The fact, as stated by the Secretary of the Treasury is, that the stock of gold in the United States had, within a short time, been increased fifteen millions of dollars; the greater part of it, beyond a doubt, coming from England, and much of it (how much cannot be ascertained) borrowed, that is, obtained by means of credits. The Bank of England, to stop this drain, frowned upon and discredited the bills drawn in the United States upon credits. They could no longer be discounted. Hence the revulsion, the failure of some of the American houses, (as they were termed) in England, and the excessive pressure upon all of them; the dishonor and return of bills, with all their consequences, and the sudden demand for a large balance not expected to be called for. Exchange rose, specie became a better remittance, and specie began to rush out.

"At the same time our great staple fell in England. The Secretary of the Treasury computes the loss to the United States upon half the crop then disposed of, at no less a sum than twenty millions of dollars. He computes the commercial debt of the United States at thirty millions of dollars. If these estimates be correct, then the cotton if it had not fallen, would have paid two-thirds of the debt, and the balance, reduced to ten millions of dollars, would not have been sufficient to cause any very serious embarrassment. It further appears, from the statements of the Secretary of the Treasury, (especially from his report in December, 1836,) that while we were getting in debt to England, we were importing specie, and that the amount added to our stock of gold and silver was more than the amount of debt just mentioned. It follows that the gold and silver must be considered to that amount, as having been bought upon credit, and not paid for, coming into the banks, nevertheless with nothing upon them to show this impunity; it would be dealt with as any other money in its vaults, and deemed to justify an expansion of credits. Such is a brief, but in the opinion of the minority of the committee, an accurate sketch of the times, immediately preceding the suspension, in which are to be sought its causes."

It should be remarked that the Specie Circular is no where mentioned in this report as a cause of suspension. The prominent cause noticed, is the drain of specie from England, and the exertion of the Bank of England to prevent it, which caused it to frown upon bills drawn upon that country. The second cause assigned, is the fall of the price of cotton in England, which occasioned a loss of twenty millions of dollars in that single article. The causes assigned by the minority of the committee, are of magnitude sufficient to produce the effect which followed.

The report of the New York Bank Committee, to which I before referred, perhaps more accurately enumerates the causes of the suspension, than even the report of the minority of the committee. It says:

"The immediate causes which thus compelled the banks of the city of New York to suspend specie payments on the 10th of May last, are well known. The simultaneous withdrawing of the large public deposites, and of excessive foreign credit, combined with the great and unexpected fall in the price of the principal article of our exports, with an import of corn and bread stuffs, such as had never before occurred, and with the consequent inability of the country, particularly of the South-western States, to make the usual and expected remittances, did at one and the same time fall principally and necessarily upon the greatest commercial emporium of the Union. After a long and most arduous struggle, during which the banks, though not altogether unsuccessfully resisting the imperative foreign demand for the precious metals, were gradually deprived of a great portion of their specie, some unfortunate incidents of a local nature operating in concert with other previous exciting causes, produced distrust and panic, and finally one of those general runs, which, if continued, no banks that issue paper money payable on demand, can ever resist, and which soon put it out of the power of those of this city to sustain specie payments."

Again, it will be observed, the Specie Circular is not named among the causes of suspension, nor is the denunciation of bank notes by the Executive. The only one of the causes mentioned by Mr. Biddle, to which this committee adverts, is the distribution of the public deposites among the different States. Sir, old Albert Gallatin would not hazard his reputation as a statesman, by the assertion that the Specie Circular was one of the causes which produced the suspension. No, he has been too long in earning and establishing his fame, to risk it for any passing political advantage.

Let us now see what have been the effects of the causes of suspension which are charged, substantially, against the Executive of the United States. The Specie Circular is the first of them mentioned in the letter upon which I am commenting. Why was it issued? is the first inquiry which every man should make, who desires to form a just judgment of its merits. At the time it issued, the United States were being plundered of all their specie; such exertions were made as had never before been witnessed, to procure the gold and silver of this country, to replenish the coffers of the Bank of England. The then President of the United States saw this, and resisted it, by creating a demand for the precious metals in the United States; and this, to a certain extent, prevented their exportation.

Further: at that time, such was the rage for purchasing and speculating in the public lands, that large companies were formed in every quarter of the country, who were monopolizing the best portions of the public domain, and making payment in bank paper. It was believed that, if this course of things continued, in a short time all the public lands of much value would be in the hands of speculators; and thus the public would be despoiled of its valuable domain, and have in its stead, and in payment, irredeemable bank paper. The events which have occurred since have fully proved the wisdom and patriotism which dictated the measure. The specie, to a considerable extent, has been retained in the country. The speculations in the public domain have ceased. The United States still own the lands, except so far as they have been needed and purchased for cultivation. Surely this is a better state of things than that which would have existed had the Specie Circular never been issued. But for it, the lands would have been in the hands of speculators, and the Government in the possession of bank paper of little or no value. Another beneficial effect has been produced: the extravagance of bank paper issues was checked; and, so far as Government deposited its specie in the Western banks, they were strengthened.

It should be remembered that a great portion of the specie collected under that circular, was immediately expended by the Government, in its disbursements, for the protection of the Western frontier. The remainder was deposited in the Southwestern banks, where it was when their doors were closed. Had it been in the banks of the Eastern cities, it would have been transported to England or have been in the possession of non-specie-paying banks. At one moment the complaint against the Executive is, that the public money collected for the customs in the East is not permitted to remain there, although a law of Congress, and not the Executive, has caused the distribution. In the next, the complaint is that the money collected from the sales of the public lands has been partly kept and expended in the protection of the Western frontier, and the remainder placed in Western banks. It would seem that nothing less than the use of all the public money, wherever collected, is required for the accommodation and benefit of the Eastern banks. If banks would trade, and rely upon their own capital and credit more, and not depend so much upon the public money, it would be better for both the banks and the community. If the idea shall prevail that the convenience and interest of the banks are to be consulted in the disposition of the public money, the great objects for which the Government was formed will be disregarded; your expenditures for the protection of the inhabitants of the frontier, and all the means of national defence must be paralyzed, until the banks are consulted, and it shall be ascertained whether their operations may not be incommoded or obstructed. Instead of this Government being carried on upon the principles, and for the purposes, intended by the Constitution, its main business will be to collect money for the benefit of banks, and expend it as may best suit their convenience.

On the grounds which I have thus rapidly reviewed, I have come to the confident conclusion, that, while the spirit in which the Specie Circular originated was patriotic, so, upon the whole, its effects have been productive of much practical benefit. I do not undertake to deny that at the present time the circumstances and condition of the country are very different from those which existed at the time it was issued; and that the necessity for it as a practical measure to retain our specie, save our public domain, and prevent the injurious effects of excessive speculation on the National Treasury, has in a great degree terminated. With the suspension of specie payments its operation has ceased, because the existing laws prohibit, in that contingency, the receipt of bank notes in any branch of the revenue. I do, however, contend that it ought never to have been considered or enumerated among the causes which contributed to this condition of the banks.

The second cause assigned for the suspension by the writer of this letter, is the scattering the deposites to the frontiers, or the distribution act of 1836. This was no Executive measure. It was forced upon the late Chief Magistrate, who reluctantly gave his assent to it. It was passed by the unanimous vote of the Opposition in Congress, aided by a majority of the friends of the Administration, who believed that justice and sound policy required its passage. If the assertion be true, that it aided in producing a suspension of specie payments, the fact would furnish additional evidence to prove the impropriety of permitting the banks to trade or discount on the public money; but it would not make the Executive branch of the Government chargeable with that consequence of the measure. It seems, however, in the view of this writer, that although the act of distribution s no longer in force, other causes equally injurious to the banks, and equally forbidding the resumption of specie payments, that is, the expenditures in the South and West, are still in operation. This shows that the great measures of defence must be abandoned, and the banks accommodated with the public money, or this evil, the suspension of specie payments, is not to be removed, so far as the writer of this letter has the power to prevent it. From this I think it manifest that the banks, relying upon the use of the public money, have overtraded, and that is principally the cause of the inability of some of them to resume specie payments.

The third reason assigned for the suspension, is the clamor which it is said the Executive has raised against bank notes. This is so intangible a matter that it is difficult to reason about it. If the writer had stated, that in a public document bank notes had been denounced, and their want of safety proclaimed, and then shown the effects produced by it, the subject could have been examined, and the accuracy of the assertion tested. Instead of this, a general allegation is presented, which, from its nature, and the vague manner in which it is brought forward, is incapable of proof or disproof.

This letter further states, that the suspension was wholly conventional between the banks and the public. It is true the people have in a degree acquiesced. But why? Because of the necessity under which the banks were laboring. The foreign debt was pressing upon them, and a general apprehension prevailed, that the country was to be drained of its specie; and that without a suspension the banks would become bankrupt, on account of the exertions made by the Bank of England, through its agents here, to procure coin for the benefit of that institution. What is the state of things now? The foreign debt is paid, and exchanges are in favor of this country. Instead of specie flowing out of the country, it is daily arriving in large amounts; nearly every arrival from England is accompanied with the annunciation of the arrival of large quantities of coin. In short, the condition of the moneyed relations between England and the United States, is wholly changed. The pressure and necessity which existed at the time of the suspension of specie payments has entirely ceased, and it may well be doubted whether the public will be satisfied with a continuance of a policy, apparently dictated by necessity, when that necessity no longer exists.

In the second paragraph of this letter, a false issue is attempted to be made up. The language of the letter is as follows:

"The credit system of the United States, and the exclusively metallic system, are now fairly in the field, face to face, one or the other must fall. There can be no other issue. It is not a question of correcting errors or reforming abuses, but of absolute destruction: not who shall conquer, but who shall survive. The present struggle must be final."

Now, I would inquire, by what authority the writer of this letter made up this issue? Has the President, or any of his friends, avowed a determination or wish to destroy the credit system? This credit system, I presume, is but another term for the banking system. So far as my opinion goes, I disclaim every sentiment of the kind. Banking, in my judgment, is necessary to promote the growth and prosperity of the country. But what kind of banking, and how far shall it be carried? That is the true question, and the point upon which a difference of opinion exists. Safe, honest banking, which shall not only promise, but shall actually pay and redeem its liabilities, when required, according to its engagements, I am favorable to. But that kind of banking which promises liberally, but fails in the performance, I always have been, and am still, opposed to. A bank which shall issue two or three for one upon its capital paid in, may be, probably is, safe and entitled to public confidence; but that which shall issue twenty, thirty, or forty for one, is unsafe, and will end in dishonest bankruptcy. It is the excess, not the thing itself, towards which I feel any hostility. Recently we have seen instances of the explosion of banks of the latter description, which should teach us all the danger there is in such institutions.

What evidence is there that the party of which I am a member, is opposed to State banks, and wishes their destruction? This seems to be taken for granted, from the fact that the Opposition are the owners and directors of almost all the banks in the country. That they own them, and control them, is generally true, probably to the extent of ten to one. But it does not follow from this, that their destruction is sought for or desired. That they should be honest, and obey the laws of the country, and comply with their engagements, is anxiously wished for—nothing more.

As to what course the Government should pursue towards banks which may resume specie payments at some short period, I can only express my own opinion, which is, that whatever aid and assistance the laws that may be in force shall permit, should, if necessary, be given to them; in other words, all the discretion which may be allowed to the Executive branch of the Government, should be exercised in their favor. At the same time, I should be unwilling to see any negotiation commenced or carried on with them, for the purpose of inducing them to resume specie payments. They should first show that they were honest and safe depositories before any kind of convention should exist between them and the Government. Then, to guard them against any unforeseen contingency which might arise from the designs or assaults of other institutions, every incidental aid which the Government can furnish should be extended to them. The hostility of the present Chief Magistrate to all banks has been charged upon this floor; and what was the only evidence relied on to establish it? It was that the President and Secretary of the Treasury had suggested, at the special session in September last, the propriety of a bankrupt law in relation to banks refusing to discharge their liabilities when demanded, according to their engagements. This has been spoken of and treated as a new and alarming measure, never before thought of or attempted. Have gentlemen forgotten that Mr. Dallas, Secretary of the Treasury under Mr. Madison, neither of whom was ever suspected or charged with hostility to State banks, made a similar recommendation; and, in addition, advised that a double stamp duty should be imposed on every note issued by a non-specie-paying bank? Have they forgotten that Mr. Crawford, also, Secretary of the Treasury under Mr. Monroe, recommended the same measure? The communication of Mr. Dallas, containing this recommendation, was made to the House of Representatives on the 19th of March, 1816. That of Mr. Crawford was made on the 20th of February, 1820. These recommendations excited no alarm: no denunciation of the hostility of their authors to State banks was ever made. So far from it, when the enemies of Mr. Crawford were exhibiting charges against him for the purpose of destroying his popularity and standing, the charge exhibited was, that he was too favorable to the State banks. And was the occasion or the manner in which the subject has been adverted to by the present Chief Magistrate, such as to give to it a different character? He refers it to Congress for consideration, among those means "authorized by the Constitution," through which they may "provide a remedy against a depreciated paper currency." As such it was referred to the Judiciary committees in both Houses of Congress. The majority of members composing each of these committees was friendly to the Administration, (and I was of the number,) yet they did not report in its favor, or introduce any bill upon the subject.

As to an exclusive metallic currency being aimed at by the Administration and its friends, I consider the charge as wholly gratuitous, and unfounded. A sound metallic basis for paper issued upon it, and a paper at all times convertible into specie, is all I have heard contended for. The truth is, we are charged with being for an exclusive metallic currency because we are not in favor of paper not convertible into specie. It is true, many of us, myself I among the number, are in favor of banishing small notes from circulation, that their places may be supplied by specie for the ordinary daily transactions of life.

I have said this was an extraordinary letter; and it seems to me that every thing attending and connected with it partakes of the same character. It is addressed to the Hon. John Q. Adams whose opinion upon this whole subject had again and again been expressed, under circumstances much more favorable to the bank than those which now exist. In a written address made to some of his constituents, immediately after the suspension in May last, when speaking in reference to this same bank, he says "I incline more strongly to the opinion, that the suspension of specie payments by such a bank should not only operate as an immediate forfeiture of its charter, but be made a penal offence in the president and directors of the institution. The violation of moral principle committed by a bank in suspending specie payments is, in my estimation, not inferior to that of fraudulent bankruptcy in an individual."

In another letter, of July 1, 1837, Mr. Adams again observes, on this subject:

"We are now told that all the banks in the United States have suspended specie payments. And what is the suspension of specie payments but setting the laws of property at defiance? If the president and directors of a bank have issued a million of bills, promising to pay five dollars to the holder of each and every one of them, the suspension of specie payments is by one act the breach of one million of promises. What is this but fraud upon every holder of their bills? And what difference is there between the president and directors of such a bank and the skilful artist who engraves a bank bill, a fac simile of the bill signed by the president and directors, and saves them the trouble of signing it by doing it for them? The only difference I can see in the two operations is, that the artist gives evidence of superior skill and superior modesty. It requires more talent to sign another man's name than one's own; and the counterfeiter, at least, does his work in the dark, while the suspenders of specie payment brazen it in the face of day, and laugh at the victims and dupes who have put faith in their promises."

Now sir, is it not among the most strange and extraordinary things connected with this letter, that it should be deliberately addressed to a person who has deliberately expressed these sentiments, and one who, it is understood, has seldom, if ever, retracted one word that he has uttered in his whole life, or changed an opinion deliberately expressed.

I have now done with the letter of Mr. Biddle.

I will proceed to the discussion of the propositions involved in the bill before the Senate. The first is, does Congress possess the constitutional power to act upon this subject in the manner proposed?

This bill contains two provisions. The first prohibits the reissue of the notes of an expired corporation created by Congress, and inflicts a punishment upon all those entrusted with the settlement of the affairs of such corporation, for a violation of this provision. It should here be remarked, that the penalties imposed, apply only to persons having the possession of notes of an expired corporation for the purpose of settlement, and whose duty it is to destroy or cancel them; and not to persons who receive and pass them in the ordinary course of business. Further, this provision is altogether prospective: whatever improprieties or wrongs may have been committed, are passed by unnoticed, because Congress has no power to notice them. The second provision is, that when the charter of any corporation created by Congress shall have expired, and the United States may have been a stockholder, and the notes of such corporation shall be in the possession of any corporation or person entrusted with the settlement of the affairs of such corporation, the circuit courts of the United States shall have a power, by injunction, to prevent the reissue of such notes, and, by a decree, may cause them to be cancelled. This is all that is proposed. If I am asked if I have been able to find any precedent for such legislation, I answer frankly, I know of none; and for the obvious reason that no such transactions as those which call for this legislation have ever before occurred. Never before, so far as I can learn, has a corporation attempted to perpetuate itself after the expiration of its charter. Never has this, or any other country, witnessed the reissue of the paper of a bank, after it has ceased to exist. Therefore it is not a matter of wonder that no such legislation is to be found, inasmuch as no case calling for it has taken place. The course taken by the late bank has been of so extraordinary and unprecedented a character, that no human foresight could provide against it. We have all read of an ancient sect of philosophers, who believed that after death, the souls of men passed into other bodies, and continued on earth. But that a creature without a soul, after the termination of its existence should pass into another state of being, and remain upon earth, is what no philosopher or statesman ever imagined. The Congress of 1816 supposed that when they declared that the charter should continue for twenty years, and no longer, and that two years after that time should be allowed for winding up its affairs, there would be an end to the corporation they had created, and every thing connected with it. They therefore made no provision for that state of things which now exists. It is upon principle and analogy alone that this bill can be sustained.

The first section makes the issuing of the old notes by the persons therein described, and for the purposes mentioned, a criminal offence, and prescribes the punishment. The Constitution, article 3, section 2, declares "that the judicial power shall extend to all cases in law and in equity arising under this Constitution or the laws of the United States." Cases in law are either civil or criminal, according to their nature and the provisions of law applicable to them. Article 1, sec. 8, gives Congress "power to pass all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into effect the enumerated powers, and all other powers vested in the Government of the United States or in any department thereof." Consequently, whenever a case arises under a law of the United States, to which it is necessary or proper, in the opinion of Congress, that the judicial power should be applied, they can pass the laws requisite to give the courts jurisdiction, and to enable them to proceed civilly or criminally, according to the nature of the case. Thus Congress has passed laws to punish larceny of letters from the post offices, robbery of mail, and other offences against the Post Office Department; against larceny and embezzlement of public property, against bribery of public officers, false swearing in pension and other cases, counterfeiting notes of the Bank of the United States, and other offences enumerated in the bank charter. In all these cases Congress proceeded without any special grant of power to pass these laws; the special grant of power to pass criminal laws in the Constitution being only as to "counterfeiting the securities and current coin of the United States, piracies and felonies on the high seas, and offences against the law of nations." Therefore, in passing all the other criminal laws to be found in the statute books, Congress have acted upon the general power above stated.

Now let us apply the principles I have above stated to the first section of the bill before the Senate. The notes described in the first section of the bill have been created under a law of the United States; that is, under the act of 1816, creating the Bank of the United States. The issuing of them either before or after the expiration of the charter is, therefore, a case arising under a law of the United States. The payment of these notes by a suit against the bank before the expiration of the charter, or against its trustee in equity after the expiration of the charter, could be enforced in the courts of the United States. Why? Because they are causes arising under a law of the United States, and, therefore, under the judicial powers of the United States. For the same reason, the counterfeiting of the note may be made punishable in the United States courts, although a concurrent jurisdiction exists in the State courts. Had no provision been contained in the charter against counterfeiting these notes, and although Congress had passed no law upon the subject until the expiration of the charter, still Congress might now pass a law to punish the counterfeiting of the notes, because they arose under a law of the United States. That the first section of this bill might have been incorporated in, and made a part of, the act of 1816, will, I presume, be denied by no one. If it could have been done then, Congress can do it now; for time does not affect the principle, as I will presently show. Congress did, in fact, after the bank was in operation, pass several acts upon the subject. One on the 3d of March, 1819, (vol. 6, page 409,) "To prevent bribery of the president or directors;" and new provisions against crimes in the acts of 1825, (vol. 7, pages 397 and 399) etc. The act of the present session to prevent the abatement of suits in which the bank is a party, passed after the expiration of the charter. This proves that although the corporation is extinct, yet Congress possesses the power to act upon any matter or thing which arose, or had its origin, under the charter or law of the United States. Had Congress foreseen what has occurred, they would doubtless have inserted some provision in the charter similar to the one contained in the first section of this bill. Now that this evil, which was unforeseen, has occurred, it is no less their province to suppress it.

There is another ground upon which the power to pass the first section of this bill can be maintained. By the Constitution, article first, section eighth, Congress is authorized to "coin money, and to regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin." The last clause of the same section gives power to pass all laws necessary and proper to carry this power of coining money into execution. Now, without construing this power, or the power to regulate commerce, in the broad, latitudinous manner in which it has been interpreted by some Senators in the debate on the currency question, and without admitting that it empowers Congress to create and regulate a paper currency, I think it should be conceded, that if Congress should think the circulation of the old notes of expired corporations created by Congress an injurious interference with the circulation of the money coined in pursuance of the Constitution, then they have the same power to suppress their circulation which they have to suppress spurious or adulterated coin. No express power is given to prohibit the circulation of foreign coin; the express power is to regulate its value; but Congress has always exercised the power to discriminate as to what shall pass as a legal currency, and no doubt could positively prohibit the circulation of all foreign coin, if it were discovered that its circulation was injurious to our own coin. Then, as these old notes grew out of an act of Congress, and as the bank has no longer under its charter any vested or other rights to circulate them, Congress may undoubtedly prohibit their further circulation by persons connected with the expired corporation, which is the sole object of the 1st section of this bill.

Whether Congress could pass such a law as to the notes of an expired State institution, is a very different question, and upon which my conclusions would be different; but it certainly is competent for Congress to control acts and things growing out of their own legislation, in such a manner as not to obstruct or defeat the great purpose for which the coining power was given; that is, the circulation among the people of gold and silver, made by the General Government, provided Congress shall not, by its enactments, violate any existing contracts or vested rights.

I will further add to the views already presented, that those who believe Congress has the power to create a national bank, and make and regulate a paper currency, cannot deny to Congress the power to pass the 1st section of this bill; at least, all the arguments they use in favor of these powers, necessarily prove the existence of the power for which I contend.

Those who deny the power of Congress to create a national bank, and also deny its power to make and regulate a paper currency, should not object to this measure; because the power to pass it has been shown under the judicial and coining powers. Further, whatever they may think of the constitutionality of the act of 1816, incorporating the bank, the fact that it was incorporated, that it acted, and in its action made and issued these notes, cannot be denied.

Legislators must deal with facts as they find them, and act practically. The facts being that these bills were put afloat under a law of Congress actually passed, and that they are now afloat, no doubts as to the power of Congress to pass acts should prevent Congress from suppressing the evil in question. If there were no power to authorise the issue of these notes, a fortiori, ought Congress to suppress them Inftead of the want of power to create the bank, being an argument against suppressing these notes now, it would have been a good reason twenty years ago; that is, so soon as Congress became satisfied that the Constitution had been violated by passing an unauthorised act.

As to the 2d section of the bill, all the arguments I have used in reference to the first section equally apply to it. It provides for the issuing of an injunction against the trustee, and those acting under its authority, and clothes the Circuit Courts of the United States, sitting in chancery, with power to cause these notes to be cancelled. In support of this section, there is the additional argument, that the United States have a direct pecuniary interest in the matter.

If the Government were suable, I think it very clear, that in case of a failure to pay by the trustee, the Government, would be liable, in equity, for such of these bills as were issued before the expiration of the charter, and as have never been redeemed, to the extent of the stock it owned in the corporation, and for which it has withdrawn corporate funds. If it could be proved that the holder of bills had received them from the trustee or its agents after the expiration of the charter, that might be proof of notice on the holder, that they were issued after the dissolution or termination of the partnership, which would exonerate the United States. But the proof of this fact would be difficult, if not impossible, under any circumstances; and therefore it is a fit case for a chancellor to enjoin the party having them in possession from issuing them.

Although the Government cannot be sued, its moral obligation to see that the trust be not violated remains, and so does its pecuniary interest; and whatever an individual, under the same circumstances, would be compelled to do by the judicial tribunals of the country, a just Government will do voluntarily. It would be impossible to distinguish between the bills which were put into circulation before the expiration of the charter, and never redeemed, and those which have been redeemed, and again put into circulation, so that all the bills of the late bank which may be in circulation, in case of a failure in the trustee to pay them, will constitute a claim against the United States, to the extent I have stated.

This pecuniary interest added to the other consideration I have mentioned, makes a clear case for the interposition and action of Congress. For it is as much the duty of Congress to provide against the arising or creation of an unjust debt or demand against the United States, as it is to provide against the incursions of the savages or any foreign enemy.

I have understood that some doubt whether the United States would be liable, under the circumstances which have taken place. I entertain no such doubts, provided the United States could be sued. I admit, if A sells his stock in a bank to B, and transfers it, A is no longer liable, because by this transfer the funds of the bank are not lessened, and its ability to pay is not diminished; but this is a very different case. Here a corporation, out of its corporate funds, has paid to a partner or corporator, eight millions of dollars, which were subject to the liabilities of the bank, and for the redemption of these old notes. To that extent, its ability to pay is reduced. It may be assimilated to this case. There are three partners in trade; their property and liabilities are extensive. At the close or termination of their business, one of them withdraws, while the other two continue the business, undertaking to pay all outstanding debts. The party withdrawing, receives out of the partnership property his proportion of the capital and supposed profits. In case of a failure, would any one say that the partner who had withdrawn would not be answerable? I presume not.

Upon the second question, Is it expedient to suppress the circulation of these notes? Will the circulation of the bank be diminished? Certainly not, if it be the intention of the present bank to act fairly and honestly. As to the notes on hand or under its control, the bank has nothing to do but to issue its own notes, instead of issuing them, and so of those now in circulation, whenever they are redeemed by the bank. The ability of the bank to extend or carry on its business, does not depend on the kind of notes it puts into circulation, if all are paid in specie on demand. It depends on its means of payment and its credit. If it shall be said that the old notes will have more credit than new ones, this is a false credit, which ought not to be permitted to exist. This bank, like all others, should rely on its own resources; that is, its money and its credit.

The character of the Government requires that a stop should be put to the circulation of these notes. Such was the intention of the Congress of 1816, and such the plain import of the charter under which they were made. It is disreputable to the Government to permit any set of individuals to pervert its enactments to purposes altogether inconsistent with its original design; and such is plainly and palpably the case in this instance. No man who voted for the act of incorporation in 1816, supposed such an evasion to prevent the closing up of the affairs of the corporation, as has been practised, would be attempted. By the seventeenth section of the original charter, the power is reserved to Congress to make laws to enforce the payment of the notes of the bank, with twelve per cent. per annum in favor of the holders; now they are circulated by a corporation which disclaims the power of this Government to make any law whatever to enforce their payment. In this way the power of this Government is eluded.

Mr. President, this is the institution which has placed itself at the head of the non-resuming banks, and its president, as generalissimo of the allied forces, has called upon his supposed feudatories and dependants to come to his assistance in the war he is waging against the people and their Government. He has called, but will they obey his mandate? May we not hope that there are a sufficient number of honest, independent banks who will disavow his authority, and refuse to unite with him in this crusade against the rights of the people, undertaken without cause, and carried on against all law and sound morality. Yes, sir, "he may call spirits from the vasty deep, but will they come?" I hope and think not.

It is a little remarkable that, in all which has been written by the president of this institution, not one word is said to excuse or palliate his own refusal, or the refusal of those he is attempting to influence, to comply with their engagements. He has the money to pay, and will not do it. The law commands him to pay—morality requires it; still a law superior to both, in his estimation, forbids. That superior law is his own will; which, for his own purposes, he has substituted for that code of laws and morals which most men feel constrained to regard.

In the present discussion, I must take it for granted that this bank is able to pay its debts, and meet all its liabilities. I am obliged to do this, because the president of the institution says the fact is so; and he has not furnished, in his letter, the means of enabling me to form an opinion for myself. When he stated that he had four millions of specie in his vaults; had he stated his available means; had he also stated what amount of of notes, payable on demand, old and new, were in circulation; what the deposites in the bank were; what were the balances in favor of other banks, which rumor places at a very high amount, and his other items of indebtedness, then something like a correct opinion might be formed as to his ability to resume and continue specie payments. When he stated that he had eight or ten millions of specie in England, had he stated what demands there were upon him in that country, then the public could have seen whether any aid could have been expected from that source to sustain the bank in Philadelphia, in case of emergency.

Let it be remembered that this is only a State institution, which is putting up these arrogant pretensions. If countenance be shown to this assumption, what security have we that the same may not be attempted by all and every one of the eight hundred banks scattered throughout the country? Your petty tyrants and dictators will spring up in every village where a bank is located, and these who are entitled to but common respect and estimation, so soon as they acquire any authority or control in one of these institutions, will attempt to teach their honest neighbors, who may be indebted in bank, that they must think with, vote with, and act with them in all things, under the penalty of having every cent they owe exacted from them, even to the impoverishment of their wives and children.

On one account I am pleased with the appearance of this letter of the president of the Bank of Pennsylvania; it is a plain, frank declaration on the part of the bank, of a determination to use its power to operate upon the politics of the country, and the measures of the Government. This is the warfare which is to be carried on. For myself I am ready to engage in it; and although it is decreed that I am to leave this august body, and my voice is no longer to be heard in the Senate chamber, still I will not be silent. Although afar off and in private life, my voice shall be heard, advising, urging, and cheering on my neighbors and countrymen in this conflict.

Mr. President, in the language of the great charter of our liberties, I WAS BORN FREE; I have not only been an advocate, but a devotee to freedom for many years—from my youth up, even to my three score years. If liberty and the rights of self-government are to be lost to me, to my descendants, even now numerous, and to the great body of my countrymen, (which may the God of all mercies forbid!) I pray that we may have some choice in the kind of men by whom we shall be ruled. May we be placed under the dominion of mind. May we pay our obeisance to the majesty of genius and intellect. May intellectual men rule over us; and may we never be subjected to the will of a cold, heartless, soulless, unfeeling, cent per cent moneyed power.

RESURRECTION NOTES.

SPEECH OF MR. BUCHANAN, OF PENNSYLVANIA,

In Senate, Monday, April 23, 1838—On the engrossed bill to prohibit the issue and circulation of the notes of the late Bank of the United States.

Mr. BUCHANAN said there was but one consideration which could induce him, at the present moment, to take any part in the discussion of the bill now before the Senate. He felt it to be his duty to defend the Legislature of the State which he had, in part, the honor to represent, from the charge which had been made against them by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. WALL] and other Senators, and by many of the public presses throughout the country, that, in rechartering the Bank of the United States, they had conferred upon it the powers of a great trading company. This charge was wholly unfounded in point of fact. The charter had not constituted it a trading company; and he felt himself bound to make the most solemn and public denial of that charge. If this Bank had become the great cotton merchant which was represented, and he did not doubt the fact, it had acted in express violation of its charter. He therefore rose, not to criminate, but to defend the Legislature of his native State.

The Democratic party of Pennsylvania had been, unfortunately, divided in 1835; and the consequence was the recharter of the Bank of the United States. Of the wisdom or policy of this measure (said Mr. B.) the Senate of the United States are not constituted the judges. I shall never discuss that question here. This is not the proper forum. I shall leave it to the sovereign people of the State. To them, and to them alone, are their representatives directly responsible for this recharter of the Bank. As a citizen of the State, I have, on all suitable occasions, both in public and in private, expressed my opinion boldly and freely upon the subject. In a letter from this city, dated on the 30th June, 1836, which was published throughout the State, I have presented my views in detail upon this question; and I feel no disposition to retract or recant a single sentiment which I then expressed. On the contrary, experience has only served to confirm my first convictions.

My task is now much more agreeable. It is that of defending the very Legislature who renewed the charter of the Bank, from the charge which has been made and reiterated over and over again, here and throughout the country, of having created a vast corporation, with power to deal in cotton, or any other article of merchandise. A mere reference to the charter, will, of itself, establish my position. It leaves no room for argument or doubt. The rule of common reason, as well as of common law, is, that a corporation can exercise no power, except what has been expressly granted by its charter. The exercise of any other power, is a mere naked usurpation. On the present occasion, however, I need not resort to this rule. The charter not only confers no such power of trading, but it contains an express prohibition against it. It was approved by the Governor on the 18th day of February, 1836, and the fifth fundamental article contains the following provision: "The said corporation shall not, directly or indirectly, deal or trade in any thing except bills of exchange, gold and silver bullion, or in the sale of goods really and truly pledged for money lent and not redeemed in due time, or goods which shall be the proceeds of its lands." In this particular, it is but a mere transcript from the charter granted to the late Bank by Congress on the 10th of April, 1816, which was itself copied from the charter of the first Bank of the United States, established in the year 1791. I have not recently had an opportunity of examining the charter of the Bank of England, but I believe it conains a similar provision. The Senate will, therefore, at once perceive that there is as little foundation for charging the Legislature of Pennsylvania with conferring upon the existing bank the enormous powers of a great trading company, as there would have been for making a similar charge against the first or the last Congress which chartered a Bank of the United States. It is true that the Bank, under its existing charter, can deal much more extensively in stocks than it could have done formerly; but this power does not touch the present question.

The Bank, by becoming a merchant and dealing in cotton, has clearly violated its charter, and that, too, in a most essential particular. Either the Legislature or the Governor may direct a scire facias to issue against it for this cause; and, if the fact be found by a jury, the Supreme Court of the State can exercise no discretion on the subject, but must, under the express terms of the act creating it, adjudge its charter to be forfeited and annulled Whether the Legislature or the Governor shall pursue this course, is for them, not for me, to decide. This Bank has already so completely entwined itself around our system of internal improvements and common school education, that it doubtless believes it may violate its charter with impunity. Be this as it may, the sin of speculating in cotton lies at the door of the Bank, and not at that of the Legislature.

Heaven knows the Legislature have been sufficiently liberal in conferring powers upon this institution; but I doubt whether a single member of that body would have voted to create a trading company, with a capital of $35,000,000, in union with banking privileges. Let us pause and reflect for a moment upon the nature and consequences of these combined powers. A bank of discount and circulation, with such an enormous capital, and a trading company united! By expanding or contracting its discounts and circulation, as a bank, it can render money plenty or money scarce, at its pleasure. It can thus raise or depress the price of cotton, or any other article, and make the market to suit its speculating purposes. The more derangement that exists in the domestic exchanges of the country, the larger will be its profits. The period of a suspension of specie payments is its best harvest, during which it can amass millions. It is clearly the interest of this Bank, whatever may be its inclination, that specie payments should continue suspended, and the domestic exchanges should continue deranged as long as possible. The ruin of the country thus becomes its most abundant source of profit. Accordingly, what do we find to have been its course of policy? I have heard it described by several gentlemen from the South and Southwest, some of whom are members of this body. It has gone into that region of the Union with these resurrection notes of the old Bank, the reissue of which this bill proposes to prohibit; and, in some States, it has exchanged them, the one-half for the depreciated local currency, and the other half for specie. With this local currency it has purchased cotton, and sent it to England for the purpose of paying its debts there, whilst with the specie it has replenished its vaults at home. In other States it has exchanged these dead notes of the old Bank for the notes of the local banks, receiving a large premium on the transaction, and with the latter has purchased cotton on speculation. A general resumption of specie payments would at once put an end to this profitable traffic. It has, then, first violatad the charter from Congress by reissuing the notes of the old Bank, and then violated the charter from Pennsylvania by speculating in cotton. During the suspension of specie payments, these notes have been the only universal paper circulation throughout the country; and thus, by reissuing them, in defiance of the law, the present Bank has been enabled to accumulate extravagant profits.

This charge against the Bank of speculating in cotton has never, to my knowledge, been contradicted. We have heard it from the other side of the Atlantic, as well as from the South and the Southwest. The Whig press of our country has commended, nay, almost glorified the Bank for going into the cotton market, when that article was depressed, and making large purchases, and its friends in England have echoed these notes of praise. Its example has produced a new era in banking. We find that the Southern and Southwestern banks have also become cotton merchants; and, from present appearances, the trade in this great staple of our country is no longer to be conducted by private merchants, but by banking corporations.

Under this system, what will be the fate of your private merchants? This practice must be arrested, or they msut all be ruined. The one or the other alternative is inevitable. What private individual can enter the cotton market in competition with the banks of the country? Individual enterprise can accomplish nothing in such a struggle. It would be the spear hurled by the feeble hand of the aged Priam, which scarce reached the buckler of the son of Achilles. The Bank of the United States, which, according to the testimony of its president, might have destroyed, by an exertion of its power, almost every bank in the country, could, with much greater ease, destroy any private merchant who might dare to interfere with its speculations. Such a contest would be that of Hercules contending against an infant. It can acquire a monopoly against individual merchants in any branch of mercantile business in which it may engage; and, after having prostrated all competition, it can then regulate the price of any article of commerce according to its pleasure. I do not say that such is either its wish or its intention; but I mean thus to illustrate the vast and dangerous power which it may exercise as a merchant. The East India company monopolized the trade of Asia, but it possessed no banking powers. It could not, therefore, by curtailing or expanding its issues, make money scarce or make money plenty at pleasure, and thereby raise or depress the price of the articles in which it traded. In this respect its power as a merchant was inferior to that now exercised by the Bank of the United States.

How vain, then, I might almost say how ridiculous, is it for the people of the South to make the attempt to establish merchants in the Southern seaports for the purpose of conducting a direct trade with Europe in cotton and other articles of their production, in opposition to the Bank of the United States and their own local banks. This effort must fail, or the banks must cease to be merchants. I am glad to learn that, at the late Southern convention, this alarming usurpation by the banks of the appropriate business of the merchant has been viewed in its proper light. The time, I trust, is not far distant when they will be confined, by public opinion, to their appropriate sphere. What a fatal error it is for any free people, tempted by present and partial gain, to encourage and foster such institutions in a course which must, if pursued, inevitably crush the merchants of the country who conduct its foreign trade! As a class, these merchants are highly meritorious, and entitled to our support and protection against a power which, if suffered to be exerted, must inevitably destroy them.

Philadelphia is a city devoted to the interests of the Bank; but even in that city, if it should undertake to speculate in flour, in coal, or in any other article which is poured into her market froqqm rich abundance of the State, such conduct would not be submitted to for a moment. The Legislature of the State would at once interpose to protect our merchants. Such an attempt would at once break the spell of bank influence. And yet it possesses no more power to deal in Southern cotton than it does in Pennsylvania flour. It will remain a banker at home; whilst its mercantile speculations will be confined to the Southern and Southwestern provinces of its empire.

The reason will now, I think, appear manifest why the Parliament of Great Britain, the Congress of the United States, and the Legislature of Pennsylvania, have so strictly prohibited their banking institutions from dealing in any thing except bills of exchange and gold and silver bullion. If the Bank of England should dare to invade the province of the merchants and manufacturers of that country in a similar manner, the attempt would instantly be put down. Every man acacquainted with the history and character of the people of England, knows that such would be the inevitable consequence. And yet this violation of law, on the part of the Bank of the United States, has been lauded in our free Republic.

As I am upon the floor, I shall proceed briefly to discuss the merits of the bill now before the Senate. It proposes to inflict a fine not exceeding ten thousand dollars, or imprisonment not less than one nor more than five years, or both such fine and imprisonment, at the discretion of the court, upon those who shall be convicted under its provisions. Against whom does it denounce these penalties? Against directors, officers, trustees, or agents of any corporation created by Congress, who, after its term of existence is ended, shall reissue the dead notes of the defunct corporation, and push them into the circulation of the country, in violation of its original charter. The bill embraces no person, acts upon no person, interferes with no person, except those whose duty it is, under the charter of the old bank, to redeem and cancel the old notes as they are presented for payment, and who, in violation of this duty, send them again into circulation.

This bill inflicts severe penalties, and, before we pass it, we ought to be entirely satisfied, first, that the guilt of the individuals who shall violate its provisions is sufficiently aggravated to justify the punishment: second, that the law will be politic in itself; and, third, that we possess the constitutional power to enact it.

First, then, as to the nature and aggravation of the offence. The charter of the late Bank of the United States expired, by its own limitation, on the 3d of March, 1836. After that day, it could issue no notes, discount no new paper, and exercise none of the usual functions of a bank. For two years thereafter, until the 3d of March, 1838, it was merely permitted to use its corporate name and capacity "for the purpose of suits for the final settlement and liquidation of the affairs and accounts of the corporation, and for the sale and disposition of their estate, real, personal, and mixed; but not for any other purpose, or in any other manner, whatsoever." Congress had granted the bank no power to make a voluntary assignment of its property to any corporation or any individual. On the contrary, the plain meaning of the charter was, that all the affairs of the institution should be wound up by its own President and Directors. It received no authority to delegate this important trust to others; and yet what has it done? On the second day of March, 1836, one day before the charter had expired, this very president and these directors assigned all the property and effects of the old corporation to the Pennsylvania Bank of the United States. On the same day, this latter Bank accepted the assignment, and agreed to "pay, satisfy, and discharge all debts, contracts, and engagements, owing, entered into, or made by this [the old] Bank, as the same shall become due and payable, and fulfil and execute all trusts and obligations whatsoever arising from its transactions, or from any of them, so that every creditor or rightful claimant shall be fully satisfied." By its own agreement, it has thus expressly created itself a trustee of the old Bank. But this was not necessary to confer upon it that character. By the bare act of accepting the assignment, it became responsible, under the laws of the land, for the performance of all the duties and trusts required by the old charter. Under the circumstances, it cannot make the slightest pretence of any want of notice.

Having assumed this responsibility, the duty of the new Bank was so plain that it could not have been mistaken. It had a double character to sustain. Under the charter from Pennsylvania it became a new banking corporation; whilst, under the assignment from the old Bank, it became a trustee to wind up the concerns of that institution under the act of Congress. These two characters were in their nature separate and distinct, and never ought to have been blended. For each of these purposes it ought to have kept a separate set of books. Above all, as the privilege of circulating bank notes, and thus creating a paper currency, is that function of a bank which most deeply and vitally affects the community, the new Bank ought to have cancelled or destroyed all the notes of the old Bank which it found in its possession on the 4th of March, 1836, and ought to have redeemed the remainder, at its counter, as they were demanded by the holders, and then destroyed them. This obligation no Senator has attempted to doubt, or to deny. But what was the course of the Bank? It has grossly violated both the old and the new charter. It at once declared independence of both, and appropriated to itself all the notes of the old Bank, not only those which were then still in circulation, but those which had been redeemed before it accepted the assignment, and were then lying dead in its vaults. I have now before me the first monthly statement which was ever made by the Bank to the Auditor General of Pennsylvania. It is dated on the 2d of April, 1836, and signed J. Cowperthwaite, acting cashier. In this statement the Bank charges itself with "notes issued," $36,620,420 16; whilst in its cash account, along with its specie and the notes of State banks, it credits itself with "notes of the Bank of the United States and offices," on hand, $16,794,713 71. It thus seized these dead notes to the amount of $16,794,713 71, and transformed them into cash; whilst the difference between those on hand and those issued, equal to $19,825,706 45, was the circulation which the new Bank boasted it had inherited from the old. It thus, in an instant, appropriated to itself, and adopted as its own circulation, all the notes and all the illegal branch drafts of the old Bank which were then in existence. Its boldness was equal to its utter disregard of law. In this first return, it not only proclaimed to the Legislature and people of Pennsylvania that it had disregarded its trust as assignee of the old Bank, by seizing upon the whole of the old circulation and converting it to its own use, but that it had violated one of the fundamental provisions of its new charter.

In Pennsylvania we have, for many years past, deemed it wise to increase the specie basis of our paper circulation. We know that, under the universal law of currency, small notes and gold and silver coin of the same denomination cannot circulate together. The one will expel the other. Accordingly, it is now long since we prohibited our banks from issuing notes of a less denomination than five dollars. The Legislature which rechartered the Bank of the United States, deemed it wise to proceed one step further in regard to this mammoth institution; and in that opinion I entirely concur. Accordingly, by the sixth fundamental article of its charter, they declare that "the notes and bills which shall be issued by order of said corporation, or under its authority, shall be binding upon it; and those made payable to order shall be assignable by endorsement but none shall be issued of a denomination less than ten dollars."

Now, it is well known to every Senator within the sound of my voice, that a large proportion of these resurrection notes, as they have been aptly called, which have been issued and reissued by order of the new bank, are of the denomination of five dollars. Here, then, is a plain, palpable violation, not only of the spirit, but of the very letter of its charter. The Senate will perceive that the Bank, as if to meet the very case, is not merely prohibited from issuing its own notes, signed by its own president and cashier, of a denomination less than ten dollars, but this prohibition is extended to the notes or bills which shall be issued by its order, or under its authority. If I should even be mistaken in this construction of the law, and I believe I am not, it would only follow that its conduct has not amounted to a legal forfeiture of its charter. In both cases the violation of the spirit of its charter, and the contravention of the wise policy of the Legislature, are equally glaring. So entirely did the Bank make these dead notes its own peculiar circulation, that until July last, in its monthly returns to the Auditor General of Pennsylvania, the new and the old notes are blended together, without any distinction. In that return we were, for the first time, officially informed that the Bank had ever issued any notes of its own.

And here an incident occurs to me which will be an additional proof how lawless is this Bank, whenever obedience to its charter interferes in the least degree with its policy. By the tenth fundamental article of that charter, it is required to "make to the Auditor General monthly returns of its condition, showing the details of its operations according to the forms of the returns the Bank of the United States now makes to the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, or according to such form as may be established by law." From no idle curiosity, but from a desire to ascertain, as far as possible, the condition of the banks of the country, and the amount of their circulation, I request ed the Auditor General, during the late special session of Congress in September, to send me the return of the bank for that month. In answer, he informed me, under date of the 22d of September, that the bank had not made any return to his office since the 15th of the preceding May. Thus, from the date of the suspension of specie payments until some time after the 22d of September last, how long I do not know, a period during which the public mind was most anxious on the subject, the Bank put this provision of its charter at defiance. Whether it thus omitted its duty because at the date of the suspension of specie payments it had less than a million and a half of specie in its vaults, I shall not pretend to determine. If this were the reason, I have no doubt that it sent to the Auditor General all the intermediate monthly returns on the 2d of October, 1837, because at that period it had increased its gold and silver to more than three millions of dollars.

In order to illustrate the enormity of the offence now proposed to be punished, Senators have instituted several comparisons. No case which they have imagined equals the offence as it actually exists. Would it not, says one gentleman, be a flagrant breach of tru t for an executor, entrusted with the settlement of his testator's estate, to reissue, and again put in circulation for his own benefit, the bills of exchange or promissory notes which he had found among the papers of the deceased, and which had been paid and extinguished in his lifetime? I answer, that it would. But, in that case, the imposition upon the community would necessarily be limited, whilst the means of detection would be ample. The same may be observed in regard to the case of the trustee, which has been suggested. What comparison do these cases bear to that of the conduct of the Bank? The amount of its reissues of these dead notes of its testator is many millions. Their circulation is coextensive with the Union, and there is no possible means of detection. No man who receives this paper can tell whether it belongs to that class which the new Bank originally found dead in its vaults, or to that which it has since redeemed and reissued, in violation of law; or to that which has remained circulating lawfully in the community, and has never been redeemed since the old charter expired. There is no earmark upon these notes. It is impossible to distinguish those which have been illegally reissued from the remainder.

I can imagine but one case which would present any thing like a parallel to the conduct of the Bank. In October last, we authorized the issue of $10,000,000 of Treasury notes, and directed that when they were received in payment of the public dues, they should not be reissued, but be cancelled. Now, suppose the Secretary of the Treasury had happended to be the president of a bank in this District, and, in that character, had reissued these dead Treasury notes, which he ought to have cancelled, and again put them into circulation, in violation of the law, then a case would exist which might be compared with that now before the Senate. If such a case should ever occur, would not the Secretary at once be impeached; and is there a Senator upon this floor who would not pronounce him guilty? The pecuniary injury to the United States might be greater in the supposed than in the actual case; but the degree of moral guilt would be the same.

Whether it be politic to pass this law is a more doubtful question. Judging from past experience, the Bank may openly violate its provisions with impunity. It can easily evade them by sending packages of these old notes to the South and Southwest, by its agents, there to be reissued by banks or individuals in its confidence. There is one fact, however, from which I am encourged to hope that this law may prove effectual. No man on this floor has attempted to justify, or even to palliate, the conduct of the Bank. Its best friends have not dared to utter a single word in its defence against this charge. The moral influence of their silence, and the open condemnation of its conduct by some of them, may induce the Bank to obey the law.

I now approach the question—do Congress possess power under the Constitution to pass this bill? In other words, have we power to restrain the trustees of our own Bank from reissuing the old notes of that institution which have already been redeemed and ought to be destroyed? Can there be a doubt of the existence of this power? The bare statement of the question seems to me sufficient to remove every difficulty. It is almost too plain for argument. I should be glad if any gentleman would even prove this power to be doubtful. In that event I should refrain from its exercise. I am a State Rights man, and in favor of a strict construction of the Constitution. The older I grow, and the more experience I acquire, the more deeply rooted does this doctrine become in my mind. I consider a strict construction of the Constitution necessary not only to the harmony which ought to exist between the Federal and State Governments, but to the perpetuation of the Union. I shall exercise no power which I do not consider clear. I call upon gentlemen, therefore, to break their determined silence upon this subject, and convince me even that the existence of the power is doubtful. If they do, I pledge myself to vote against the passage of the bill.

If this power could only be maintained by some of the arguments advanced by the friends of the bill, in the early part of this discussion, it never should receive my vote. Principles were then avowed scarcely less dangerous and unsound than the principle on which the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PRENTISS] insists that the friends of the bill must claim this power. He contends that it does not exist at all, unless it be under that construction of the Constitution advocated by his friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER,] which would give to Congress power over the whole paper currency of the country under the coining and commercial powers of the Constitution. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. NILES] was the first in this debate who presented in bold relief the principle on which this bill can securely rest.

Neither shall I dodge this question, as some Senators have done, by taking shelter under the pretext that it is a question for the judiciary to decide, whether the general language of the bill be applicable to the officers of the Bank of the United States under the Pennsylvania charter. We all know that it was intended to embrace them. Indeed, it was their conduct, and that alone, which called this bill into existence. It is true that the provisions of the bill extend to all corporations created by Congress; but it is equally certain, that had it not been intended to apply to the Bank of the United States, it would have been confined in express terms to the District of Columbia, where alone corporations now exist under the authority of Congress. Away with all such subterfuges! I will have none of them.

Suppose, sir, that at any time within the period of two years thus allowed by the charter to the president and directors of the Bank to wind up its affairs, these officers, created under your own authority, had attempted to throw thirty millions of dollars of their dead paper again into circulation, would you have had no power to pass a law to prevent and to punish such an atrocious fraud? Would you have been compelled to look on and patiently submit to such a violation of the charter which you had granted? Have you created an institution, and expressly limited its term of existence, which you cannot destroy, after that term has expired? This would indeed be a political Hydra which must exist for ever, without any Hercules to destroy it. If you possess no power to restrain the circulation of the notes of the old Bank, they may continue to circulate for ever in defiance of the power which called them into existence. You have created that which you have no power to destroy, although the law which gave it birth limited the term of its existence. Will any Senator contend that during these two years allowed by the charter for winding up the concerns of the bank, we possessed no power to restrain its president and directors from reissuing these old notes? There is no man on this floor bold enough to advance such a doctrine. This point being conceded, the power to pass the present bill follows as a necessary consequence.

If the president and directors of the old Bank could not evade our authority, the next question is, whether, by assigning the property of the corporation to a trustee the day before the charter expired, and delivering up to him the old notes which ought to have been cancelled, they were able to cut this trustee loose from the obligations which had been imposed upon them by the charter, and from the authority of Congress. Vain and impotent, indeed, would this Government be, if its authority could be set at nought by such a shallow contrivance. No, sir, the fountain cannot ascend beyond its source. The assignee in such a case is not released from any obligation which the assignor assumed by accepting the original charter. In regard to Congress, the trustee stands in the same situation with the president and directors of the old Bank. We have the same power to compel him to wind up the concerns of the bank, according to the charter, that we might have exercised against those from whom he accepted the assignment. The question is too plain for argument.

The present case is still stronger than the one which I have presented. It is an assignment by the old Bank of the United States, not to strangers, not to third persons, but to themselves, in the new character conferred upon them by the Legislature of Pennsylvania. The new charter expressly incorporates all the stockholders of the old Bank, except the United States, so that the individuals composing both corporations were identical. For the purpose of effecting this transfer from themselves to themselves, they got up the machinery of one President and one Board of Directors for the old Bank, and another President and another Board of Directors for the new Bank. What kind of answer, then, would it be to Congress for them to say, True, we accepted a charter under your authority, by which we were bound to reissue none of our old notes after the 3d March, 1836, but we have since assumed a new character; and under our old character, we have transferred the Bank which you created, to ourselves in our new character; and we have thus released ourselves from all our old obligations, and you have no constitutional power to enforce them against us? No sir, no sir; we have the power, and it is our duty, to compel the president and directors of the Bank, which we established, or their assignees, to close its concerns; and this power will continue until the duty shall be finally accomplished. The one power is a necessary implication from the other. If this duty has not been performed within the two years which we have allowed for its fulfilment, our power depends not upon any such limitation, but upon the fact whether the concerns of the Bank have been actually closed. If this were not the case, then all the affairs of the Bank left unfinished at the end of these two years would be outlawed. This limitation was intended not to abridge the power of Congress, but to hasten the action of the president and directors in winding up the concerns of the Bank. At this very session, and since the two years have expired, Congress has passed an act, without a shadow of opposition from any quarter, giving the president and directors of the old Bank authority to prosecute and defend existing suits. I should be glad to see any Senator rise in his place, and make even a plausible argument in opposition to these plain and almost self-evident positions.

In this brief argument, I have not attempted to derive any power from the fact that the United States were proprietors of one-fifth of the stock of the old Bank, and that they might be rendered responsible, either legally or equitably, for the eventual redemption of these dead notes. I disclaim any such source of power. To be a proprietor is one thing, and to be a sovereign is another. The mere fact that we owned stock can confer no power upon us, which we would not have possessed, had we never been interested to the amount of a dollar. We should have the same power to wind up a bank emanating from our sovereign authority in the one case as in the other. We possess the same power to close the concerns of all the banks in the District of Columbia after their charters shall have expired, although we are not proprietors of any of their stock, which we have to wind up the Bank of the United States, in which we were so deeply interested.

I need scarcely observe that I do not contend for any power to punish citizens of the United States, or even the officers of banking institutions, except such of them only as the trustees of the Bank created by ourselves, for issuing these dead notes. We intend to punish the trustees under our own law, and them alone for the violation of that law. These notes may circulate from hand to hand without rendering those who receive or those who pay them obnoxious to any punishment. Even if we possessed the power, it would be highly unjust to attempt its exercise. As I observed before, these notes have no earmarks, and no man can tell whether any one of them has been illegally reissued by the bank since the 3d March, 1836, or whether it was issued before that date, and has continued legally to circulate in the community ever since.

I repeat, I should be glad to see any Senator, and especially any one who believes that Congress possesses the constitutional power to charter a Bank of the United States, rise in his place, and make even a plausible argument in opposition to the plain and almost self-evident positions which I have taken in support of the power to pass this bill. Those Senators who doubt or who deny our power to create such a bank are placed in a different situation, because their vote in favor of this bill might at first view seem, by implication, to concede that power. This objection does not appear to me to be sound. That question cannot be fairly raised by this bill. Whether the charter of the late Bank was constitutional is no longer a fair subject of consideration. It was adopted by Congress, approved by the President, and afterwards pronounced to be constitutional by the highest judicial tribunal of the land. It thus received every sanction necessary to make it binding on the people of the United States. The question was thus settled beyond the control of any individual, and it was the duty of every good citizen to submit. Under every Government there must be a time when such controversies shall cease; and you might now as well attempt to exclude Louisiana from the Union, because you may believe her admission was unconstitutional, as to act upon the principle, in the present case, that Congress had no power to charter the late Bank. No man on this floor had ever avowed that he would vote to repeal the charter of the late Bank, during the twenty years of its existence, because he might have thought it was originally unconstitutional. During this period all were obliged to submit. Under such circumstances, it would be carrying constitutional scruples very far, indeed, for any gentleman to contend that, although the Bank has existed under the sanction of a law which we were all bound to obey, we cannot now execute that law and close its concerns, because as individuals we may have deemed it to be originally unconstitutional. If it had been so, the obligation upon us would only be the stronger to wind it up finally, and thus terminate its existence.

I most cheerfully admit that if an attempt should ever be made to charter another bank, the question of constitutional power would then again be referred to each individual member of Congress, to be decided according to the dictates of his own judgment and his own conscience.

Before I take my seat, I intend to make some remarks on the causes of the suspension of specie payments by the banks of the country, and the causes equally powerful which must, and that ere long, compel a resumption.

The late manifesto issued by the present Bank of the United States displays, upon its face, that it has inherited from the old bank an unconquerable disposition to interfere in the politics of the country. This has been its curse, its original sin, to which it owes all its calamities and all its misfortunes. It has not yet learned wisdom from its severe experience. Would that it might, and confine itself to its appropriate sphere! As a citizen of Pennsylvania, I most ardently and devoutly express this wish. It has now set itself up, as the primary power, against the resumption of specie payments, and has attempted to enlist in the same cause all the other banks of the country. Its language to them is, "that "the Bank of the United States makes common cause with the other banks." And again: "They (the banks) are now safe and strong, and they should not venture beyond their entrenchments, while the enemy is in the plain before them." "The American banks should do, in short, what the American army did at New Orleans, stand fast behind their cotton bales, until the enemy has left the country."

Thus whilst every eye and every heart was directed to the banks, expecting anxiously from them a speedy resumption of specie payments, this grand regulator of the currency has proclaimed to the country that all its vast power will be exerted to prevent the accomplishment of our wishes.

The Bank does not even attempt to conceal the fact that, in pursuing this course, it has been actuated by political hostility against the present Administration. It has boldly avowed that "if the banks resume, and are able, by sacrificing the community, to continue for a few months, it will be conclusively employed at the next elections to show that the schemes of the Executive are not as destructive as they will prove hereafter." In plain language, the banks must not resume before the next elections; they must not open their vaults, pay their honest debts, and thus redeem the country from the curse of an irredeemable paper currency; because, if they should, this may operate in favor of the present Administration, and place its opponents in a minority. And such is the conduct of the Bank whilst it vaunts its own ability to resume immediately.

The Bank proceeds still further, and complains that "bank notes are proscribed not merely from the land offices, but from all payments of every description to the Government." I would ask, has any Senator upon this floor, has any statesman of any party in the country, ever raised his voice in favor of the receipt by the Government of irredeemable bank paper? I beg their pardon; two Senators have proposed such a measure, [Messrs. PRESTON and CLAY;] but I will do them the justice to say, that although I considered their proposition most unwise and impolitic, and resisted it as such at the time, yet they intended by this means to enable the banks the sooner to resume specie payments.

Mr. PRESTON. It was exclusively limited to that consideration.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Although the proposition was limited to the first of August, the Senators themselves, upon reflection, thought it so improper that they abandoned it, and we have heard nothing of it since.

What would have been the condition of the country, at the present moment, had we received irredeemable bank notes in payment of the public dues? The banks, by our conduct, would have been encouraged to increase their discounts and expand their issues, and we should have gone from bad to worse, until, at this moment, we should have had no prospect of the resumption of specie payments. Mr. Cheves has informed us that if the Government had not stood firm in 1819 against the receipt of irredeemable notes, the banks would at that period have suspended. Much more necessary is it that we should now maintain the same ground, in order to secure a resumption. Had we pursued any other course, it is true we should have had but one currency for the Government and the people; but it would have been a currency of irredeemable bank rags, without the hope of a better. And yet the Bank of the United States complains that the Government does not receive such paper. In order to have done so, we must have repealed the existing laws upon the subject; and who has ventured to propose any such measure?

The Bank of the United States has succeeded, at the late Bank Convention in New York, in keeping its forces behind their cotton bales. The banks of only two States in the Union have voted against the resolution to suspend the resumption of specie payments until the first day of January next. These were New York and Mississippi; and whether the latter voted thus because their banks are ready now to resume, or desired to postpone resumption until a still more distant day, I shall not pretend to determine. After this display of power, no one will question the ability of the Bank to keep its forces behind their entrenchments, unless they should be driven into the plain by the resistless power of public opinion.

Several weeks ago I attempted to imitate the illustrious examples which had been set before me on this floor, and became a political prophet. I then predicted that, before the close of the present year, commerce and manufactures would again revive and flourish, and the country would be restored to its former prosperity. The signs of the times have already confirmed the truth of this prophecy. Encouraged by past experience, I shall venture to make another prediction: There is not a sound and solvent bank in any of the Atlantic States of this Union, including the Bank of the United States, which will not have resumed specie payments long before the first of January. All the opposition of the banks themselves cannot prevent this result. In the very nature of things it must come to pass. The power of public opinion is yet still greater in this country than that of the banks. The Bank of the United States will not be able to keep its forces behind their cotton bags until so late a period.

It is now too late in the day for us any longer to doubt what was the true cause of the suspension of specie payments. That question has been settled on the other side as well as on this side of the Atlantic. Abundance of light has been shed upon this subject, and no two sound-judging men, at all acquainted with the facts, can arrive at different conclusions. It has already become history. And yet the Bank, in its manifesto, has not once alluded to this cause. What was it? In the perpetual fluctuations which must ever be produced by our present banking system, unless it should be regulated by State legislation, of which I now almost de-pair, it was expanded in the commencement of the year 1837 almost to the point of explosion. The bubble is created, it expands, and reflects the most brilliant colors. Its admirers gaze upon it with hope and ecstacy, when, suddenly, it bursts, and leaves them in ruin and despair. Such has been the history of the past, and such will be that of the future. This expansion had produced, as it must ever produce, enormous speculation and over-trading. The commercial debt which we then owed to England for foreign merchandise was immense. We must have suffered the fatal collapse sooner or later, but a circumstance then occurred in England which at once produced the explosion. It was the spark applied to the magazine of gunpowder.

A similar state of expansion then existed in England. They were threatened with similar evils from extravagant bank credits, and their inevitable consequence—enormous speculation and over-trading. The Bank of England had in vain attempted to control the joint-stock banks, and confine them within reasonable limits. She at last became alarmed for her own safety. In the beginning of 1837 her stock of specie was reduced to about four millions of pounds sterling, or one-sixth of her circulation and deposites. This was not more than one-half of the proportion which, it is believed, she ought to have in order to render her secure. The state of the foreign exchanges was gradually withdrawing the remaining bullion from her vaults. At this crisis, under the influence of a panic, she withdrew her credits from the American houses in England, and ruined them. The price of cotton, in consequence, suddenly fell from nineteen and twenty cents to seven and eights cents per pound; and thus, according to the best and most discreet estimate which I have seen, we lost at least thirty millions of dollars. This sum was thus, as it were, in a single moment, abstracted from our means of paying the immense commercial balance against us. At the close of this disastrous operation, that balance was estimated at forty millions of dollars What was the immediate consequence? A drain of specie then commenced from our banks for exportation, in order to pay this debt, and they were thus compelled to suspend or be ruined. Another circumstance existed to increase our embarrassments. Our merchants had drawn heavy bills upon England, predicated upon the cotton which they had shipped there, expecting to receive the old prices. In consequence of the sudden fall of prices, these bills were dishonored, and came back protested. Thus many of our largest mercantile houses were ruined.

The catastrophe proceeded from the same causes, and was similar in both countries, except that in England the banks were not compelled to suspend specie payments. The revenue of both has been insufficient to meet the current expenses of the Government, and each will be obliged to borrow nearly the same sum to supply the deficiency.

This is now history, which can neither be changed nor perverted. On both sides of the Atlantic all men of business and practical statesmen have come to the same conclusion. Away, then, with your Specie Circular, your mismanagement of the depositesites, and your clamor raised by the Executive against bank notes, as the causes of the suspension of specie payments. The Bank calculates too much upon the political credulity of the people, when, at this late day, after the subject is perfectly understood, it attempts to palm off upon them such exploded reasons for the suspension. A convulsion which has shaken the commercial world to its centre, and has extended over three quarters of the globe, could never spring from such trivial causes.

If the Executive has been carrying on a war against the credit system of the country, and in favor of an exclusive metallic currency for the people of the United States, I am ignorant of the fact. I have never even suspected it. I believe this is a mere phantom which has been conjured up to alarm the fears of the timid. If the President ever should wage any such war, I shall not fight under his banner. The only pretext upon which this charge has been founded is, that he and his political friends desire to separate the business of the Treasury from that of the banks, not to render them hostile to each other. Until that propitious day shall arrive, we shall be forever agitated by the connection of the currency with our miserable party politics. Political panics, political pressures, charges against the Government for exercising an improper influence over the banks, and charges against the banks for interfering with the politics of the country; all, all which have kept us in a state of constant agitation for the last seven years will continue to exist, and will be brought into action upon every successive election for President and Vice President. We shall thus continue in a state of perpetual commotion; and the great interests of the country will be sacrificed. Let the Treasury and the banks part in peace, and whilst they are mutually independent, let them wage no war against each other; and I solemnly believe it would be the greatest blessing which could be conferred upon both parties. To this extent I should go with the President if I had the power; but when I determine to obey instructions, I shall do it honestly and fairly. I shall, therefore, say no more on this subject.

It is true that at the special session I did endeavor to prove that the present banking system, under its existing regulations, was one of the very worst which the art of man could devise. Under it, ruinous expansions and revulsions must continue to succeed each other at stated periods, and many of the best and most exterprising men of the country must become its victims. I then expressed a hope, not unmingled with fear, that the State Legislatures at their next session might impose wholesome restrictions upon their banking institutions—restrictions which would prove equally advantageous to the banks and the people. These Legislatures have all now risen without prescribing any such regulations, and we are destined again and again to pass through the same vicissitudes which we have so often already witnessed.

The Whigs have always been exceedingly unlucky in regard to the time of these periodical revulsions, occasioned by excessive banking. They have either come too soon or too late to answer their political purposes. Had the suspension of specie payments occurred one year sooner than it did, the hero of Tippecanoe might have been the successor of the hero of New Orleans. But the revulsion came again at the wrong time; and long before the Presidential election of 1840, the country will again be prosperous. The effects of the suspension will have passed away, like the baseless fabric of a vision, without leaving a trace behind. Our late experience has been so severe, that the next bank explosion may possibly be postponed until the year 1844. Whom it may then benefit I know not, nor do I much care. One thing is certain, that these revulsions can never do any thing but injury to the party in power. It is the nature of man to accuse the Government, or any thing else, except his own misconduct, for his misfortunes.

I now approach a much more agreeable part of my subject; and that is, to prove that the banks must and will speedily resume specie payments. I shall attempt to establish that now is the very time, the accepted time, the best time, and, within the period of a few months, the only time, when they can resume, without the least embarrassment. Some of the causes which will speedily effect this happy result, I shall enumerate.

In the first place, I shall do the banks of the country generally the justice to say, that since the suspension of specie payments they have curtailed their circulation and their loans to a great extent, and have done every thing they reasonably could to atone for their past extravagance. The banks of Pennsylvania, including that of the United States, during a period of ten months, commencing in January, and ending in November, 1837, had reduced their circulation from twenty-five millions and a quarter to almost seventeen millions, and their discounts from eighty-six millions and a half to nearly seventy-one millions, whilst, during the same period, they had increased their specie from five millions and three-quarters to upwards of seven millions. From all I can learn, they have been since progressing at nearly the same rate, though I have not seen their official returns. The banks of other States have been generally pursuing the same course. The consequence is, that the confidence of the country in their banking institutions has been, in a great degree, restored. I feel convinced that if they should resume specie payments to-morrow, in the interior of Pennsylvania, at least, there would be no run upon them, except for as much silver change as might be required to supply the place of the miserable trash now in circulation under the denomination of shinplasters. Besides, they would soon receive on deposite a greater amount from those who have been hoarding specie, under the belief that it would be safer at home than in the banks, and in the hope that they might hereafter use it to great advantage. No foreign demand now exists to drain the banks of their specie; on the contrary, the reflux tide has set in strongly, and is now wafting immense sums of gold and silver to our shores.

But, sir, another powerful cause of resumption exists. Our exports of cotton have, many months ago, paid our foreign commercial debt. Whilst that has been extingished, the disastrous condition of our currency has reduced almost to nothing the orders of our merchants for foreign goods. Our imports are of small comparative value. In the mean time, our cotton crop of 1837 has been regularly and steadily seeking its accustomed markets in England and France. We have sold much, and bought little, and the balance in our favor is nearly all returning in specie. From the last English accounts which I have seen, the exports of specie from that country to this were still on the increase; and now, by almost every vessel from abroad which reaches our shores, we are receiving gold and silver. Specie, by the latest advices, was the most profitable means of remittance from England to the United States, yielding a profit of four per cent. When Congress met in September last, the rate of Exchange against us on England was upwards of twenty per cent. It is now reduced to six per cent. which is three or four per cent. below the specie par. A great revolution in so short a period! It proves how vast are the resources of our country.

This great revolution has been effected by means of our cotton. The English manufacturers must have this article, or be ruined. This necessity has reversed the ordinary laws of trade, and the foreign market for it has remained firm and steady, although we bring home scarcely any equivalent, except in specie.

If a large portion of our cotton crop still remains unsold, so much the better. The golden tide will continue so much the longer to flow into our country. It is the policy of our banks to take it at the flood, and go on to fortune. If the banks do but seize the present golden opportunity, they will have completely fortified themselves before a reverse can come. This state of things cannot always continue. A reaction must occur. If the banks wait for the ebbing tide, and postpone a resumption until our merchants shall make heavy purchases abroad, and specie shall begin to be exported, they will then encounter difficulties which they need not now dread. I again repeat that this moment is the accepted time for the banks to resume.

But it is not only the ordinary laws of trade which are now bringing vast amounts of specie to our country. Two other causes are operating powerfully to produce this result.

The conduct of the Bank of England, in arresting its credits to the American houses, which was the immediate cause of the suspension of specie payments, has been loudly condemned by men of all parties there. This measure has done that country nearly as much injury as it has done this, because England must always suffer from every derangement in our currency. The Bank is now conscious of this truth, and is retracing her steps. She has increased her stock of bullion between February, 1837, and March, 1838, from £4,032,090 to upwards of ten millions sterling. She is now strong, and it is her interest, as well as that of the people of England, that she should use this strength in assisting us to resume specie payments. Accordingly, she has, through the agency of one of our most intelligent and enterprising citizens, made an arrangement to furnish the banks of New York one million sterling in specie, to aid them in resuming payments in gold and silver. This million is now arriving, by instalments, in the United States. In resuming at the present moment, our banks have every thing to hope, and nothing to fear, from England.

Again: The spirit of internal improvement is abroad throughout our land. States and private companies have loans to make for the purpose of erecting their public works. Money is now plenty in England, and is every where seeking an investment. The derangement in the business of that country has thrown capital out of employment. The rate of interest has been reduced to three and three and a half per cent. Their capitalists are anxious to make secure investments in loans to our different State Governments, and incorporated companies, at a higher rate of interest than they can obtain at home. These loans are now being disposed of in England to a very large amount; and the greater proportion of their proceeds must return in specie to this country. Every thing is propitious to an immediate resumption by our banks.

Will the Bank of the United States resume? I confess I do not doubt the fact. She has made a false movement, and it is the great prerogative of strength to acknowledge and retrieve an error. Her late manifesto against the resumption of specie payments has not found a single advocate on this floor. It has struck dumb all her friends. But yesterday she might have stood against the world. To-day there is none so poor as to do her reverence. Even those who must politically suffer by the resumption, because "it will be conclusively employed at the next elections, to show that the schemes of the Executive are not so destructive as they will prove hereafter," have not dared to break a lance in her defence. This was not wont to be the case in days of yore, for hitherto her champions have been always ready to do battle in her cause. Notwithstanding all which has been said upon the subject, I am not one of those who believe that the Bank of the United States is not able to resume. Although the statement of her condition, as recently published, is not very flattering, yet her resources are vast. She is able if she were willing. Of this I cannot entertain a doubt.

Again: Will not the Bank take compassion on the good city of Philadelphia, which has ever been devoted to its interest? Boston has been called the Athens of America; New York, the great Commercial Emporium; and Baltimore, the Monumental City; whilst Philadelphia has been distinguished by the name of the City of the Bank or marble palace; and well have her citizens earned this distinction by their loyalty. Will the Bank now consent to see her commerce and trade languish, and her star wane before that of New York, rather than retrace its steps and resume specie payments? No, never. Forbid it, gratitude!

That this must be the effect, who can doubt? Merchants who come from a distance to purchase goods with money in hand will go where they can buy the cheapest; and goods at a specie standard must always be cheaper than in a depreciated currency. Those who have produce to sell, especially if the sale is to be made upon credit, will select that market where they will receive its price in a sound currency. Already the prospect of resumption in New York has made Philadelphia bank notes worth less by five per cent. than those of that city. What will this difference become when the one city shall have resumed, and the circulation of the other shall be irredeemable paper? Who that has money to remit or deposite will send it to Philadelphia, to be returned in notes depreciated to an extent which cannot be foreseen, when they can send it to New York with a perfect confidence that it will be returned to them according to the specie standard? Under such a state of things, the trade of New York must increase and flourish at the expense of that of Philadelphia. I have not time, at present, to enter into further particulars on this branch of the subject.

The people of Pennsylvania have submitted patiently to the suspension of specie payments by their banks. They have bowed to the necessity which existed, and have treated them with kindness and generosity. The Bank of the United States has proclaimed its ability to resume, and our other banks are in the same situation. The necessity for a further suspension no longer exists. Pay your honest debts when you are able, is a maxim dear to the people of Pennsylvania. This duty has now become a question of morality, far transcending any question of policy. If these privileged corporations now any longer refuse to pay their honest debts, either for the sake of their own advantage, or from a desire to elevate one political party and depress another, the indignation of honest men, of all parties, will be roused against them. There will be a burst of popular feeling from our mountains and our valleys, which they will be compelled to respect. Thank God! public opinion in the interior of Pennsylvania is yet stronger than the money power. Our people will never submit to the degradation that their banks shall furnish them no currency but that of irredeemable paper; whilst, throughout the State of New York, the banks shall have resumed specie payments. Nothing could be more wounding to my own pride, as a Pennsylvanian.

If our banks should hold out, under the command of their great leader, until the first day of January next, many of them will never be able to resume. The public confidence, which their conduct since the suspension has hitherto inspired, will long ere that distant day cease to exist. No run would now be made on them in case they resume; but if they are forced into the measure by public opinion, after resisting as long as they can, the days of many of them will then be numbered. Honesty, duty, policy, all conspire to dictate to them a speedy resumption.

In conclusion, permit me to remark, that the people of the United States have abundant cause for the deepest gratitude towards that great and glorious man now in retirement for preventing the recharter of the Bank of the United States. He is emphatically the man of the age, and has left a deeper and more enduring impress upon it than any individual of our country. Still, in regard to the bank, he performed but half his work. For its completion we are indebted to the president of the Bank. Had the Bank confined itself, after it accepted the charter from Pennsylvania, to its mere banking and financial operations—had it exerted its power to regulate the domestic exchanges of the country—and, above all, had it taken the lead in the resumption of specie payments, a new bank, Phœnix-like, might have arisen from the ashes of the old. That danger, from present appearances, has now passed away. The open defiance of Congress by the Bank—the laws of the country over and over again violated—its repeated attempts to interfere in the party politics of the day—all, all have taught the people the danger of such a vast moneyed corporation. Mr. Biddle has finished the work which Gen. Jackson only commenced.

Not one particle of personal hostility towards that gentleman has been mingled in my discussion of the question. On the contrary, as a private gentleman, I respect him; and my personal intercourse with him, though not frequent, has been of the most agreeable character. I am always ready to do justice to his great and varied talents. I have spoken of the public conduct of the Bank over which he presides with the freedom and boldness which I shall always exercise in the performance of my public duties. It is the President of the Bank, not the man, that I have assailed. It is the nature of the institution over which he presides that has made him what he is. Like all other men, he must yield to his destiny. The possession of such vast and unlimited power, continued for a long period of years, would have turned the head of almost any other man, and have driven him to as great excesses.

In vain you may talk to me about paper restrictions in the charter of a bank of sufficient magnitude to be able to crush the other banks of the country. When did a vast moneyed monopoly ever regard the law, if any great interest of its own stood in the way? It will then violate its charter, and its own power will secure it impunity. It well knows that in its destruction the ruin of hundreds and thousands would be involved, and therefore it can do almost what it pleases. The history of the Bank for several years past has been one continued history of violated laws, and of attempts to interfere in the politics of the country. Create another bank, and place any other man at its head, and the result will be same. Such an institution will always hereafter prove too strong for the Government; because we cannot again expect to see, at least in our day, another Andrew Jackson in the Presidential chair. On the other hand, should such a bank, wielding the moneyed power of the country, form an alliance with the political power, and that is the natural position of the parties, their combined influence would govern the Union, and liberty might become an empty name.

MR. BUCHANAN'S REPLY TO MR. CLAY, ON THE SAME DAY.

Mr. BUCHANAN said he had never enjoyed many triumphs, and therefore he prized the more highly the one which he had won this day. He had forced the honorable Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] to break that determined silence which had hitherto sealed his lips on the subject of this bill. Thus, said Mr. B. I have adorned my brow with a solitary sprig of laurel. Not one word was he to utter upon the present occasion. This he had announced publicly.

[Here Mr. CLAY dissented.]

Mr. BUCHANAN. I thought he had announced the other day his determination not to debate the question, and stated this as the reason why he propounded to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. WALL] the question whether, in his opinion, John Brockenbrough and Albert Gallatin could be constitutionally punished by Congress for re-issuing the old notes of the Bank of the United States.

[Mr. CLAY again explained.]

Well, said Mr. BUCHANAN, the Senator did intend to address the Senate on this subject, and the only sprig of laurel which I ever expected to win from him has already withered. Yet still there was an evident reluctance on his part, which all must have observed, to enter into this contest. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. PRENTISS] had made an able constitutional argument in opposition to the bill. With the exception of that gentleman, and the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. PRESTON,] a profound silence had reigned on this (the Whig) side of the house. The question had been propounded by the VICE PRESIDENT, and the vote was about to be taken, when I rose and addressed the Senate. Immediately after I had taken my seat, the Senator from Kentucky sprung to his feet, and has made one of his best speeches, for it belongs to the character of his mind to make the ablest efforts with the least preparation. I will venture to say he had not intended to make that speech when he entered the Senate chamber this morning.

[Mr. CLAY admitted this to be the fact.]

Then, said Mr. BUCHANAN, I have succeeded, and my sprig of laurel is again green.

The gentleman says I may hang Nick Biddle, if I please; but I please to do no such thing. I would be sorry to subject him even to the punishment of imprisonment denounced by this bill; and if he should ever be convicted under its provisions, I hope the court may content itself with the infliction of a mere pecuniary fine. Hang Nick Biddle, indeed! I wish to keep him for the service of the Whig party, should they ever come into power. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. PRESTON] had said, at the extra session, that Mr. Biddle, if appointed Secretary of the Treasury, would, in thirty or sixty days, I forget which, heal all the disorders in the currency, and remove all the financial embarrassments of the Government. His appointment would prove a sovereign panacea for all existing evils. Now I go for this Administration both from principle and inclination, and shall support the re-election of the present President; but if I were a Whig, the Senator from Kentucky would be my first choice. I should, therefore, be very sorry to deprive him of the services of Mr. Biddle, who will make, in the opinion of the Senator's friend from South Carolina, the very best Secretary of the Treasury in the whole country.

The Senator from Kentucky asks me why I do not defend Mr. Biddle, a distinguished citizen of my own State. My answer is at hand. I cannot defend his conduct as president of the Bank, because I believe it to be wholly indefensible; and he has been attacked in no other character. I should have been proud and happy to undertake this task, could I have performed it consistently with my conscience. But why does the Senator propound such a question to me? I confidently expected Mr. Biddle would have been defended by a much more eloquent tongue. I defend him! when the eloquent gentlemen all around me are his own peculiar friends; and yet, strange to tell, not one of them has attempted to justify his conduct. "But yesterday he might have stood against the world." "He has fallen, fallen from his high estate." Whence this ominous silence? I wished to hear him defended, if it could be done, by gentlemen of his own political party, who have never hitherto shrunk from such a responsibility.

The Senator asserts that the Bank of the United States is no longer in existence. But are not the president, directors, and officers, the same that they were under the old charter? Has it not branch banks in at least two States—Louisiana and Georgia, and branch agencies scattered over the rest of the Union? And to render its continued existence still more palpable, has it not seized all the notes of the old Bank, good, bad, and indifferent, and converted them to its own use? Why, sir, according to its very last return, it has but little more than three hundred thousand dollars of new notes in circulation, whilst the circulation of its old notes exceeds six millions. Is it not still diffusing its blessings and its benefits every where, in the opinion of its friends and admirers? Why has it not, then, proved to be the grand regulator of the currency, and prevented a suspension of specie payments? If that were impossible, why is it not, at least, the first among the banks to urge their resumption? Had it acted thus, it is possible it might have obtained another charter from Congress. But when we find not only that it could not save itself from the general crash, but that it is now the great leader in opposing a resumption of specie payments, we must lose our confidence in its power as a grand regulator.

But this Bank, says the Senator, is a mere domestic institution of Pennsylvania. With one of its arms stretched across the Atlantic, for the purpose of loaning money, buying bills, and regulating exchanges there, whilst, with the other, it conducts immense banking and trading operations here, coextensive with the Union, how can it be called a mere domestic institution of a single State? Nay, more: it seems, by its last manifesto, to have taken "the great commercial and pecuniary interests" of the Union into its keeping, both at home and abroad. Sir, a single State cannot furnish employment for its immense capital. It would starve within such narrow limits. It is no more a State institution now than it was under the old charter, except that its existence as the same identical corporation has been continued by an act of the Legislature of Pennsylvania, instead of an act of Congress; and that, too, with much greater powers than it formerly possessed. It never ventured to plant itself in England under the old charter. No sir, let not gentlemen delude themselves. The old Bank of the United States still lives, and moves, and has its being, without even having changed its name.

The Senator from Kentucky asks, why pass this bill? He says it is wholly unnecessary; and whilst he admits that the present Bank had no legal power to reissue these old notes, he thinks it ought not to be prevented from acting thus, because these notes furnish the best and only universal currency in the Union. The Senator reminds me of the ancient heretics which existed in the Church, mentioned and condemned by the Apostle Paul. Their doctrine was, that it was lawful to do evil that good might come. It seems we are now to have a similar sect of political heretics, whose doctrine is, violate the law, if you can thereby furnish a good currency for the people. But there was not the least necessity for any such violation. As the old notes came in, the Bank might have supplied their place by circulating its own new notes. They are a better currency in every respect; because the present Bank is under a legal obligation to redeem them on demand. Not so in regard to the old notes. Their immediate redemption depends upon the honor of the Bank, and nothing more. I have no doubt Mr. Biddle intends to redeem them; but he may be succeeded by another and a different man. Besides, the Bank may, in the course of time, become insolvent; and in that event the payment of its own notes and debts must be preferred to that of these resurrection notes. It is certain that no direct remedy can be had upon them against the present Bank.

The Senator denounces the present bill not only as unconstitutional, but as the most enormous stretch of power he has ever known to be attempted. I am glad to find that the Senator has become the advocate of a strict construction of the Constitution, and an enemy to the exercise of doubtful powers. In this particular we agree. And I am much pleased to learn from himself that he does not concur with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEBSTER] in deriving power over the paper currency of the country from the clauses in the Constitution authorizing Congress to coin money and regulate commerce. By abandoning this latitudinarian construction, however, he virtually surrenders up the power to create a National Bank. The Senator shakes his head, but I shall endeavor to prove that this is the dilemma in which he has placed himself. On what ground did the Supreme Court decide the Bank to be constitutional? It was because Congress, possessing the express power to levy and collect taxes for the purpose of paying the debts of the United States, might create a bank by implication, if they believed it to be a necessary agent in the execution of this taxing power. Now will any man, at this day, pretend that the taxes of the Government cannot be collected, and its debts paid, without the agency of such a bank? I think not. It must have been for the purpose of extricating himself from this dilemma, and finding a power somewhere else to establish a Bank, that the Senator from Massachusetts asserted a general power in Congress to create and regulate the paper currency of the country, and derived it from the coining and commercial clauses in the Constitution. I should be pleased always to agree with the Senator from Kentucky, and I am glad that we unite in denying the power claimed by the Senator from Massachusetts.

In regard to the power to pass this bill, I shall state the proposition of the Senator from Kentucky as fairly as I can. He says that the Bank of the United States is a corporation created by a sovereign State, and that this bill, intended to operate upon such a corporation, is wholly unconstitutional and subversive of State Rights. Now, sir, if the bill were intended to act upon the Bank, as a Pennsylvania corporation, I should abandon the argument. The president and directors of this Bank sustain two characters, totally separate and distinct from each other. They are officers of the Pennsylvania Bank, and in that character they are beyond our control. But they have voluntarily assumed another character, by becoming assignees and trustees of the old Bank chartered by Congress, for the purpose of winding up its concerns; and it is in this character, and this alone, that we have any jurisdiction over them. We do not attempt to interfere with the Bank as a corporation of the State of Pennsylvania. No, sir: we only undertake to operate upon it as the assignee of our own old Bank. The gentleman asked if the old Bank had assigned its property to individual trustees, could we pass any law to compel those trustees to wind up its concerns? Most certainly we could; because, no matter into whose hands the duty of winding up our Bank may have passed, we should possess the power to compel a performance of that duty. This power of Congress can never be evaded or destroyed by any transfer to trustees made by officers created by our own law, whether the transfer be legal or illegal. Our power attaches to such trustees, and will continue until they shall have closed the concerns of the Bank.

The gentleman says that the power to create a bank is one implication, and that to wind it up is a second implication, and to pass this bill would be piling implication upon implication, like Pelion upon Ossa, which cannot be done under the Constitution. Now, sir, to what absurdities does not this argument lead? By implication you can create a bank for a limited period, which you cannot destroy after that period has expired. Your creature, the term of whose existence you have foreordained, becomes eternal in defiance of your power. And this because you cannot add implication to implication. The gentleman asks where do you find this winding up power in the Constitution? I answer, wherever he finds the creating power. The one necessarily results from the other. If not, when you once call a bank into existence, its charter, although limited to a few years, becomes in fact perpetual. You cannot create that which you cannot destroy, after it has lived its appointed time.

As to Mr. Gallatin and Mr. Brockenbrough—nobody pretends you can touch them or their banks by your law. The bill is confined to your own agents, acting under your own law, and therefore subject to your own jurisdiction. These agents are as much yours for the purpose proposed by the bill, as the president and directors of the old Bank would have been. There is a perfect privity, as the lawyers would say, between the two; nay, there is a perfect identity. It is no argument to say that the old Bank is dead; but even this is not the fact. We have extended its existence at the present session, without a dissenting voice, in either House, for the purpose of prosecuting and defending its suits, and it has always continued to elect a President and Board of Directors.

The Senator has asked if the Bank of England or any of the banks in Canada had ceased to exist, and their agents in this country should re-issue their old notes, whether we would claim the power of punishing them for that cause. This question, in my opinion, presents the only instance of haste and want of sufficient reflection in the gentleman's speech. There is no analogy between the two cases. Congress never created the Bank of England, nor any bank in Canada, and therefore Congress can never claim any power to close their concerns. We assert no power except over our own Bank and its trustees. We cannot interfere with the banks of the several States, much less with those of a foreign country.

The Senator thinks he has caught me in a palpable inconsistency. He says I first condemned the expansion of the banks in this country, and afterwards condemned the contraction of the Bank of England. I might have done so, in the special case of the refusal of that bank to extend its accustomed credits to the American houses, without any inconsistency; but I expressed no opinion of my own upon the subject. In stating the causes which produced the suspension of specie payments in the United States, I said that this act of the Bank of England had been condemned in that country both by their statesmen and men of business. I passed no censure whatever on the conduct of that bank, and the gentleman, therefore, need not have reminded me that it would but little regard my censure. I am content to confine my humble exertions to our own institutions at home, leaving to other gentlemen the glory of having South America on one side of the Atlantic and Greece on the other, shouting hosannas in their praise.

The gentleman asks, with a triumphant air, where is England and France at the present moment? Are they not prosperous, whilst we are embarrassed? In regard to England, I answer that money there is plenty and cheap; and this simply because business has been paralyzed by the great convulsion under which we have both suffered; and it is the capital which has been thrown out of active employment, from this very cause, which is now seeking investment at a low rate of interest. The commerce and trade of England have fallen off to such an extent that Parliament has been obliged to borrow two millions sterling to meet the current expenses of the Government. In this particular they are placed in a similar situation with ourselves. And yet after all the light which has been shed upon the subject, the gentleman still attributes that convulsion which has shaken the commercial world to its centre, to the removal of the deposites, the Specie Circular, and Gen. Jackson.

I have but lately turned prophet; and there has been such poor success in that line on this side of the House, that I have almost determined to abandon the trade forever. In one respect I resemble the false prophets of old, because they phophesied nothing but good. This may probably result from my sanguine temperament, and my desire to look upon the bright side of human affairs. In my prophetic vision I have therefore never, like the gentleman, denounced war, pestilence, and famine against the country.

The gentleman strongly condemns the members of the present cabinet. I am willing to accord to the President the privilege of selecting his own agents and advisers, without any interference on my part. When he, or they, shall recommend measures of which I disapprove, I shall exercise my right of opposing them as an independent Senator. I do not believe that any evidence can be produced that the President and his cabinet are opposed to the credit system of the country. If this should ever appear, it will then be time enough for me to denounce such a policy. My instructions have prevented me from expressing my views at length upon this subject. They contain nothing, however, which forbid me from saying, nay I am only expressing their sentiment when I assert, that a separation of the business of the Government from that of the banks, would be one of the greatest blessings which could be conferred on the country. In releasing the banks from the Government, and the Government from the banks, the interest of both parties would be promoted, mutual jealousies and recriminations would be ended, and the currency and business of the country would cease to be involved in the perpetual struggles which exist for political power.

I might say much more in reply to the gentleman, but I forbear.

RESURRECTION NOTES.

REMARKS OF MR. ROANE,

OF VIRGINIA,

In Senate, April 23, 1838—On the engrossed bill to prohibit the issue and circulation of the notes of the late Bank of the United States.

Mr. ROANE said: I do not rise, Mr. President, to make a speech, as nothing was further from my mind, when I entered this chamber, than to open my lips on the subject before us. The Senate knows that I do not often trouble them, and that I am always brief in my remarks; and if I was disposed to be otherwise on the present occasion, I would not at this late hour, and protracted stage of the debate, trespass on their time and patience. But, having formed a very decided opinion in favor of the measure under consideration, and concluded, only a few moments since, that it was perhaps my duty to say something, I rise thus unexpectedly to assign, in such language as the occasion may prompt, the reasons which control the vote I shall give.

Mr. President, I have ever been a strict constructionist of constitutions—most especially of our limited Federal Constitution—so much so, as to have opposed measures merely because I thought them unconstitutional. Nay, sir, I have ever acknowledged the justice, and felt the force, of the excellent rule just adverted to by the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. WHITE] that it is best not to vote for a measure when the mind entertains even a doubt of the constitutional power to pass it. I hope I shall ever abide by this safe and sound rule. Entertaining these sentiments, the very first moment that the sound fell upon my ear, that there were constitutional difficulties in the way of this bill—that the Congress of the United States does not possess the power to arrest this outrageous fraud, perpetrated under the cloak, but in reality, in defiance of a law it had passed—I was struck with astonishment, and at once resolved to review, calmly and dispassionately, the opinion I had formed. I have done so. I have listened, not only with a profound and anxious attention, but with a jealous vigilance, to every word and argument used to establish the proposition; and, sir, I must be permitted to say, that so far from being convinced that there is any such constitutional impediment, I have not been able to find even "a loop or hinge to hang a doubt upon" as to the right.

Sir, I voted against the passage of the law incorporating the late Bank of the United States. I am one of the few members of either House of the present Congress who voted against that law, and, perhaps, the only one who voted against it on constitutional grounds. I then thought, as I now think, that Congress had no power whatever, either express or implied, in the Constitution, to pass such a law. But, sir, when I voted against that law because I thought it unconstitutional, I little dreamed that when the twenty years within which the operations of the Bank it created were limited, should have rolled around, we were then to be told that it is unconstitutional to compel it to wind up its concerns: that we should then hear it proclaimed, on the floor of either House of Congress, that the immense amount of paper money which that Bank was thereby authorized to issue and keep in circulation for twenty years only, might, by any conceivable management, trick, or finesse, be kept in circulation for an indefinite period of time.

What, Mr. President, is meant—what do we understand—when we speak of "winding up a concern?" Is it not, let me ask, of the very essence of winding up the affairs, or concerns of a bank, that it should collect and pay its debts, and, above all things, draw in and cancel its promissory notes? Has the late Bank of the United States, or its agents, or trustees, or executors, if you choose the term, done this? Have they attempted to do it, or any thing like it? On the contrary, have they not done exactly the reverse, in direct and known violation of the law which gave it existence? Have they not at this moment out, and in circulation among the people, millions of the identical notes, struck by the plates of the late Bank of the United States, signed by its officers, and issued by the authority of its legitimate directors, acting under a law of Congress? None deny these facts, and none deny the iniquity of the transaction; yet are we gravely told, that Congress has no power to arrest the progress of the evil; forsooth—because the bank is dead—because its charter has expired! And, sir, we should be told by these same gentlemen that neither the State of Pennsylvania, or any other State of this Union, has the power to arrest it. Does not every person know that those who took possession of the notes of the late Bank of the United States, on the expiration of its charter, became its trustees or representatives, to wind up its concerns; and as such, were responsible for their faithful conduct to the law under which they were appointed, and under which the bank whose concerns they were deputed to close, lived and died? When Congress, sir, incorporated the late Bank of the United States, they acted but as trustees or agents of the people, and, as such, made for and in behalf of them two pledges—one was to the company thus incorporated, to guarantee to them, so long as they complied with the provisions of their charter, all the privileges and immunities it conferred upon them. The other was to the people, that after the term of twenty years had elapsed, all those exclusive privileges and immunities should cease; and the vast amount of paper money issued by the bank, should be withdrawn from circulation, unless they, the people, should choose to revive and extend its charter. The people have not so chosen. But the first pledge has been fully redeemed. They have submitted most quietly to the entire fulfilment of the law; and the bank has been secured by the judiciary department, whenever it was necessary, in the full enjoyment of all its legal rights. Has the second pledge been redeemed? Has the paper money put in circulation by it or its representatives in pursuance of a law of Congress, been withdrawn and cancelled in pursuance of the same law? No, is the ready and undeniable answer from every lip. Yet are we told that outrageous as is this proceeding, in defiance or absence of law, Congress has no power whatever to interfere! That, gross and palpable as is the fraud, Congress cannot either prevent it or punish its perpetrators! Who I ask in the name of common sense, and common justice, and common honesty, can punish it, if Congress cannot? If it be an offence at all, it must be an offence against law, or within the reach of law, and all will admit that it is not an offence against a law of any State of this Confederacy, or of any foreign nation. Were not these notes originally issued by authority of a law of Congress; and are they not continued in circulation in the teeth of a plain provision of that same law, which, I contend, is in full force so long as one single one of them is permitted to perform the functions of a circulating medium.

I am asked, Mr. President, to put my finger on the clause in the Constitution which grants the power sought to be exercised by the bill on your table? I in return ask those who can put their finger on the clause in the Constitution which grants the power to establish a National Bank, to show me the clause which withholds the power to limit its charter, or, when it has expired, to wind up its affairs? Surely, sir, it is most unreasonable to require those who deny any power whatever in the Constitution to establish a National Bank, to show a clause in that instrument which grants the power to compel a National Bank to wind up its concerns! The honorable Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. WHITE] has truly told us that those who claim the power to establish a National Bank, have rambled through all the mazes of the Constitution, and have located their right, sometimes in one, and sometimes in another of its clauses, until it had been called, not unaptly, a vagrant power. Call it, sir, by what name you will, a "vagrant," or even a "squatter," it affords no reason to me to grant it a "pre-emption right."

Mr. President, I pretend not to show any clause in the Constitution which grants the specific thing contemplated by the bill on your table. I am free to say, that I do not derive the power to pass that bill from any literal clause, or specific grant, in the Constitution. I, who deny the right of Congress to pass irrepealable laws, and contend for its power to alter, amend, repeal, or enforce, the laws it does pass, am at no loss for power to pass the bill under consideration; it goes with, and is a part of, the power of legislation granted to Congress by the Constitution. It is of the very essence of legislation that a vice or mischief growing out of one law, should be abated or punished by another law; that where one law has opened a door for fraud, another law should shut it. I contend, sir, that every part and parcel of the bank law of 1816 which has not been fulfilled, or repealed, is now in full force and effect; and I further contend, that that section of it which provides that the bank it created should, within two years after the period of its limitation, wind up its concerns, has neither been repealed nor complied with, and is therefore in force; and that if further legislation is necessary to compel a compliance with its provisions, it is not only the right, but the duty, of Congress to afford it. That bank was allowed two years to wind up its concerns and close its business. If, instead of closing them in one day, as they pretended to do, they had gone on in good faith to draw in and cancel all its outstanding notes, and had been unable to perform the duty within the time limited, does any person doubt the power of Congress to have extended the time? Why, then, when they have acted notoriously with bad faith, and have permitted the two years to run out without an effort, and, as is now apparent, without the slightest intention, to withdraw its notes from circulation, can not Congress compel them to comply with their engagements, and punish them for a continuance of such open and flagrant violation of law and duty?

But, Mr. President, we are told, in answer to every objection to a continuance of this fraud, that it is not the late Bank of the United States chartered by Congress, but the new Bank of the United States chartered by the State of Pennsylvania, that perpetrates it. It is, sir, an unwarrantable imputation on the vigilance and fidelity of the constituted authorities of Pennsylvania, to suppose for a moment that such can be the fact. The Bank of the United States chartered by that State, is expressly prohibited from issuing notes of a less denomination than ten dollars, under pain of an immediate forfeiture of its charter. Most of the millions of the paper of the late Bank of the United States now in circulation are notes of five dollars; and I therefore repeat, that it is a violent presumption to charge that Bank with such folly. My life on it, that if the constituted authorities of Pennsylvania were to charge it with this violation of its charter, it would promptly deny it. It would say, "Shake not your gory locks at me; you cannot say 'twas I that did it." And go, sir, to the directors of the late Bank of the United States, and charge the act upon them, and their ready and evasive reply will be, "We do not issue these notes. The charter under which we once acted has expired. The Bank we once directed is defunct!" And thus, sir, they "palter in a double sense;" and by the vilest equivocation, perpetrate, and may perpetuate a fraud, unless Congress interposes its power to prevent it. The time has been when the good old maxim "qui facit per alium facit per se" was intelligible and valuable; but modern bank legerdemain and hocus pocus nullifies its salutary principle with the same ease and complacency with which it has heretofore defied your laws, and disregarded the plainest obligations of commercial morality.

The whole amount of the game played by the late Bank is this: I make myself trustee or agent for myself; and by that involution of terms, and consequent confusion of ideas, they are enabled to assume or shift obligations, as interest or policy may dictate. Nicholas Biddle and Co. president and directors of the Bank of the United States of Pennsylvania, become trustees or agents for the same Nicholas Biddle and Co. directors of the late Bank of the United States; and by quibbling, trickery, and cunning, one is made to mean two, and two to mean one, as occasion may prompt.

Suppose, Mr. President, that the State of Pennsylvania had not chartered her bank; and instead of that Bank undertaking to wind up the affairs of the late Bank of the United States, that you and I, or other individuals, had assumed that duty: think you that by issuing and reissuing, we would have been permitted to keep in circulation millions of the notes of that Bank up to this time, or the end of time? And if not, to what other law but the law of Congress should we be amenable for the attempt to do so? Suppose that the Bank of the United States of Pennsylvania should forfeit its charter, and cease to exist: is it pretended that there would be no power to withdraw from circulation the notes in question, and that she might, by another device, keep in circulation as long as she pleased, all the paper she now has out?

Mr. President, I, as chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, have reported to the Senate a bill to renew and extend the charters of the six banks of this District, which all expire, by limitation of law, on the fourth of July next. If this bill is rejected, does any person pretend that these banks could, under any pretext, or by any device, be permitted to continue to issue and reissue their notes? I have, also, reported, from the same committee, two bills granting further time to two banks of this District, that stopped years ago, to wind up their concerns. I deemed it my duty, before making such a report, to ascertain that the trustees had been using due diligence in closing the concerns of these banks; and especially in drawing in and cancelling their notes. Had I have found that they had been remiss in this duty, I certainly would not have recommended further indulgence, and it would have been the duty of Congress to apply the corrective; and I ask, sir, whether any of these District banks are more directly and exclusively the creatures of Congress than was the late bank of the United States?

There can be no doubt that this bill, the provisions of which are applicable to all companies incorporated by Congress, has grown out of the conduct of the late Bank of the United States; and it does seem to me that if it could be forgotten for a moment that that bank ever existed, there would not be an objection, constitutional or otherwise, to its passage. No Senator has raised his voice in defence of the conduct of the bank in regard to its circulation. On all sides of the Senate it is said that it is objectionable, improper, and indefensible. But, alas! say they, we have no power to do any thing to prevent or punish it! I, sir, use stronger, and, I think, justly merited, terms when I speak of its conduct in this particular. I say that it is a gross, rank, palpable fraud! And "I go for the fraud!" To what extent, if any, the Government of the United States is bound for the ultimate redemption of these notes, I do not pretend to inquire; but this I will venture to say: that thousands of those who daily receive and pass them, think them sustained by the credit and faith of the Government; and well they may, as on their face they show that they were issued on the authority of the Government, and at a time when it was a large stockholder in the bank. It is said, sir, that, if we pass this law, it cannot be executed by the courts. That may be. But, sir, whatever the rules of courts of justice may require, or the chicanery of able lawyers may prevent, the passage of this bill will, at least, be the opinion of Congress that an extensive fraud exists, and will, I trust, have its effect in suppressing it. It is impossible to suppose that those concerned in it can disregard or escape the force of public opinion. If, sir, an executor, a guardian, or an agent had so used the funds of his testator, ward or principal, as have those to whom was confided the notes of the late Bank of the United States, he would not only have incurred the severest penalty of the law, but be degraded in the estimation of every honorable man. I give my vote with pleasure for the passage of the bill, and leave the execution of the law to those who feel what I feel to be due from every public man in his particular sphere of action, to the majesty of law, the sanctity of justice, and purity of morals.

DISTRICT BANKS—FREE BANKING.

REMARKS OF MR. NILES,
OF CONNECTICUT,

In Senate, May, 1838—On the bill for the recharter of the banks in the District of Columbia.

Mr. NILES said that the question now before the Senate was a preliminary one, whether Congress ought to renew the charters of the banks named in the bill for twenty years. Whatever might be his opinion regarding the banking system, he was disposed to act reasonably and liberally towards the District. As long as banks exist elsewhere, and are the medium through which commercial and other business is transacted, it would be unjust to deny to the people of the District the facilities which were enjoyed elsewhere. He was perfectly willing that they should have bank capital to the full extent which the business and the wants of the people required.

But he was not prepared to say that it would be proper at this time to renew the charters of the existing institutions for twenty years. The objection in his mind to doing this, arose from the present condition of the banks. What is the condition of these institutions? In common with other banks in the country, they suspended payment a year ago, and have been going on since issuing their notes, without redeeming them. They have not resumed payment; and are now, strictly speaking, broken banks. They are now in a prostrate condition; and having suspended payment, we can know nothing of their real situation. They may be perfectly sound and solvent; yet if the fact was known to be so, it would not remove the difficulty from his mind These banks have all forfeited their charters; they are existing without law, and in violation of law; and the question is, whether we shall resuscitate them, and bring them into life, after they have become defunct by their own act; whether we shall renew their charters for twenty years, whilst they remain in this prostrate and suspended condition? If we do this, will it not be to sanction their suspension; and, what is more, to legalize their non-resumption? It is not necessary to examine now the causes of the suspension. Whether the banks suspended for a sufficient cause, and whether that was brought upon themselves by their over action and mismanagement, or by circumstances beyond their control, he would not now examine. These questions have gone past; and it certainly is not necessary to inquire into them on this occasion.

So far as regards the banks in this District, he was willing to suppose that they suspended from an imperious necessity. But the question now is one of resumption. To recharter these banks in their present condition, whilst they are issuing their notes without redeeming them, and their agency is exerted to flood the community with irredeemable paper, would be to legalize this debased currency, and sanction their non-resumption.

Sir, is the Senate prepared to do this? Is it prepared to lend its influence to prolong the present state of things? There are two standards now raised: one of resumption, the other of non-resumption. Will the Senate enlist under the latter, and give its sanction to the violation of law and of moral obligation which belongs to this condition of non-payment on the part of the banks?

This question may not be thought of great importance, because it is confined to the District, and can have no general influence on the state of the currency of the country. The principle, however, is not the less important because its operation is limited. For one, he would not consent to renew the charter of any bank, unless for a short time to wind up its affairs, which was existing in violation of law and of all moral obligation. He was not willing, for any supposed necessity or temporary advantage, to act in disregard of sound principles of legislation. He would in no way sanction the further suspension of payment by the banks. Let them resume, perform their obligations to the public, and return to a correct course of business, and it will then be in time to decide on the renewal of their charters. Mr. N. said he should prefer to continue their charters, on the condition of their resuming payment by a certain day, to the next session, when we could with more propriety act on the question of a renewal for twenty years If this course was not pursued, the only ground on which he could consent to a renewal of their charters at this time was, that there should be incorporated into the bill a provision that they should resume payment by a specified day, and if they fail to do so, that the act shall have no operation. Resumption by a given day must be a condition precedent, or he could not vote for the bill.

Does it not belong to Congress to say when the banks can resume, and when they ought to resume? Or will you leave this to the corporations themselves? Does it not belong to the Legislature, here and elsewhere, to decide this question? But have they decided it in a single State in the Union? What is the present condition of the country? Humiliating and degraded in the extreme. He could not reflect upon it without the deepest mortification. Sir, the moneyed incorporations have triumphed over the Legislatures and over the people; they have subdued the public will; they have trampled the laws under foot, and usurped the powers of legislation. Merely private corporations, the creatures of the Legislatures, have bid defiance to their creators, and declared themselves independent of all authority. If they have not done this in form, they have in substance, as they have assumed the power to decide when their own interests and the public interests required that they should pay their debts. What if a number of merchants, who had failed or stopped payment, should hold a convention to decide when it would be expedient for them to pay their debts, and when the public interest required them to do so? Would not such a proceeding be scouted as an outrage upon common sense and common honesty?

But the banks have done this; they have assumed the prerogative of declaring when their own interests and the interests of the public required them to pay their debts. They have established a system of bank legislation, which has superseded the legislation of the States. They have held two conventions; and what did they do? Why, the first agreed to adjourn, and the second fixed a day for resumption, so remote that, instead of its being an effort to promote resumption, it was an attempt to prolong the suspension. It must have been viewed in this light by the banks themselves, for almost immediately, many of the banks set about the resumption of payment. The banks in New York, and some in all the Eastern States, have already resumed, although the bank legislature fixed a time so remote as next January. This business of resumption cannot depend on any conventional regulations. All solvent, sound banks can resume when they please; they can resume as well to-day as two or four months hence. Foreign exchanges being decidedly in our favor, and specie, instead of going out of the country, is coming in in a flood tide, and being no longer at a premium, any bank which can pay in any thing can pay in specie.

But he did not propose to go into the question whether the banks could or could not resume, or when they ought to resume. What he contended was, that that was a question which belonged to legislation, and not to the banks. It was not for them to say how long their own interest, or the public interest, required the suspension to continue. Their duty was the same as any other debtor, to pay their debts the moment they were able to do so. With them it was a question of ability, not of expediency. If there were any considerations of public policy, or expediency, which demanded the delay of the resumption, this belonged to the State legislatures, and to Congress as regards this District. But has a single State exercised this power? Most of their legislatures have been in session since the suspension of the banks; and he believed there was not a State in the Union that had passed any law for compelling the banks to resume payment, either immediately, or at any future period. Not one, it would seem, that dared to coerce the banks into a performance of their obligations to the public. The Legislature of Massachusetts has been in session the whole winter, and has given much of its attention to the subject of banks; they have had some eight or ten broken banks in their hands, but, he believed, they had done nothing in regard to the present condition of their banks, either to settle the question whether they ought to resume, or to subject these corporations to any restrictions, or disabilities, tending to compel a resumption. Instead of this, he believed they had repealed or suspended the provision in their laws, subjecting the banks to the payment of twenty-four per cent. interest, after the refusal to pay any demand. What was this but giving a sanction to the suspension, and encouraging the banks to prolong it. He believed in Virginia the banks had been, by direct legislation, justified and protected in their suspension. The same was done in New York for one year, which he believed expired this day, which was the anniversary of the bank explosion. But the Legislature that has just closed its session, refused to extend the time, which was a tacit or negative act coercive upon the banks. It would seem that they dare not, by a direct act of legislation, renew the license to the banks to disregard both the legal and moral obligation of contracts. Although he differed politically with this Legislature, yet he was disposed to do them justice. In these days of bank supremacy and legislative degradation, they were certainly entitled to credit for refusing to sanction a further extension of the non-payment of the banks, and the prolongation of the evils of a depreciated currency. The strong appeal made to them from an influential quarter, was not heeded; but had it been, it is difficult to say when the country would have recovered from its present degraded condition.

In Pennsylvania, one branch of the Legislature exercised the power which belonged to them, and passed an act to compel their banks to redeem their bills; but it failed in the other branch, where the moneyed influence prevailed.

In his own State, the Legislature which was in session at the time of the bank explosion, passed an act declaring that the charters of the banks had been forfeited, but re-establishing and confirming them on condition of their resuming payment in specie by the first of June of the present year. This bill was strenuously opposed by the bank party, and its original provisions essentially modified. Another Legislature has since been elected, and is now in session, and it remains to be seen what measures they will adopt to relieve the people of the State from the evils they now suffer from inconvertible paper. The Governor, although he dwells at length on the subject of the currency, says not a word about any legislation being required to compel the banking institutions to return to a lawful and honest course of action. It seemed to have suited the purpose of his Excellency better to charge the disorders of the currency to what he was pleased to call the "visionary measures" of this Government. So far as the Executive is concerned, it seems that the banks are to be left to go on in violation of law and of all moral obligation, and to pay their debts just when they please. Surely, sir, there is nothing very visionary in this; as it is a palpable disregard, not only of every sound principle of legislation, but of every principle of morality and of common honesty. Of what the Legislature may do, we have some evidence from their first movement, which consists in repealing the law passed last session authorizing the issue of one and two dollar bills, subject to a forfeiture in case they should not be paid in specie. This removes all restrictions from the banks, and allows them to issue bills of the lowest denomination, and redeem them when they please.

Mr. N. said he believed he could safely assert, that no State had exercised any power over the banks since the suspension, or attempted to coerce them into a resumption. The banks have become supreme, they have become independent of the Legislative power, and of the will of the people. Their influence has been found irresistible, they have triumphed in all the States, and elevated themselves above the law.

Sir, is there nothing alarming in this state of things? In the existence of a power in this country, which is entirely independent of the regular constituted authorities—a self-constituted and self-existing power, free from all responsibility, and which acts by the most subtle and dangerous of all means, by operating on the interests and on the fears of the people? Have we not been told, sir, by that venerated man, who by common consent has been regarded as the Father of his Country, that all combinations or associations, in whatever form they may exist, assuming or exercising power in opposition to, or independent of, the constituted authorities, was dangerous to liberty. Whether such irregular, irresponsible, and independent power exists in the form of corporations, in a military force, or in factious combinations, or in any other form, it is equally inconsistent with all regular Government, and dangerous to freedom.

If the States have been subdued by the moneyed power, shall Congress follow their example, and yield to it also? Or shall we assert and exercise the power which belongs to the Legislature? Is it not our prerogative to decide when the banks shall resume, when they may be in a condition to do this, and when the public interest requires it? As our action is confined to this District, this question may not be deemed of much importance; but the principle is of vital importance, and he could not by any act, directly or indirectly, sanction the monstrous assumption of these corporations, that they can suspend payment when they please, and resume when they please, and that it belongs to them to say when their own interests and the public intereests require them to conform to the law, to comply with their obligations, and to pay their debts To renew the charters of these banks in their present condition, would be to sanction this doctrine, and to legalize their non-resumption.

But we are told by the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. ROANE,] that this bill contains a provision compulsory on the banks in regard to specie payments. The provision is, that they shall resume the payment of their debts in specie, when the banks in Baltimore and Richmond resume. He was not satisfied with this; it belonged to Congress to fix the time, and not leave it dependent on other banks; and it should be a condition precedent, so that the renewal of their charters should be made to depend entirely on their returning to a regular and honest course of business. If they can resume in a reasonable time to be named in the bill, it is their duty to do so; if they cannot resume, that is the best reason in the world why their charters ought not to be renewed for twenty years.

Mr. N. said that the considerations which he had heretofore submitted to the Senate against the renewal of the charters of those banks, were founded entirely on the fact of their present condition. But he had since learned other facts, which he thought the Senate could not overlook or disregard, when called on to decide on the renewal of their charters for twenty years. The facts he referred to, were the suspension of these banks, or most of them, in 1834, and their conduct at that time. They have twice suspended payment in a period of three years; and in the first instance, they were almost the only banks in the country that did suspend. Whether that suspension proceeded from political motives, whether they were controlled by a sinister influence, and were induced to co-operate with the Bank of the United States, in its gigantic efforts to create a factitious panic, or whether they suspended from weakness and necessity, he should not undertake to inquire. He called attention to the fact that they did suspend, and to their conduct during that suspension; whether it proceeded from one cause or the other, unless it could be satisfactorily explained, it would seem to be evidence of gross mismanagement.

When these institutions appear before us, and ask for a renewal of their lease for twenty years, they should come with clean hands; and it becomes our duty to look back, and see how they managed their affairs; how they have discharged the important trust committed to them; whether they have respected their charters, and performed their engagements to the public. If this was not proper, he saw no possible use in a limitation of charters. Is not the object of a limitation to hold them to a stricter accountability, by giving them to understand that the expiration of their lease would be a day of reckoning. If they have been faithful and honest, and have not violated their corporate privileges, it might be right to renew their charters, in preference to creating new institutions. But if they have been faithless, fraudulent, and have violated the law of their existence, it was proper that their affairs should be closed.

The question then is, sir, what was the conduct of these corporations, or some of them, in 1834, when they stopped payment? What explanation or excuse has been given for that act, which is in itself a failure, and a forfeiture of their charters? He had heard none; and if any existed, or could be given, he should like to be informed what it was. Is the stoppage of payment by a bank to be regarded as a slight offence? or is it to be regarded as an act which is a palpable violation of all its obligations and duty—which necessarily destroys its credit, depreciates its issues and its stock, and exposes the whole public to a serious loss?

But these corporations not only suspended in 1834 without any satisfactory excuse, but their conduct at the time, and afterwards, appears to have been most reprehensible. Having failed, and depreciated their own notes and stock, the directors, through the agency of brokers and others, appear to have gone into the market and bought up their own notes and stock, at a discount, in some instances, of fifty per cent. Whether such purchases were made for the benefit of the institutions, or of the directors, is not perhaps very material. If the directors were speculating for themselves, the objection is equally strong. The corporations can act only through their officers and directors, and must be held responsible for their conduct.

Is conduct like this in any way to be countenanced by the Senate? and can institutions which have been thus mismanaged have any claims for a prolongation of their corporate existence?

Mr. N. said, on examining this bill he was surprised to find that, although the capital of the banks was fixed at a specified sum, yet they were authorized to issue new stock. He could not understand what this meant, because the stock of a bank is supposed to be all taken up, and to be held by individuals; and when its charter is renewed, no new stock is to be created, unless the capital is enlarged. But the capital of these banks is not enlarged, and yet new stock is to be issued. This mystery is explained by the fact to which he had alluded, that a considerable portion of the stock had been purchased in, either for the benefit of the corporations or the directors, and purchased at fifty per cent. discount in some instances; and we are now asked to renew the charters of these banks, and raise the value of their stock to par. This would be a fine speculation for the managers of these institutions, or for the corporations themselves. How the plunder was to be shared was not very material.

Mr. N. said the facts to which he had referred were contained in a report made by a committee of the House of Representatives in 1836, to which he would beg to call attention. He would read some part of the report, which appeared to have been the result of a very elaborate and thorough investigation of the condition and management of these corporations, and refer to some part of the testimony derived from the directors themselves. It is stated in this report, that "in 1821 there were in the District of Columbia eleven banks, the capitals of which amounted to $5,214,641; of these, four, whose capitals amounted to $1,994,694, have since failed. At different periods at the time of their failure they had of notes in circulation, private and public deposites, the aggregate sum of $741,037 dollars. The committee have not had time to ascertain what proportion of these stocks was ever in fact paid in originally; neither do they know exactly what part of these deposites and circulation, if any, have been or will be redeemed; but from the price at which the obligations of those institutions have been sold in the market, it is not unreasonable to conclude that the United States (the deposites of which alone in these banks exceeded $450,000) and the people of the District have lost in capital, circulation, and deposites, a sum exceeding one million seven hundred thousand dollars." So much, sir, for the first chapter in the history of banking in this District, by which it appears the Government and the people of the District have sustained a loss approaching two millions of dollars, by four banks, which have failed outright, and disappeared from the face of the earth. He would now call the attention of the Senate to that part of the report which relates to the banks whose charters are proposed to be renewed by the bill under consideration. "The other seven banks chartered in 1821 (all of which are now petitioning for a recharter) had originally capital amounting together to $3,279,629, of which they have severally purchased up to the amount of $1,258,887, and having now, in pledge, stock for debts to the amount of $205,488, which leaves actual capital paid in $1,815,252, being $1,464,376 less than the amount with which these institutions commenced operations. Here the committee must again say that they have not had time to ascertain precisely the sum for which each share of this stock has been purchased in by the several banks. That would be a work of some labor, and without it an opportunity is not afforded to decide how large or how small is the amount of the speculation of those who hold the residue of the stocks of these banks; but it may be safely assumed, that where a large proportion of the capital stock of a bank has been purchased in by the institution, there has been gross mismanagement of its affairs. It is imprudent for a bank having notes in circulation to own or loan largely on pledges of its own stock; and it is indubitable, that large amounts of the stock of a bank, skilfully conducted, would not be so far below par that no purchaser could be found for it, when pledged to secure the payment of a loan at six per cent. but the bank itself.

"From the testimony of a respectable broker, to be found in the appendix, it appears that the stocks of two or these banks have sold as low as fifty per cent. below par.

"There were four banks in the District which suspended specie payments in 1834; one of them the Bank of Alexandria, has not applied for a recharter, and consequently, no means have been taken to ascertain the extent of the depreciation of the various obligations in the hands of the holders. At the time of its failure, its capital was $500,000, of which $115,565 had been taken by the bank in payment of debts. Its notes in circulation, its public and private deposites, amounted to $152,167. As this bank has not yet settled with the holders of its obligations, it cannot be said with certainty how much of this amount of property has been lost to the public, but we feel warranted in estimating that at least sixty per cent. of it, say $350,000, may be added to the large sums heretofore named, which have been taken from the profits of labor, and been absorbed by adventurers and speculators in currency and stocks. What amount of the stock or paper of the other three banks which suspended specie payments changed hands at a discount cannot be stated fully. It appears from the testimony of several witnesses who have been examined, and whose testimony is appended to this report, that large amounts of the stock and notes of these three banks changed hands at a discount of from fifteen to sixty per cent. And the committee regret to discover that several of the directors of those institutions, some of whom had, by their own acts, depreciated their obligations, entered the market, and purchased freely the stock and notes of the banks of which they were directors, at a discount, and then paid the paper thus obtained into the bank at par in discharge of the debts due by them thereto.

"The extent of these and other speculations in the currency of the four banks, may be measurably estimated, from the fact that they had in circulation and in deposites, at the time of suspension, six hundred and ninety-six thousand four hundred and seventy-one dollars; more than one half of which obligations, together with their stocks, changed hands in sixty days after the suspension, at an average of thirty per cent. discount to the original holder. A considerable proportion of the profits of which operations were made by the directors of those institutions, whose speculations were certainly reprehensible, as they were largely indebted to the several banks committed to their care, at the time of their respective failures, and had it in their power, by paying in current funds their own notes, to have postponed, and, in all probability, to have prevented entirely those disastrous speculations by which they profited so much while the community suffered so seriously."

Such, sir, appears to have been the conduct of the four banks now asking for a recharter, which stopped payment in 1834. By their own act, by their gross mismanagement, if not fraudulent conduct, they depreciate the value of their stock, and notes in circulation, and then go into the market, and purchase in their stock for the benefit of the institutions, at a large discount; and the notes are in like manner bought up by the directors at a discount, to pay their debts to the banks.

And these operations have not been to a limited amount only; it appears that the entire capital of the seven banks was 3,279,629 dollars, and that nearly one half of the whole was purchased in or pledged to the banks in 1836; that is to say, 1,464,376 dollars. This amount of the stock of these banks has been bought in at a discount in some instances of fifty per cent. and we are now called upon to recharter the institutions, and raise it to its par value. What must be thought of a bank which suspends payment and then buys in its own notes and stock? By their own misconduct they depreciate the value of their stock and notes, and then take advantage of their own wrong. The directors and officers of these banks knew their real condition; they knew the value of their notes and stock, but no body else could know. The stoppage occasioned distrust and alarm; whether the bills would ever be paid, or whether the stock would be worth any thing, were questions which no one but the directors and officers of the banks could decide, and taking advantage of this secret knowledge, they speculate in their own stock and bills at the expense of the rest of the community. Stock belonging to widows and orphans was purchased up in this way. He could not trust himself to speak of such conduct as he thought it deserved to be characterized, as he should have to use language which he did not wish to use. Contracts like these, it is well known, would be set aside in a court of equity as fraudulent and dishonest.

Mr. N. said he would now call the attention of the Senate to the testimony in the report in proof of the general statements he had read. William Jewell, who was a director of the Farmers and Mechanics' Bank of Georgetown, in answer to the inquiry whether he had dealt in the stock or notes of the bank during its suspension, says: "I did purchase. The bank failed during my absence in Baltimore. After my return, I told Mr. W. W. Corcoran that I wished to exchange property which I had for stock of the bank, if he should hear of any for sale. In a few days he told me that a widowed lady had stock worth, at par value, fifteen thousand dollars, for which we gave her houses and lots assessed at about eight thousand dollars. I purchased also of another person two hundred and twenty-five dollars' worth of stock, at fifty dollars in the hundred. During the last winter I also purchased three thousand seven hundred dollars' worth of stock, at fifty-six dollars in the hundred." This is the sworn testimony of one of the directors, who purchased nearly twenty thousand dollars' worth of stock at a discount of about fifty per cent. paying for most of it in real estate, which may have been over-estimated fifty per cent.

John Pickering, who was chosen a director after the suspension, says, in reply to an inquiry whether he had dealt in the stock of the bank: "I sold to a lady in Georgetown a house and lot, and took in payment two thousand nine hundred dollars' worth of stock at seventy-five in the dollar. I also exchanged property in Washington city, which had cost me less than twelve hundred dollars, for eighteen hundred dollars' worth of stock. This transaction also took place before I was a director. A few weeks ago I purchased of a broker $3,750 worth of stock, at fixty-six dollars for the hundred dollars. I have also received, during the last fall or winter, a small amount of stock in the Patriotic Bank at par, and of the Bank of Washington at seventy-five dollars on the hundred."

William Nichols says that he was in business as a broker in Georgetown, and that "late in the summer of 1834 I bought a small amount of stock of the Farmers and Mechanics' Bank at fifty cents in the dollar. I also bought a small amount of notes of the Bank of Washington and the Farmers and Mechanics' Bank of Georgetown at ninety and ninety-five cents in the dollar. I sold, at a small discount, the greatest proportion of the notes of the Farmers' and Mechanics' Bank of Georgetown to an individual, to pay a debt in the bank. I deposited also in the Bank of Washington its notes; and after the resumption of specie payments, I received specie or its equivalent therefor."

The testimony of William Prout, a broker in this city, is the most important. He says: "I dealt in the stocks of the Patriotic and Washington banks, and in the paper of all three of those banks. I bought stock of the Washington bank at fifty cents in the dollar, and Patriotic at seventy-five cents in the dollar. I bought paper of the Bank of Washington, and of the Farmers and Mechanics' Bank of Georgetown, at sixty-five cents on the dollar, and the Patriotic at eighty-five cents on the dollar. I purchased notes to an amount exceeding $80,000. I sold it again, but not to any officers of the bank; I sold them again to individuals to pay debts at the bank at a small profit.

"I made frequent sales to the directors" [this witness, said Mr. N. appears to make a distinction between officers and directors] "of the banks, at a small profit. Some was sold, I recollect, to Mr. Ingle, a director of the Patriotic bank, Mr. Edward Semmes, a director of the Bank of Washington, William A. Bradley, President of the Patriotic Bank, Jonathan Prout, and Samuel J. Todd, directors in the Bank of Washington, and Raphael Semmes, a director in the Farmers and Mechanics Bank of Georgetown. I kept no records; I speak only from recollection when our transactions were very heavy. To some of the above gentlemen I sold these notes, and took in payment their individual notes, at long dates without interest. I recollect that Mr. Smith, President of the Farmers and Mechanics Bank of Georgetown, and William A. Bradley, President of the Patriotic Bank, offered to exchange bills and notes discounted, or property of the bank, for any amount of their paper that I might procure. In the transactions between Mr. Bradley and Mr. Ingle, and myself, I think, though I am not certain, that there was no money passed. They gave me in exchange for Patriotic Bank paper, scrip of the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company, and due bills of the corporation of Washington. The scrip and the due bills were selling at that time for about eighty-five cents on the dollar."

Mr. N. said he had had but little time to examine this report, which he believed contained a mass of information tending to show the mismanagement of these banks in 1834. If he was not misinformed, it would appear in some part of the report that the bills of some of these banks were put into circulation after their suspension, and then bought up by directors at a large discount.

Mr. N. said, that in view of the conduct and mismanagement of these banks in 1834, and their present condition, he thought the better course would be to extend their charters for one or two years, to enable them to close up their concerns, and to establish such number of new banks as may be required for the wants of the District.

On the motion of Mr. BUCHANAN to amend the bill so as to require one dollar in specie for every four dollars of circulation and deposites, instead of circulation alone, Mr. NILES said the question raised by the amendment rendered it necessary to examine the principle already contained in the bill, which required a certain proportion of specie as the basis of the circulation. The soundness of this principle, and the reasons on which it rests, would, he thought, go far to decide the question of the amendment. This principle is not only one of great importance, but one about which there is great diversity of opinion. This diversity of opinion is not confined to those who essentially dissent in regard to the paper system; it is not a difference of opinion only between the ultra paper money men and the ultra hard money men, but it prevails among the opponents of the banking system. There are those, decidedly hostile to our existing banking and paper system, who feel the full force of the evils of our currency, and describe them in the strongest possible terms; who appear to look for a remedy for these evils by breaking down the monopoly principle, and removing all restrictions. They propose to apply to banking, in their utmost latitude, the principles of free trade. The free trade principles he was not disposed to controvert, (although he thought they had their limitations,) but the question is, how far are they applicable to banking, so far as that consists in manufacturing or coining money, putting it into circulation, and thus supplying the currency of the country?

Trade will regulate itself, and never flourishes well as when left open to general competition, and is free from all restriction. But will the manufacture and emission of money regulate itself, and especially when it is only a form of credit, and of no intrinsic value? Money composed of gold and silver, was it not for the facility of a fraudulent adulteration of these metals, might perhaps regulate itself. The object of coinage laws is to guard the public against fraud, and to secure a uniform fineness and weight to the pieces of metal used as money, which it would be difficult and troublesome for individuals to ascertain. But how can paper money, which cost nothing, and can be manufactured to any extent, regulate itself? What principle of self-regulation does it possess? He knew of none. But those who apply the free trade principles to banking operations, consider that if the monopoly principle was removed, the paper issued by banks would not possess the character of money. If they were right in this, their conclusion would no doubt be correct, that banking should be left entirely free. But in that case, there would be no paper money, so that by this course of reasoning they do not establish the position that paper money will regulate itself. They only propose to destroy paper money, or change its character into commercial paper or credit merely. If such a change could be effected, the currency of the country would necessarily become metallic, and the paper issued by banks and bankers would perform no other function than that of commercial credit.

If such would be the effect of applying the free trade principles to banking, the result would be highly favorable, although it would not prove that a paper currency requires no legal regulation, and that it is capable of regulating itself.

In this view of the matter, the whole difficulty resolves itself into a mere question of fact; whether, under the principles of free trade, the credit or paper of banks would cease to possess the attributes and perform the functions of money? If it should, free banking would be perfectly safe and work well. But if it should still retain the character of money, so as to supersede coin, then free banking will not be safe, unless paper money can regulate itself, which he entirely denied, and regarded as a proposition false and absurd upon its face. In regard to the fact whether the emissions of banks and bankers, under the free trade principle, would acquire the character of money, so as to supersede coin, there was no room for doubt on the subject. The experience of our own and other countries fully establishes the fact, that such paper will acquire the character and be used as a currency, and supersede specie. The existence of chartered companies, and the monopoly principle, no doubt imparts to the paper of banks more readily the attributes and functions of money. Under the free banking principle, it would no doubt require more time to give to the paper and credit of a banking company the circulation and uses of money; still, however, it would acquire them, and would as effectually supersede and displace coin as is now done by the paper of incorporated companies.

The free banking system, therefore, rests on a position unsound in point of fact. Where the law allows of the emission and circulation of credit for the uses and purposes of money, it will exist, and especially in a country where the people have been accustomed to a paper currency. So great is the facility of circulating paper money in this country, that even the authority of positive laws is found almost incapable of restraining it. As paper money will exist, unless positively prohibited, it becomes the duty of the Legislature to attempt to regulate and restrain it, so as to keep it from running into excess, and to guard the community against a fraudulent currency. The error in regard to free banking, appears to arise from not attending to the distinction between paper credit which circulates and is used as money, and paper of a mere commercial character. If banks were restrained from issuing paper to be used as money, which usurps the place of the national coin, the free trade principle would no doubt be the true system of banking. But if by free banking is meant the unrestrained manufacture and circulation of money by any company or individuals who may choose to assume the trade of brokers and bankers, without any legal regulation, restriction, or safeguards whatever, then free banking is but another name for free and legalized swindling. It is no doubt the right of any one to make as free a use of his credit as he pleases—it is as much his property as his capital; but he has no right to use it as money or currency, as that does not belong to any individual—it is a concern of the State.

Whenever, therefore, the laws allow of paper money, in whatever form it may be created and circulated, it becomes the duty of the Government to regulate it so as to give to it security and stability as far as possible, to guard the public against frauds, and check and control its tendency to excess. Mr. N. said he had thrown out these ideas, as not inapplicable to the question before the Senate; for as long as such great diversity of opinions prevail among those who admit the defects and evils of our present banking system, in regard to the remedy, he saw little prospect, or even hope, of the country ever being relieved from the calamities of a vicious banking and paper money system. Assuming, therefore, that if Government authorizes a paper currency, it is its duty to attempt to regulate it, and protect the public against frauds and excesses, it becomes necessary to inquire what principles are important to secure this desirable object; and none, he believed, was more essential or fundamental than that requiring a reasonable specie basis to sustain the issues and credits of banks.

It is well known, as has already been stated in this debate, to be a rule with the Bank of England, to require one dollar in specie to every three dollars of their circulation and deposites. This bill requires one dollar in specie to four of circulation, if the amendment prevailed, it would require one in specie for four of circulation and deposites united. This is objected to on various grounds, as being too rigid a rule.

We are told by the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. RIVES,] that there is something peculiar in this District; that it is an isolated community, unrepresented; and that, from these peculiarities, rules which might be applicable elsewhere, ought not to be applied here, or ought to be relaxed in their rigor. He could not perceive the force of this argument. If the people are unrepresented, he should regard that as an additional reason why we should be more cautious not to expose them to the dangers of unsound and unsafe banking institutions, and the evils of a fraudulent currency. And if we look to the history of banking in the District, he thought we must be satisfied that there was at least as much danger from banks here as any where else. He hoped for the honor of the country, there was no other ten miles square with the same population, where there had been so many bank failures, or where the people had suffered so severely from the mismanagement and gross abuses of their banking institutions. He could not, however, admit that there was any thing peculiar in the District; it was like other places where there was but little capital and less trade; and the disasters which had befallen the money institutions here, were, no doubt, owing mainly to the great excess of banking capital which had been imprudently created.

But, having first denied the application of the rule in regard to specie to this District, the Senator finally seemed to doubt, if not to deny, the propriety of the rule itself. He tells us that the condition of the currency in England is very different from what it is in the United States; that one-half of their currency is metallic; and a much less proportion here; and on this account, he contended, that a greater proportion of specie to circulation would be required there.

Mr. N. said he believed the reverse of that was the truth. The more specie enters into the currency of a country in general circulation, the less is required by banks as a basis to sustain their paper issues. This results from the reasons of the rule requiring a certain proportion of specie to paper. What is that reason? The Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER,] says it is to regulate the issues of banks, the principle of convertibility not being adequate for that purpose; and the Senator from Virginia [Mr. RIVES] says it is to impart to paper issues the capacity to expand and contract in the same manner as specie would do. These reasons are substantially the same, and both correct so far as they go, but they are only results of a principle which lies still deeper, and is one of more vital importance. It is a law of currency, that only a certain part or proportion of paper currency can be maintained in any country. What that proportion is, has not been established, and it would vary in different countries, and in the same under different circumstances. Still it is a settled principle, that a part only of the currency of a country, can consist of paper; as the idea of an entire paper currency is an absurdity. One important reason then why banks are required to keep a certain amount of specie, is to retain it in the country, and prevent the currency becoming entirely paper. But when the channels of circulation are one-half filled with coin, there is much less necessity for the banks which supply the paper to be fortified with specie, as they may obtain a supply, as they have occasion for it, from the general circulation.

It was said by the late Mr. Huskisson "that the circulation of one pound notes, and the convertibility of bank issues, could not coexist." The reason for this opinion is, that whilst the circulation of small notes would greatly increase the danger of runs upon banks, they would, at the same time, drive nearly all coin from circulation, and leave the country with nothing but a paper currency.

The importance of maintaining a proper portion of specie in the country was admitted by Alexander Hamilton, in his report in favor of the bank which was established in 1791. Among other objections to the banks, he notices this, that it would drive the specie from the country, and remarks that it is contended by many, that if such was the result, it would be of no consequence. He, however, does not admit the correctness of that opinion, but attempts to prove that the banks would increase capital, stimulate industry, and augment the exports, which would bring specie into the country rather than tend to drive it out.

But although it be true that the greater quantity or proportion of coin in general circulation in England would require less specie to be kept on hand by the banks, yet there are other causes operating there which do not exist here that might render more necessary. The notes of the Bank of England are a legal tender in all payments, except at the banks; they are made, by law, the standard of value, and to support that standard, they must have a strong specie basis: being treated as money in law, it must be nearly assimilated to money in fact, otherwise the standard of value would be altogether factitious and arbitrary; one which could not be maintained.

But whilst we are told that the rule in England would not be a proper one in this country, we are, at the same time, informed that there is no rule there in respect to specie, or that it is not regarded. It is said to have been departed from in 1836, when, instead of having nine or ten millions of bullion, which was necessary to maintain the proportion, the bank had but about four millions. This is true, but it is also true that the conduct of the bank was universally condemned by all parties; and their disregard of this rule of safety was alleged and believed to be the principal cause of the expansion of the currency, and the subsequent revulsion.

We are further told, sir, that the proportion of one to four of specie is unnecessarily large, and the condition of the banks in the United States in 1829 is relied upon in support of this position. It is said, on the authority of Mr. Gallatin, that at that time the banks had but one dollar in specie for eight of circulation, and asserted that our banks and currency were never in a sounder condition. That the banking institutions of the country were in a sound condition with so small a proportion of specie to their circulation, is utterly impossible. If the banks were then in a sound condition, and acting on sound principles, how has it happened that they so soon run down and exploded? If this statement is correct, they had less specie compared to their circulation than they had last year at the time of their explosion. The very fact that the banks have, in a few years, without increasing their circulation, as compared with their specie funds, beyond what it was in 1829, run down and exploded, is conclusive evidence that they were then unsound, and conducted on unsafe principles. What stronger evidence can we have of the defect of this system than its total failure?

The honorable Senator from Virginia also says this is a new principle in legislation; that it has not been recognised in any of the States, except his own, the past year; and there, one dollar of specie is required to five of circulation. Such a restriction as that is a mere mockery, as no well-administered bank can keep up such a circulation. That this principle has not been recognised in the legislation of the States is true; yet it is by no means a new principle. It is as old as the existence of banks; for originally banks of circulation keep their entire capital in specie, and their issues were true representatives of it. This principle has been gradually departing from, and, within the last few years, it has been almost entirely disregarded in this country. And what is the consequence of this? Is it not to deprive the currency of all connection with specie, and to reduce it to the common standard of commercial paper? Paper which is to be used as a currency, must have some other foundation to rest upon than mere security, or the responsibility of the issuers. It is a substitute for money, performs the functions of money, usurps the place of coin, and must, in some degree, possess the qualities and attributes of specie. It must, to some extent, be a true representative of coin, otherwise it will soon depreciate and lose its character as money.

Mr. N. said he believed the explosion of the banking system the past year, was much more to be attributed to a general disregard of the principle of preserving a sound specie basis, than to the undue expansion of the issues. In times of real or apparent prosperity, not only individuals, but corporations, forget or disregard the ordinary principles of prudence and safety. It is the instinct of banks to make as much money as they can, and this leads them to invest their entire capital where it will be productive. The specie in the vaults of a bank earns nothing, and all of them were diminishing the quantity, regarding it as dead capital; and it had become a pretty general sentiment that this was the true course of conducting banks—to loan all the capital, on mortgages or other securities, and to loan all the deposites and circulation for paper having a short run, and to depend upon this paper to meet any demand against the institution. That this course would afford the greatest profits, cannot be doubted; and that a single bank might be safely conducted on this principle, if managed prudently, will not be denied, and especially if in the vicinity of a large commercial town, where it can dispose of its discounted notes or bills, in case of necessity.

But Legislatures must not look at the operations of a single institution; they must look at the system. One bank might exchange its own credit for the credit of individuals, and carry on a business of dealing in credit without any money, as it could sell its own credit, or the credit of others which it possessed, for money when necessity required it. There would, no doubt, be some hazard in a course of this kind in a single institution. But could all the banks in the country do this? Could they all reduce their business to a mere exchange of their own credit for the credit of others, and continue this without any specie funds? This would not be practicable for three months; and it was an approximation to this state of things that run down the system, and produced the explosion.

Sir, the banking system can never regain the confidence of the people of this country, until it is brought back nearer to its original principles, from which it has recklessly departed. Bank credits, which are circulated and used as money, must become in truth and fact the representatives of coin to a reasonable extent. If made the true representative and substitute of specie, in a reasonable proportion, it will have in a good degree the attributes of specie, the stability of it, and will contract and expand in the same manner as specie would, and be governed by the same laws.

But, Mr. President, the more immediate question now is upon what rule the specie shall be graduated—whether it ought to bear a certain proportion to the circulation, or the circulation and deposites united. This question can be decided by reference to the reason on which the principle rests requiring any specie to be kept by banks. That reason, as we have attempted to show, is, in addition to greater security, to impart to bank credits, which are used as a substitute for coin, the attributes of money; and to make them, in fact, the representatives of specie to some extent. The question, then, is, what are these substitutes? What bank credits are used in the place of coin? Are there no other bank credits but bank notes? If not, then the specie should bear a proportion to the circulation only. Such, however, is not the fact. The deposites are a part of the circulation almost as much as the notes. This is especially the case in all commercial towns, where most of the business is done by a transfer of the bank credits, consisting of deposites. The merchants deposite their funds in the banks; but they do not do this for the purpose of having them lie dead there, but for the express purpose of using them. They draw checks on their deposites, which circulate as a bank credit, and when finally presented to the bank, they are not paid in its bills, but the amount of the check is charged to the drawer, and credited to the holder, on the books of the bank. This is the way in which a large portion of the business in cities is transacted. And hence it is, that banks of large capitals and large aggregate deposites, in great commercial towns, have but a very small circulation. A rule, therefore, which should require such banks to have one dollar in specie for every three or four of their circulation, would amount to nothing at all, for the real circulation of such banks, is their deposites. Country banks have a small amount of deposites, and a large circulation; city banks, or those in commercial places, have small circulations, and a large sum on deposite. These two forms of bank credit, both perform the office of a currency, and are a substitute for coin: that being the case, it is difficult to see why the rule requiring specie should not apply equally to both?

If you adopt circulation alone as a rule, you do great injustice to the country banks, and require vastly more specie of them than of the city banks, whose deposites constitute their principal circulation.

It is not very material which rule is adopted, provided you assume one that operates equally and justly. To attain this end, is the strong reason in favor of combining the two kinds of bank credit which are used as a currency, as an element by which to regulate the specie. If the note circulation alone is made the rule, the proportion of specie should be greater.

Mr. N. said he would notice one other objection which had been urged, and conclude. It is said that to require one dollar in specie to four of circulation and deposites, will be too severe on the banks, and that they cannot live under so rigid a rule. He was far from believing this. It is true that during a limited period of successful business of two or three years, the banks may not be able to make as large dividends, but for a period of ten years, he believed their profits would be greater. How is it that with the enormous privileges enjoyed by banks, few have, for the last twenty years, earned more than six per cent. on their capital stock. They have the earnings of their entire capital, of all their deposites, and of their circulation, except the small amount of specie they keep in their vaults. And yet with these immense advantages they make to the stockholders only about the ordinary income of capital.

On the first of January, 1837, the circulation of all the banks in the Union was one hundred and fifty millions, and about one hundred and thirty millions of deposites, making two hundred and eighty millions, on which the banks were receiving interest over and above their capital. At this time they had less than forty millions in specie, and if that was deducted, would leave over two hundred and forty millions of dollars, for which the public was paying them interest, in addition to their actual capital. This would amount to more than fifteen millions of dollars a year. And yet, with this immense income over and above the use of their capital, the business has afforded little more than the legal interest to the stockholders. How is this? Why, it is easily explained. The fact that the banks are allowed to use their credit without limit, in times of prosperity, almost invariably causes them to act rashly and imprudently. They make loans incautiously to doubtful persons, and they loan largely to speculators, brokers, gamblers in stocks, and to encourage bold and hazardous enterprises. Whilst the steam is up, they make one or two large dividends, and then comes the revulsion, and the heavy losses thrown upon the banks. If they were limited in the use of their credit, they would act more cautiously, more steadily, and their business would be more profitable in the end.

There is another reason why the banks have not earned more for their stockholders, which is, that a large share of their earnings is squandered in salaries and expenses Does not the fact of the enormous salaries paid by banks to their officers prove, was there no other evidence of it, that they enjoy privileges which they ought not to possess? Is there not something manifestly wrong in the idea that a mere private corporation should be able to pay its officers one or two hundred per cent. more than is paid to the highest officers of the State from whence they derive their charters? The cashier of a bank receives two and three thousand dollars, and the Governor of the State, and the judges of the Supreme Court, perhaps one thousand. Is there not something wrong in this? Must it not have a pernicious influence on public sentiment? Is it not adding greatly to the power and influence of these institutions, to allow them such privileges as will enable them, combined, to control more patronage than belongs to the State, and to pay their officers one or two hundred per cent. more than the State can afford to pay? Is not this setting up the creature above the creator? Must it not have a pernicious influence on our free institutions?

If they were more restricted in their issues and earnings, had less profits, but those more sure and stable, they would be obliged to cut down the salaries of their officers, and other expenses, and it is highly desirable that all banks were compelled to do this.

But would the restriction requiring a proportion of specie equal to one-fourth of their circulation and deposites, be oppressive and onerous upon these banks? Let us suppose a bank of two hundred thousand dollars capital, with one hundred thousand dollars in circulation, and one hundred thousand in deposites: this bank would be required to have fifty thousand dollars in specie. It would have the earnings of its entire capital, and of one hundred and fifty thousand dollars of its deposites and circulation, which cost it nothing. It would be receiving interest on a capital of three hundred and fifty thousand dollars, when its actual capital paid in was but two hundred thousand. Such would be the immense privileges enjoyed by these banks, even upon the restrictive principle proposed to be incorporated into the bill. But, sir, the question is not one of profit to the banks, but of safety to the public. It is the first and important duty of the Legislature, in establishing a bank, and authorizing the circulation of paper money, to take care that the public shall be safe; and if this cannot be done consistent with the interests of the banks, then the system is bad, and should be abandoned. He believed, however, there was no difficulty on this point: the banks will continue to make their profits; the only difficulty is to throw around them sufficient guards to afford security to the public. He hoped the amendment would be adopted, and that the true specie principle would be incorporated into our banking system, so far as Congress has any jurisdiction over the subject. How far our legislation would be respected by the States, or influence their action, he should not stop to inquire. He did not propose to make model institutions here, but if called on to establish banks for the District, he wished to establish them on sound principles, and if this was not attained, no bill could have his vote.

TREASURY NOTE BILL.

SPEECH OF MR. JONES,
OF VIRGINIA,

In the House of Representatives, May , 1838.—On the bill to authorize the issuing of Treasury notes to meet the current expenses of the Government.

MR. SPEAKER: I rise, sir, to ask the indulgence of the House, while I shall undertake to assign the reasons which induce me to give to the bill, now under consideration, my support; and, in doing even this, I am departing from a rule which at a very early period of this proceeding I had laid down for the government of my own conduct. I had believed, sir, that the best service it would be in my power to render my country, at this time, was to consume as little time as possible, in order to enable us to act promptly, and speedily, upon the bill before us. Nor should I be disposed now, for a moment, to depart from my original determination, but rather have remained a silent spectator of the scene that has been acting around me, had it not been for the course the debate has taken, and which seems to render it necessary, on the part of those at least who are members of the committee from which this bill was reported, that the grounds of their action should be fairly and frankly presented to the House, and to the country, in order that all may have afforded to them an opportunity of judging of its merits.

Sir, I should feel that I was recreant to the trust confided to me, and unworthy of the place I hold here, if I could set tacitly by, and tamely submit, without explanation or resistance, to what I have heard in the course of this debate. Sir, what have we witnessed? An honorable member from Tennessee, [Mr. BELL,] has made a labored argument to prove that this bill is calculated to mislead and deceive the public mind; that in effect it is to operate as a deception and fraud upon the public. Sir, when this extraordinary declaration was made by that member, I sat in anxious expectation to hear so grave a charge sustained by as grave reasoning, based upon proof, which would be clear, strong, irresistible, incontrovertible. But in what did his proof consist? Not in facts which applied to the bill itself, which is identical in principle with that passed at the last session of Congress, after the most minute investigation, mature reflection, and full debate; but in his own naked declaration that the title to the bill is deceptive! Sir, as to the title, I candidly confess that my attention has never been drawn to it for a single moment; indeed, I never spent a thought upon it until I saw it taken hold of in this House, and relied upon by honorable gentlemen as a ground of attack upon those who have been instrumental in reporting it; and without pretending to know the reasons which influenced the framer of the bill, and the author of its title, to adopt the phraseology which he has, I presume that he, looking to what was intended by Congress at its last session, considered that it was the object of the former bill to give to the Goverment the use of ten millions of dollars of Treasury notes, up to the full end and close of the present year; and perceiving that such was not the effect of that law, but, on the contrary, that we have now returned into the Treasury, and cancelled, about six millions of those notes, he very naturally concluded that what was intended by the bill of the last session was not in fact done; and hence he adopted the following as its title: "An act to carry into effect an act approved the 12th day of October, 1837, to authorize the issuing of Treasury notes."

Mr. Speaker, the members of the Committee know too well the character of the Opposition in this House, to have attempted so shallow an artifice, if, under any circumstances, they could be capable of resorting to artifice at all; an Opposition which can find nothing that proceeds from this Administration or its supporters to approve, but every thing to condemn. They know that no such thin and gossamer covering as a deceptive title to a bill, could ever conceal the perpetration of a fraud upon the country; and yet the argument is, to prove that an attempt is made to place this question before the country in a point of view calculated to mislead and deceive the public mind. Sir, does not every man know (and none better than the honorable member from Tennessee) that the title to this, as well as every other bill that comes up for consideration, is at all times under the control of the House, to be altered and amended at its will and pleasure? And I doubt not I express the sentiments of every member upon the Committee friendly to the bill, when I say that there would have been no objection on the part of any one of them to any proper amendment which should be proposed, better suited to the taste of honorable gentlemen, come from what quarter it might. But the people are to be imposed upon, it seems; and imposed upon by the mere reading of the title to a bill!

This is taking it for granted that, while they are able to read the title, they have not intelligence enough, but are too grossly ignorant, to understand the body of a bill just ten lines in length! Sir, I will not dwell upon this frivolous objection. It would be insulting to an intelligent people.

Mr. Speaker, we are all here, I apprehend, doubtless in quest of truth. I am sure it is the anxious desire of all gentlemen, of every party, to obtain correct information, to enable them to act understandingly, and with a view to promote the best interests of our common country. I feel, however, that I am circumscribed, very much so, in the remarks I have to submit to the consideration of the House; but I trust I shall not be found violating your rules of order; intentionally I never shall. I propose, sir, to discuss this question upon proofs, and not upon mere assertion, or loud and empty declamation. It is upon the proofs alone I shall rely, in the confident expectation that I shall satisfy all, who may not have been convinced before, if there be such here, that this Government has the most ample means to redeem all its obligations; and although they may not be all available in the course of the present year, which I shall not insist upon, yet that it has ample means to redeem all its obligations, and that, too, before there can be any call upon it under the law now proposed to be passed. This induces me to look back for a single moment to days gone by; for it is sometimes useful to refresh our memories by recurring to the past, even if it be not very remote, and although it may be at the risk of involving honorable gentlemen in inconsistency.

It will be recollected, sir, that at the called session of Congress, in September last, the finances of the Government were scanned with the closest possible scrutiny; yes, sir, by eyes that looked to it for the express purpose of proving the ability of the Government, in a pecuniary point of view, to carry out the provisions of the Deposite act of the 26th of June, 1836. It cannot be so soon forgotten that it was then maintained that the condition of the Treasury was such as not only to enable the Secretary to meet the current demands upon it, and to pay over the fourth instalment, but that there would then remain some millions of dollars of surplus beyond the legitimate wants of the Government. These were the views then entertained, and acted upon, by those who now oppose the passage of this bill; and by none were they more strongly urged and sustained, on that occasion, than by the honorable member from Tennessee, [Mr. BELL,] who sits before me; but who now maintains, while the same state of things exists, the very reverse of the proposition which he then labored to establish and to prove.

A strange alteration of opinion this, Mr. Speaker, in the space of a few short months! Then the gentleman could demonstrate, to his own satisfaction at least, that there were millions upon millions in the Treasury over and above the nine millions for the States—over and above all the necessary expenses of the Government—to meet its legitimate wants, and over and above our extraordinary expenses on account of Indian hostilities; but now, alas! the scene has changed, and the same gentleman has made a labored argument to prove that there is nothing, no, not a solitary dollar, not even in expectancy, in the Treasury, to meet the legitimate wants of the Government, but that there will be at the end of this year an actual deficiency of about eleven millions of dollars.

"Tempora mutantur, et nos mutamur in illis." "The times have changed, and we change with them." [Mr. BELL, in an under tone, I have not changed.] The gentleman informs me that he has not changed. I can only say, sir, that his ground is changed, his argument is changed, and his results are changed, and that to the tune of some twenty or more millions of dollars. This may be no change. The honorable gentleman may not regard it as one in these ever-changing and changeable times, and perhaps, therefore, I ought not to have adverted to it. But the majority of the two Houses of Congress, entertaining a widely different opinion from the one expressed by the gentleman at that time, upon this subject, deemed it expedient to pass an act withholding from the States the fourth instalment of deposites; and satisfied oo, that, even with that aid, the available means of the Government would be insufficient to meet the ordinary demands upon it, they furthermore authorized an issue of ten millions of Treasury notes, not, be it remembered, because the Government did not possess abundant means to meet all the demands upon it; but because, amidst that universal embarrassment which had extended itself over the whole mercantile community, embracing the banking institutions of the country, it was scarcely to be hoped that the several amounts held on deposite by the banks, and due from merchants on duty bonds, could be made available to the Government without greatly increasing those embarrassments which all were anxious to mitigate. Sir, at that time, all eyes were turned to Congress, anxiously looking for and awaiting such relief as would, through the ordinary channels of legislation, be extended to what was every where represented to be a suffering community. An anxious desire to fulfil this expectation, so universally indulged in, led to legislation, both towards the banks which had been selected as depositories of the public money, and the merchants whose duty bonds had fallen due, and were about to fall due, which, as we all know, placed, for the time, beyond the reach and control of the Government some eleven or twelve millions of dollars, due from the deposite banks and from merchants. It will be recollected that the provisions of one of these laws gave to the merchants an extension of nine months to pay their bonds, making the whole credit twelve and fifteen months, instead of three and six months, as provided by the then existing laws; and that the law in reference to the banks, gave to them an extension on their liabilities to the Government of one-third until July next, one-third until January next, and the balance until the first of July, 1839.

And now, with a view to further explanation, I am led naturally to inquire, what was the amount thus rendered unavailable by this indulgence granted by the Government itself, by our own legislation; legislation, designed and intended for the sole aid of its debtors, whether individuals or corporations. By reference to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, it will be found that there were—

In the deposite banks, subject to draft on the 1st of January - -	$5,411,364
Due on account of merchants' bonds, say - - - - -	6,000,000
The report was, at first, necessarily imperfect, from the returns not having come in, and the amount is there set down, at only $4,000,000 but it is since ascertained to be largely over $6,000,000. The returns, however, are still incomplete, and the amount will probably be found to approach nearer to $9,000,000.
	$11,411,364

Being, as you will see, sir, in round numbers, eleven millions and a half of the Government's resources, placed beyond its control, by its own legislation, for the relief of its debtors; legislation too, be it remembered, subsequent to the passage of the Treasury note bill, on the passage of which, if indulgence was anticipated, it was not expected to extend beyond the limitations of that act, viz: the 31st of December next.

But we have been told, in the course of this debate, that the issue of ten millions of Treasury notes was intended to supply the deficiency occasioned by the indulgence extended to the merchants and the banks. Sir, it was so intended; and, permit me to add, that there existed at that time strong reasons to believe that that aid extended to the Government by means of those Treasury notes, would have been just as effectual to enable it to meet all demands upon it, as if the amount due from the banks and merchants had been paid up to the last dollar; but owing to circumstances, over which this Government could exercise no control, over which the legislation of Congress could exercise none, this then reasonable expectation has been disappointed. And how, permit me here to inquire, has it been disappointed? Why, we all know that, in consequence of the general suspension of specie payments by the banks, in connection with other causes, which the limits of this debate do not authorize me now to examine, it had the effect of depressing the Treasury notes from an eighth to a quarter, and half of one per cent. below the value of gold and silver; and, as nothing could be received in payment of the public dues but gold and silver or Treasury notes, the certain and inevitable consequence was, growing out of that anxiety which every man feels to protect his own interest, and pay his debts in the most convenient mode, and with the smallest amount of money; I say, sir, the consequence was that, in the cities of New York and Philadelphia, points at which we collect, I believe, full one half of the public revenue, they sunk below specie par, and were consequently paid into the Treasury almost as fast as they were issued, redeeming, to be sure, the exact amount of Treasury notes returned, but bringing into your Treasury nothing that could be available to meet the ordinary demands upon the Government. Now, sir, had these Treasury notes, as was then expected, been spread over the whole year, coming back in something like equal proportions, the means furnished by them, together with other resources, would have enabled the Government to take up much the larger part of them, or at any rate have left but a very small amount indeed to be redeemed at the time when the provisions of the law would have expired. I say, sir, this would have been the result, the inevitable result; but, instead of that, nearly six millions of the amount were redeemed in the first four months of the year: because, as they came back, and were canccelled, the amount so returned and cancelled was equivalent, pro tanto, to applying thus much of the resources of the Government to their redemption.

Now what does this bill propose? We have heard it reiterated by the honorable member from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] that we have borrowed ten millions last year, and that we now seek to borrow another ten millions by this bill. Yes, sir, it has been sent forth to the world, that we are for borrowing twenty millions; when there is not a single paragraph, or line of the bill, in virtue of which there ever could be more than ten millions outstanding at any one time. If you choose to call it borrowing, it was originally but ten millions, but as about seven millions (including seven hundred thousand dollars of them, returned and cancelled during the last year) have been redeemed; it is, so far as the former act was concerned, and by the present circumstances, growing out of its operation, a debt of three millions only; that being the amount now outstanding. And what do we now propose? Not to issue a new batch of Treasury notes; but to pass a bill by which you will put it in the power of the Government again to issue the same amount which was authorized by the act of the 12th of October, 1837, as they shall be returned to the Treasury and cancelled, and as the exigencies of the country may require; and thus to anticipate, and for a short period only, its own means by which it will be enabled very soon to redeem the whole of this debt.

Mr. Speaker, I have said that the means of the Government are ample to meet all its liabilities; and how does it appear? I speak now from that condemned, that much abused communication of the President of the United States, sent to us on Friday last, consisting of some fifteen or twenty lines. What are we therein told, sir? That there are on deposite with the States $28,000,000, and more than $15,000,000 due from individuals and banks; and he might have added that, at the close of the present year, the accruing revenue from customs and the sale of public lands, would amount to $15,000,000 besides, making an aggregate of some $58,000,000. Sir, I feel that I should be careful when I rely upon this communication of the President, after the remarks that have fallen from the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. BELL.] I know that I should rely with great caution upon any statement which the President of the United States may deem it proper to make to Congress; for what have we heard from that honorable gentleman? Why, he has said, in round and unmeasured terms, that this was gross and unwarrantable dictation to Congress on the part of the President. It would seem, then, that it is gross and unwarrantable dictation for him to undertake to make to us a communication of the fact that the Treasury is upon the verge of becoming unable to meet its liabilities, and in that communication to recommend what he deemed expedient for the best interests of the country. Sir, it may not be unimportant for us to bear in recollection the fundamental law of our land. It may not be amiss to read the article in the Federal Constitution, bearing upon this subject, for the purpose of seeing the duties imposed by that sacred instrument upon this high officer. We shall there find his duty so clearly and plainly marked out and defined, that he who runs may read.

Let us, then, go back to the Constitution, and see what this act of his is that has drawn down upon him this heavy and unmitigated denunciation. That instrument prescribes, in the second and third sections of the second article, that "he may require the opinion, in writing, of the principal officer in each of the Executive Departments upon any subject relating to the duties of their respective offices;" and, having done so, "he shall, from time to time, give to the Congress information of the state of the Union, and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient:" not that he may; but here is the more forcible and imperative word, shall, in the Constitution itself, which has been so strongly objected to, and so severely criticised, by honorable gentlemen in another part of this debate. Yes, "he shall," from time to time, give to Congress information of the state of the Union, and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient." The President has no choice about it.

The people have placed him in the station he occupies, and here are the duties imposed upon him by the Constitution. It "shall" be his duty, to do what? "Recommend to their [our] consideration such measuees as he shall judge necessary;" the very thing, sir, the President has done, to the spirit and the letter. And yet, while, as we have seen, he is pursuing but the strict and straight line of his duty, and when he would have been criminal if he had failed to do what he has done, he is to be denounced and held up to the world as a dictator, and have the finger of scorn and contempt pointed at him, for the performance of the very task imposed upon him by that Constitution which he has sworn to support! But I will not dwell longer upon this subject.

Mr. Speaker, it has been remarked further, that this communication was an attempt to deceive. Sir, not only are your committees charged with an intention to deceive, but your heads of departments also; and when the President himself, in the performance of his high duty, faithfully discharges it, the same charge is also reiterated against him. It is done to deceive the people of the country, is the allegation. How is it made out? Why he has told us that there are twenty-eight millions of dollars on deposite with the States, and more than fifteen millions due from banks and from individuals; and this, a fact susceptible of demonstration to all, is the head and front of his offending. Let us see then how it stands, and if there be any ground for the charge; for I agree that the President's high station ought not to shield him, if he has been guilty. But, sir, if I can prove, as I feel assured I can, that there is not the slightest foundation for the charge, then, I think, it must be conceded on all hands, that it was alike ungenerous and unjust to make it. Sir, have we, or have we not, $28,000,000 on deposite with the States? Will any gentleman here deny that? Is there a man in this House who will rise in his place and tell me that the fact is not so? Have you distributed it finally? Was there a man who, at the time the deposite law was passed, maintained that it was designed as a distribution among the States?

[Mr. WISE, in an under tone. It was so intended.]

It may have been so intended by some who voted for it; but certain I am, they never avowed it; for if they had, I doubt very much if one-half the men who sustained it would ever have recorded their votes in its favor.

Mr. WISE. I avowed it.

Mr. JONES. My colleague informs me that he avowed it; and I am sure he did, because he says so.

Mr. WISE. My colleague misunderstands me. I voted against that bill; but nevertheless, I avowed it to be the intention of those through whose agency it was passed; and I did not hear it contradicted.

Mr. JONES. The very thing, sir, I was urging. I said that those who advocated that bill never intimated that it was for a positive and final distribution of the surplus. I know there was an impression that some of those who voted for it believed that to be the intention, but they never avowed it; and that but confirms my position, that if they had, the measure never would have been adopted. Then I presume it will not be denied that we have $28,000,000 on deposite with the States.

The next item in this communication in which deception is charged, is where it sets forth that there are $15,000,000 due to the Government from banks and individuals. Sir, is this true or false? Has the President told the truth or not? Let the question be answered by facts and not by argument; for argument is not needed where we have to deal with facts like these. Here, then, sir, are the facts, which speak conclusively, and must bring conviction to the mind of every man who examines them. In the deposite banks on the 1st January - - - - $5,411,364
Due from merchants, say - - 6,000,000
Bonds of the Bank of the United States, say - - - 7,000,000
$18,411,364

Or put the merchants' bonds at even four millions, deducting the amount ascertained since the previons returns, and the President's estimate, or statement of our resources, is still below the actual amount due. Sir, the statement was true to the letter; and yet, for having told this plain truth, to enable us to come forward in a becoming spirit to aid our country, and rescue it from temporary embarrassment, he is held up to the people and denounced for having furnished statements which are not to be relied upon.

The honorable member from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SERGEANT,] in noticing the remarks of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, in which he stated that the time was rapidly approaching when candid and intelligent men would do justice to this Administration, for its firmness in rejecting the counsels of fear, and disregarding the denunciations of frenzy—for its elevated patriotism in sacrificing temporary popularity to preserve the sumpremacy of the laws, and the permanent welfare of the Union—characterized that period as constituting a new era in the history of this Government.

Sir, the gentleman's new era is already ushered in upon us, to be commemorated, I presume, by the arguments which I am now attempting to answer; in which truth is made to mean falsehood, and open and fair dealing knavery and fraud. It is indeed a new era when such perversions are given to facts, and facts, too, in reference to which sophistry itself cannot possibly mislead the judgment. When the Secretary of the Treasury makes a communication to this House, it seems, too, that he "stumps" every body, from the venerable member from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] down to the most beardless among us. Some gentlemen say that his communications are mysterious and obscure, others that he cannot write grammar, others again that he cannot cypher, in short, that he is the merest dolt in the world. But when, as now, a rather more laconic communication is transmitted to Congress, one that presents the question as clear as a sun beam; when the President speaks, and tells you what no man can misunderstand; why then, forsooth, there is knavery and fraud at the bottom. Your Secretary cannot be understood by any body, and the President is endeavoring to practice a fraud: and, strange as it may appear, this is urged here by members in the Congress of the United States, intended to go forth to the people of this country, and to be relied upon as true.

Sir, permit me to say this is drawing largely indeed, upon the credulity and ignorance of the people. But I will proceed. Taking, then, the amount due from the States, and the amount due from the merchants and banks, and estimating (which is a low calculation) the accruing revenue of the current year at $15,000,000, we have an aggregate of resources of $58,000,000 under the control of the Government. But I will narrow the question still further, and come down to the resources of the Government for the present year only; and how stands that account? I solicit attention to this statement, because I have prepared and tested it with much care, and if I have fallen into any error, I am open to correction; for it is far from my wish, even inadvertently, to mislead any one. I am aware that statistics are dry things, and do not suit the taste of every one; but from them we derive many of our best lessons of instruction, and they are indispensable to lead us along the unerring path of truth.

Resources of the Treasury for the year 1838.

Balance in the Treasury on the 1st of January, 1838		$500,000
To be received in 1838, from Deposite banks, by drafts and bonds,	$2,400,000
United States Bank bond,	2,300,000
Postponed merchants' bonds, say	6,000,000
but believed to be 9,000,000		10,700,000
Revenue from customs and lands		15,500,000
Treasury notes, to be authorized by the bill under consideration		10,000,000
		$36,700,000
Outstanding appropriations at the end of 1837		16,000,000
New appropriations for 1838, ordinary and extraordinary		26,000,000
		$42,000,000
Off, for appropriations which will remain unexpended at the end of the year, estimated at		11,000,000
		$31,000,000
Balance of resources over expenditures		5,700,000
		$36,700,000

I think it proper here to remark, that in this statement I have not charged upon the resources of the present year those Treasury notes which are now outstanding, because the amount expected to come into the Treasury from postponed merchants' bonds will probably exceed the sum above stated by an amount which will be sufficient for their redemption. These, then, are the plain facts which gentlemen are so puzzled to hunt up through the reports of the Secretary, and to understand after they have been found. There is really no difficulty about it.

You will perceive, Mr. Speaker, that I have not attempted to prove or to maintain that the means of the Government will be sufficient, at the close of the present year, to redeem at once all the Treasury notes authorized to be issued by this bill, but that they will be sufficient on the day when, by the terms of the bill, they are redeemable, to wit: on the 31st day of December, 1839. On the 31st day of December next, if I am right in my estimates, you will have in hand for that purpose $5,700,000; and on the next day, the 1st of January, 1839, another instalment from the deposite banks, amounting to one million and a half, falls due; making the available means the day after the bill of the 12th of October, 1837, shall expire, over seven millions of dollars. And, sir, what other means have we? Extend your inquiries but a little farther, and you will find that in the next year you have another instalment falling due from the deposite banks of more than a million and a half, and another bond of the Bank of the United States for $2,400,000, making, together, an additional sum of $5,600,000; which, added to the other sum of $5,700,000, makes together, of available means, $11,300,000, to redeem the $10,000,000 of Treasury notes authorized to be issued by this bill. After this, will gentlemen tell me there are no means in the Treasury. If they are not satisfied, will any one point out to me the errors of this statement? And yet we are told not only that there is not a dollar in the Treasury, but the gentleman from Tennessee avers it as his opinion that there will be a deficiency of eleven millions of dollars at the close of the year.

Mr. BELL explained that the Treasury notes, being made receivable for the public dues, would create a deficiency to that amount.

Mr. JONES. True, sir, they are made receivable in payment for the public dues; but that does not alter the case, because each note returned to the Treasury redeems that much of the debt of the Treasury. But let me tell the gentleman that the strong probability is, that they will not find their way back into the Treasury as fast as they have heretofore done, now that the banks are beginning, in despite of all efforts to prevent it, and in despite of all impediments thrown in their way, to resume specie payments. Let them but continue, as now, at specie par, or rise above it, as they have done to the South and Southwest, and you will not see one-half the amount come back, notwithstanding they are made receivable for the public dues.

But, say gentlemen, we are to go into the revenue of next year. True; and what do we go there to get? Why, the revenue that will fall due next year, a part of which has been postponed from the last year by our own legislation; and because we do so, we are told we have not the means on hand. Be it so: I have shown why we have not. I repeat, it is because of the indulgence which has been extended to the merchants and to the banks.

I think, sir, I must have succeeded in showing, should this bill pass, without touching the deposites with the States, there will be of actual means $36,700,000. And what is our situation with these means, and these resources, to relieve ourselves from difficulty? Why, we are informed by the Secretary that, on Friday last, there was only about half a million of dollars in the Treasury subject to draft. Now, if gentlemen will bring themselves to reflect, but for a moment, upon the daily demands upon the Treasury, increased, as they must necessarily be, immediately after the passage of the heavy appropriation bills, at the present session of Congress, they will concur with me in the opinion that we are fast hastening to a day on which we may find ourselves without a dollar in the Treasury to meet the demands upon it, and to maintain unbroken the faith and honor of the Government; a state of things that I have been anxious to avert, and which, if I thought now that I was contributing to produce, I would, without one moment's delay, close what I have to say on the subject before the House.

To relieve the Treasury from this state of embarrassment, two schemes have been proposed: one submitted to our consideration by the Executive branch of the Government; the other by those who stand politically opposed to this Administration. The first proposes an issue of Treasury notes, with a view to anticipate, for a short time, the means of the Government, which I think I must have shown are ample to redeem them. The other contemplates what appears to me a permanent loan. The one will furnish prompt and immediate relief, and put it in the power of the Government to meet the demands upon it without delay, and maintain its faith and integrity inviolate; the other may, or may not do this: time alone will disclose. But But we are met at the threshhold with a declaration that it will not do to issue Treasury notes, because they were recommended by the Executive, and such a recommendation is an act of dictation on his part. That charge has been met already, and, I think, refuted. In the course of this debate, it has been said by an honorable member from South Carolina, [Mr. THOMPSON,] that he would appeal from the ignorance and folly of this administration to the better days of the Republic; that he would go back to the periods when Mr. Gallatin and Mr. Dallas were at the head of the Treasury, and who, he informs us, not only never recommended such measures, but steadily opposed them. Sir, we have here grave and serious charges again. Let us examine them. The days alluded to, when Mr. Gallatin was Secretary, were the days of Thomas Jefferson; and what, allow me to inquire, were the opinions entertained by Mr. Jefferson? They will be found in his letter to John W. Eppes, dated on the 24th of June, 1813; Jefferson's Works, vol. 4, p. 199. He there says: "If Treasury bills are emitted on a tax appropriated for their redemption in fifteen years, and (to insure preference in the first moments of competition) bearing an interest of six per cent. there is no one who would not take them in preference to the bank paper now afloat, on a principle of patriotism as well as interest; and they would be withdrawn from circulation into private hoards, to a considerable amount. Their credit once established, others might be emitted, bottomed also on a tax, but not bearing interest; and if ever their credit faltered, open public loans, on which these bills alone should be received as specie. These, operating as a sinking fund, would reduce the quantity in circulation, so as to maintain that in equilibrium with specie."

When was Mr. Dallas Secretary of the Treasury? During the administration of Mr. Madison. It is true that Mr. Dallas was opposed to the issue of Treasury notes; but what thought the President of the United States, and the two Houses of Congress at that day? Why that Treasury notes must issue. There was then no constitutional impediment in the way, and every consideration of expediency demanded that they should issue; and the reasoning of the Secretary had to yield. We know that at that dark and gloomy period of our history, several bills for the issue of Treasury notes were passed by both branches of Congress, all of which were approved by the President, he having, doubtless, first satisfied himself that there was no constitutional impediment in the way. By the act of the 30th of June, 1812, $5,000,000 in Treasury notes were authorized to be issued. By the act of the 25th of February, 1813, $10,000,000 more. By the act of the 4th of March, 1814, $10,000,000 in addition. By the act of the 26th of December, 1814, $7,500,000; and by the act of the 24th of February, 1815, $25,000,000 were authorized. And are we, with these facts before us, to have the opinions of Mr. Gallatin, and Mr. Dallas, held up as our only guides, and wholly disregard the opinions of the President and of Congress at that same period. Nay, more: have we not the authority of this Congress in direct support of the measure, upon a bill which passed at the last session identical with this, both in principle and details, and which became a law after minute investigation, mature reflection, and full debate? But now, forsooth, we are told that the same measure is characterized by the ignorance and folly of this Administration! Sir, I would as soon expect to see the mountain fortress of Gibraltar itself crumble into ruins under the attack of that honorable gentleman, made with pocket pistol in hand, as to see the intelligent people of this land withhold from the President their confidence in his intelligence, integrity, and patriotism, by the employment of such a rabble of words. One is about as likely to ensue as the other.

My colleague [Mr. MASON] has also relied upon the opinions of Mr. Gallatin and Mr. Dallas; and in further illustration of my own views, allow me to advert for a moment to the period at which these opinions were entertained and expressed, and take a brief review of the circumstances in which the country was placed at the time this measure was opposed by these gentlemen. Did you then want temporary means only? No, sir: the war was fast drawing to a close, leaving us involved in a debt of many millions of dollars beyond our existing or immediately prospective resources to pay; and with all the talents and energy of preceding Administrations, has never been discharged till within the last four years. But because it was then deemed inexpedient by Mr. Dallas to issue Treasury notes, does it necessarily follow that it is never proper to do so? That would seem to be the argument. Why, to have issued them then would indeed have been as has been remarked by my colleague, [Mr. MASON,] borrowing from hand to hand. He, however, is of opinion that, if we have to borrow, we should never borrow like "mendicants," but do it like men of capital and credit, taking a good round sum, and holding on to it for a good long time; and I think he gave us some account of what should in like circumstances be done by us in private life. Sir, illustrations drawn from private life, often afford us principles and guides for public policy; and let me ask, what should we think of a man who wanted a thousand dollars for six months, and should go on my colleague's scale of a man of credit and fortune, to borrow double that amount for an indefinite period, when he had no earthly use for it longer than for six months? I doubt if any of us who consider ourselves prudent men would ever act upon that principle in our own case. Here the amount will only be required for six, nine, or twelve months at farthest, and we are told that the only mode in which this should be done is to act "above board," and borrow the money for six years or a longer period; almost as many years as we need it months, so that we may have the gratifying reflection of keeping in mind that we have got the interest to pay on it for years after we have no possible need of the principal, and when it has even become a burden upon our hands!

My colleague [Mr. MASON] urges another objection to this bill, on the ground of expense. It is said that it will be more expensive than the negotiation of a loan. How does he make that out? Why he undertakes to show that the appropriation made in the bill of the last session for the purchase of plates and the hire of clerks is more than would be required to effect a loan. I suppose the most expensive item, that of engraving the plates, need not be incurred again, for the old ones will answer the purpose; and the remaining expense will be the hire of four clerks. But if a loan be adopted, suppose it should then turn out that the money cannot be obtained: and we have very recently heard deep lamentations to that effect from almost every quarter. I say, suppose it shall turn out that we shall not be able to procure, in this country, ten millions of dollars in specie, or its equivalent; what then? Why, we shall have to send a responsible agent to England, or to the continent of Europe, to negotiate a loan. I know not what such a gentleman's services would be worth in our Government, for among our plain Republican people we know very little about these matters; but I apprehend the Bank of the United States could give us some information on the subject, as that has occasionally sent persons to foreign countries on such business; but what is the rate of compensation for such service I have no knowledge, though I should think a good round lumping fat fee. If then this account be balanced on the score of economy alone, it will, I think, be found decidedly in favor of the measure proposed by the bill now under consideration.

An honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SERGEANT] objects to this bill, on the ground that it proposes another issue of continental paper money; and to sustain that objection, a fac simile of the accounts of that great and good man, [General Washington,] whose memory still lives in the grateful recollection of a grateful people, has been exhibited before us, with a view to present not only a sample of what was then denominated money, but also to show the point to which it was depreciated, being five hundred for one. This continental money the honorable member compares with the Treasury notes proposed to be issued by this bill, and at last brings his own mind to the conclusion that the continental paper is best, for the reason, among others, that they had a latin motto stamped upon them! That latin motto is exitus in dubio; in plain English, that the issue of the contest in which we were then engaged was doubtful; and consequently, that the redemption of this continental paper money was also doubtful. Then, sir, how do they compare with Treasury notes? The gentleman has shown that continental paper was, at the time just referred to, at a depreciation of five hundred to one, his Latin motto shows that their redemption was doubtful; and we all know that, in the hands of the present holders, they are not worth the paper on which they are written. And how is it with Treasury notes issued under a bill identical both in principle and details with the one now under consideration? We have the cheering intelligence, received by this morning's mail, that in the cities of New York and Philadelphia they are at par with specie; while in the South and Southwest they are at a premium of from one to two per cent. above specie. And how many gentlemen are there now sitting around me (I mean not, of course, to include the honorable member from Pennsylvania) who have their pockets pretty well lined with these much abused Treasury notes, and which have been received by them (all their abuse of them to the contrary notwithstanding) in preference to gold and silver! Nay, more: an honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CUSHING] has stated the fact, that the notes which bore an interest of one mill to the dollar are at the same price in the Northern cities with those that bear six per cent. interest. Not a very inconsiderable item to be set off against the argument of my colleague [Mr. MASON] on the score of expense, or unsatisfactory to those who have emptied the vials of their wrath upon the measure, because they say that those who receive notes at an interest of one mill to the dollar, get less for the same demand upon the Government than those who receive them at a higher rate of interest.

But, sir, is the argument of the gentleman from Pennsylvania sound? I hold, that in a sound state of the currency, Treasury notes should never depreciate while the amount authorized is below the amount of revenue intended for their redemption; in other words, if they be based either upon revenue or upon a specific tax for their redemption, there will be no depreciation. We are informed by Mr. Jefferson, in his correspondence, vol. 4, page 199, that in the year 1755, the State of Virginia issued paper money, bottomed on a specific tax for its redemption, and to increase its credit, bearing an interest or five per cent. and that, in a very short time, not a bill of this emission was to be found in circulation; that they were locked up in the chests of executors, guardians, widows, farmers, &c. That Virginia then issued bills bottomed on a redeeming tax, but bearing no interest: these, he informs us, were readily received, and never depreciated a single farthing.

Now, sir, what was the character of the continental money which the gentleman from Pennsylvania has compared with, and pronounced better than, the Treasury notes proposed to be issued by this bill? In the revolutionary war the old Congress, and the States, issued bills without interest, without tax, and without revenue to redeem them. They occupied the channels of circulation freely, till those channels were overflowed by an excess beyond all the calls of circulation—the amount in 1781 being $357,476,541—and having been issued without tax, and without revenue to redeem them, they continued to depreciate, until they beeame worthless in the hands of their holders. But let us extend the comparison a little further, and inquire when it was that the continental money, of which the honorable member speaks, was issued? Sir, it was during the war of the Revolution, when the Government possessed neither money, nor credit; at a time when no man could look forward to any probable period when the Government would be able to redeem its obligations. But how is it with us now? I have attempted to give some account of your Treasury, and even those gentlemen who represent its condition much worse than many here know it to be, tell us we have nothing to do but to set on foot a loan, and that ten millions of dollars can be raised in the course of a few days: pretty conclusive evidence, I take it, of the high credit of the Government. But how stood the credit of the Government at the time to which the honorable member refers of continental paper money memory? It was literally without money and without credit. Still the gentleman insists that the comparison is good! The reasoning may be conclusive with the honorable member who urges it, but I must say it does not carry conviction to my mind.

But there is still another objection urged against the passage of this bill, and it is not the less singular, considering the quarter from which it comes. Failing in argument, gentlemen have conjured up "hydras and chimeras dire," as if to frighten and alarm the good people of this land. They insist that the issue of these Treasury notes looks so much like a bank, that they cannot, for a moment, endure the thought of seeing one. Sir, in my anxiety to avoid splitting upon such a rock, I began to cast around me and see who were those so terrified and alarmed at the idea of a bank that they could not even hear its name mentioned without being horror struck! Who are they? Why the very men who are, to use a homely but expressive phrase, "up to the hub" for a bank; one that can control and regulate all the other banks in the country; and upon a scale which may God in his mercy long avert. Sir, I am myself, in good faith, so utterly opposed to this Government's chartering a bank, that I cannot contemplate its establishment without real dread and alarm; and, if I could bring myself to believe that, in the issuing of Treasury notes, we were approximating to such an institution, I would avoid it as I would "war, pestilence and famine." But, before we give into the opinion that it is a bank, let us satisfy ourselves what the functions of a bank are: its principal functions are, under an act of incorporation, to issue money, receive deposites, discount notes and bills of exchange, and make dividends among its stockholders. But what are the features of this pretended bank? No act of incorporation; no power to issue any thing other than the obligations of the Government to pay its honest debts; no power to loan money, or to receive money on deposite; no power to discount notes; no power to deal in exchanges; in a word, no one feature of a bank whatever; but you simply confer upon the Government the power to perform an act of common honesty when it is unable to pay its debts at sight, by giving its creditor a simple evidence of his debt. I had almost forgotten another feature that was lacking in this bill to make it a bank, Mr. Speaker; it has no power to buy or speculate in cotton; no authority, under cover of its corporate powers, to enter into the market and compete with the honest industry of the people, under legal enactments and legal protections, devised by itself; it has none of these alarming traits about it.

Mr. Speaker, I had intended but for a moment to have detained the House with a few remarks on the constitutional question involved in this measure, but the argument on that branch of the subject has been presented so clearly, so forcibly, and so conclusively by my friend from South Carolina, [Mr. RHETT,] that he has left nothing to be added.

I have, however, sir, one other branch of the subject to touch upon, and but one, and that is to examine the scheme which these gentlemen themselves recommended in place of that proposed by the bill under consideration. What is their scheme? A loan for four years we are told. [Mr. ROBERTSON, in an under tone: No time was mentioned, but it was to be at the pleasure of the Government.] Well, sir, redeemable then at the pleasure of the Government, I suppose, for there have been so many propositions offered, that I have been unable to keep pace with them. I am now informed by my colleague that the loan he proposed is to be redeemable at the pleasure of the Government. I would thank my colleague to tell me who it is that would lend money on such terms? Where will he find capitalists in this country, or on the other side of the Atlantic, who would loan their money to be paid back at the will of the borrower, the Government, perhaps in five or six months? Would they draw in their money, secured by mortgages or trust deeds, or sell out in the funds, for such a contingency as this? Permit me to tell my friend that the thing is utterly impracticable.

Mr. ROBERTSON explained that the amendment offered by him proposed a loan, redeemable at the pleasure of the Government, or at any period, leaving it to the House to fix that period. He had left the clause blank for that purpose.

Mr. JONES. I took my colleague's first remark, that the period of redemption was at the pleasure of the Government, and I was going to show, sir, that no capitalist, or association of capitalists, would lend money on such terms. At all events, we are, by my colleague's proposition, to incur a debt, and a large annual amount of interest, when we do not want the principal. Sir, I have not been educated in that school of politicians who believe that a national debt is a national blesssing. I consider a national debt a national curse, never to be saddled upon my country, except under circumstances of the most overruling necessity.

Again, Mr. Speaker, can you obtain the amount of money which Government is expected to stand in need of? That is a question well worthy of consideration. Where are you to get it? Will gentlemen inform me? Shall I be told, it can be procured in New York, in Philadelphia, or in any other commercial city of the United States? Shall I be told, that at a time when every nerve has been strained, and the people pressed almost to the last extremity, for the purpose of discharging an enormous weight of foreign debt, that ten millions can be spared here? Shall I be told, that at a time when the banks are making every effort to resume specie payments, and when they have turned, and turned the screws, as long as those who have connection with them can bear, with a view to control their circulation, and business generally, and save, if possible, the forfeiture of their charters, which hangs suspended over them by the legal enactments of the Legislatures of the States; when the Government itself, crippled and embarrassed as it has been in its finances, has been appealed to by its debtors for relief—and let it be remembered that that Government never turned a deaf ear to those appeals—I ask, sir, is it to be expected, can any man expect that, in such a state of things, that amount of money can be procured in this country? It cannot. Then what must you do? You must resort to some foreign source, and send a mission abroad for the purpose. How long will that take? Remember, we have no Great Western steam ship at our command at a moment's notice, but, at the least, it would take to go there, either to England or Holland, to negotiate the loan and return with the proceeds, from two to three months; and what is to become of the Government in the mean time? Unable to pay the army, unable to pay the navy, unable to advance a single dollar to those brave men now fighting the battles of your country; unable to carry on any of those works for which you have made appropriations; unable to pay your common ordinary expenses; and you are to wait all this time that you may have the pleasure of saying, when you have succeeded in carrying out that Federal doctrine, that at last we have a national debt.

But again, suppose you succeed in authorizing a loan: you want ten millions of dollars, and you must get it in specie or its equivalent, convertible paper, if there be any such in the land; it would be a rare sight, I confess, but still that is the only medium in which you can get it—specie or convertible paper. Where are the ten millions of specie to come from? Can the banks spare it? Why, they cannot redeem their own notes; and great as has been the influx of gold into this country for some weeks past, I very much doubt whether you could get ten millions of spare specie from the whole of them. What shall we next hear? Is this Government, which is waging war with the banks; this Government, that stands in hostile array against all the banking institutions in the country, to be indulged by them with specie? Why, sir, it is alleged that if you collect ten millions of your revenue in the course of a whole year from these banks in specie, for the purpose of putting it in the power of the Government to hold its own funds safely for disbursement, you are warring against the banks! How much more forcible, then, would be the argument, should the Government now come forward with a single demand for ten millions of dollars, at a time when they are straining every nerve to resume specie payments?

But gentlemen in the Opposition say that they are not opposed to granting all necessary supplies to carry on the Government: only let them be asked for in the proper way; negotiate a loan, establish a permanent debt, and all shall be readily voted.

"Timeo Danaos et dona ferentes."

I am afraid of these Greeks, even while bringing presents; and why is it that my fears are excited? Because, sir, I think I can discover a remoter object in these professions of liberality, than the mere borrowing of money to meet the present demands upon the Treasury. I cannot but suspect that a portion of those gentlemen who sustained the deposite law, intending thereby what they did not avow, I mean a final distribution among the States, are desirous of commencing this system of borrowing, and thus to get into the Treasury more money than its necessities require, in order to pay over the fourth instalment to the States, and thus to create a debt, which the people must pay under a system of taxation which is unequal in its operation, unjust in its principles, and ruinous to the agricultural interests of the whole South.

Mr. Speaker, I have attempted, in my feeble way, to present to the consideration of the House the actual condition of the Treasury, together with the liabilities of the Government during the present year. I think I must have succeeded in proving that the present deficiency of means is merely temporary, and has arisen principally, if not entirely, from the indulgence extended to the banks, and to individuals who were largely the debtors of the Government; and that, with the aid which this bill proposes, the resources of the Government are ample to meet punctually all its liabilities. I have only farther to say, that if, under these circumstances, the Government is to be placed in a condition in which it will be unable to discharge its numerous pecuniary obligations, and to maintain, unbroken, its faith, that blow shall not be inflicted by my hand.

SPEECH OF MR. SEVIER, OF ARKANSAS,

In Senate, Saturday, April 28, 1838.—On the resolution of Mr. CLAY in relation to the receipts and expenditures of the Government.

Mr. SEVIER said, that since the last adjournment of the Senate, he had read, with much care and attention, the very lengthy and learned report of the honorable chairman of the Committee on Finance, and particularly that part of it which treats of the Treasury order of the 11th of July, 1836. Sir, I concur pretty fully in all that the Senator has said in his report, with the exception of that part of it which labors so strenuously to prove the wisdom and expediency that there was at the time, or that there is now, for the existence of the Treasury order. Upon this controverted point we differ, and differ widely.

I am aware, sir, that, for entertaining this difference of opinion, I am running some risk of being thought, by those who assume to be the only true and legitimate expounders of the Republican creed, a political infidel, or traitor, or something worse. I am aware that I incur this risk; and especially as the Treasury order has been so pertinaciously adhered to by the Executive, against the known wishes of a large majority of his friends; and especially as this report, as a whole, has been so highly extolled and complimented here, as to make it a matter of grave consideration for us to decide whether it was best for us to publish, at the public expense, thirty thousand, or fifty thousand, or a million copies of it, for the benefit and edification of our poor and benighted constituents. And more especially do I hazard this risk, as this report, in these times of discontent and supicion and political disaster, has been represented as a cannon, which is to prostrate all our adversaries; and when it is also calculated, as some suppose, to have the happy effect of crushing to death, by the wheels of its carriage, as it rebounds from its discharge, all of the unbelievers in the wisdom and expediency of the Treasury order—all of those who are not prepared to cry out, without qualification, that Allah is great, and Mahomet is his prophet. Yes, sir, when this report is thus considered, I fear that an exception taken to any part of it by the lips of one belonging to the rank and file of the party, will be considered such an intolerable heresy as can only be atoned for by the stake, the fire, and the faggot.

Sir, a total disbelief in the wisdom and expediency of the Treasury order, is no new opinion with me. It is not one which has grown up with me in the course of a single night. It is one which I have consistently and uniformily entertained, from the first appearance of that order, down to this day. I have, on all occasions, invariably voted for its repeal. I have done more, sir, I have spoken against it. But through some fatality, my speeches upon this subject, and particularly my last, which I delivered on the night of the passage of the divorce bill, upon an amendment offered to that bill, by the Senator from Massachusetts, have never been published. I do not mention this, out of any spirit of complaint, or with a temper of unkindness. Far from it. The mere publication of any of those speeches was to me a matter of but little consequence, and of still less to the public. I allude to it, solely with purpose of showing my consistency upon this subject, in the first place; and in the second, of satisfying my constituents that if I have not appeared as a speechifyer upon this very interesting question, that it has been no fault of mine.

Now, sir, having "defined my true position," with regard to the report and the measure upon which it mainly dwells, and having explained my course to the satisfaction, I hope, of my beloved and confiding constituents, I will now, with God's help endeavor to show that all the arguments in favor of the Treasury circular are delusive fallacious, and utterly untenable. I will now endeavor to convince my friend from New York, who generally hews away all difficulties, like a giant-armed backwoodsman, with a two foot broadaxe, that on this occasion, he has undertaken a labor too difficult, too knotty and tough for even his Herculean strength.

I will begin with the joint resolution of 1816, as all that precedes that, in my friend's report, is mere matter of history, and rightfully belongs to the family of the dead. What is that resolution? That resolution, among other things, authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to receive all debts, dues, or sums of money becoming due to the United States, in the notes of banks which are payable and paid on demand in the legal currency of the United States. This is the resolution. It is the law of the land. It contemplated no discrimination between lands and customs. It holds forth no such idea. It is general in its terms, and was designed to bear equally upon every source of revenue. And why was such a resolution ever passed, if so very reprehensible? The Senator answers the question; and so far as I know, he has answered it truly. He says the resolution of 1816 was called into existence in consequence of the derangement in our monetary system at that time; a derangement occasioned by a war with 'a rich, a powerful, a dangerous, and fearful enemy;" and that on that account he will not censure, (what forbearance, what gracious lenity, what christian charity!) he will not censure "the able, the worthy, and patriotic public officers, whose duty made it necessary for the Government to receive the notes of specie paying banks;" yet he "mourns" (and, no doubt, sincerely) "for that distressed condition of our beloved country which made it necessary for faithful public officers to place her in such extremities." In what extremity, Mr. President? Why in the extremity of receiving for the public dues the notes of specie paying banks! What a direful calamity! What a prodigious misfortune!

[Here Mr. WRIGHT rose to explain: He said his friend from Arkansas had misapprehended the report; he said the part of the report upon which he had commented, referred to the notes of banks which did not pay specie.]

Mr. S. said he was truly happy in being corrected. If those were the kind of notes he referred to, he believed he was rather disposed to concur in than censure the report.

Sir, in 1816 and in 1838 we had and have, thank God, a beloved country; and every American heart, now as then, which felt or feels that our beloved country is suffering, from whatever cause, and from whatsoever counsels or agency, is unworthy of himself, and unworthy of his illustrious ancestors, if he hesitates about stepping forward to her relief. Sir, in 1816 our beloved country was suffering by the difficulties through which she had passed, in checking the insolence, and piracy, and plunder, of a foreign enemy; and in guarding and sustaining herself at home against the machinations, and calumnies, and treason of domestic traitors. Yes, sir, our beloved country, in this crisis in her affairs, passed the resolution of 1816; and what has been its happy results? Under the operations of that resolution, we have seen our public debt paid off; we have seen her get along, for upwards of twenty years, without much actual loss; the public dues have been collected with convenience, and without embarrassment to the people. Under the provisions of that resolution, our beloved country has been enabled to pay a debt of gratitude, by pensioning her heroes of the Revolution, and those honorably scarred in the public service during the last war. Under the happy provisions of that resolution, this beloved country has gone on in a grand and unparalleled course of prosperity. She has grown in wealth, in population, in the arts and sciences, and is still marching onward on an elevated plain, with her broad and noble front erect, to the fulfilment of her great destiny, alike the wonder and admiration of every civilized community!

Sir, this beloved country is now suffering, as she was in 1816, by a derangement in her monetary system. We find that the resolution of 1816 has been repealed, so far as one great branch of the public revenue is concerned; and we find that immediately succeeding that repeal that this derangement has occurred. And shall we now stop and cavil metaphysically about what has occasioned this derangement—whether it has been occasioned by wars, or banks, or our own excesses and prodigality, before we will apply any remedy? I hope not, sir. I hope we shall profit by the lessons of experience, and endeavor to correct this derangement in our monetary system by an application of the same remedy which cured it in 1816. I hope we shall receive the notes of specie-paying banks for lands and for customs, too, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may require. Let this be done, and I have no fears for the most desirable result. And why, let me ask, should we hesitate about it?

Senators tell us that if we receive the notes of specie-paying banks now, the connection with banks is again revived, and that it will become the settled policy of the country; and, further, that we shall again have new explosions. Sir, so far as the connection exists with the banks, and is confined to the receipt of the notes of specie-paying banks, under the responsibility and discretion of the Secretary, I am in favor of it; and as to the settled policy of the country, of all things on earth that is what I most desire. Sir, I am tired of experiments, of fluctuations, of false alarms, of glorious uncertainties. As to new explosions, that is a matter which depends pretty much upon ourselves. We can have them whenever we want them. The Government has but to declare war against the banks, and they will soon go by the board; with the exception, perhaps, of the United States Bank; that is, perhaps, rather too powerful for us. But we can smash any other other institution at any day or hour we may select.

The Senator tells us that the resolution of 1816 was temporary in its design. Temporary! Where is the evidence of that intention? Where is its limitation? Is it to be found on the face of the resolution? No, sir. Is it to be found in the construction given to it by the Departments? No, sir. If it was designed as a temporary measure, why has it been permitted to remain upon the statute book for twenty-two years, without a single effort ever being made to repeal it? Sir, I "mourn" to see my friend driven to such a miserable shift and subterfuge, for I cannot so far disgrace the term as to call it argument.

The honorable Senator, sir, having given us a history of the origin, and his opinion as to the nature, of the joint resolution of 1816, next proceeds to favor us with the reasons which induced the late Executive to issue the Treasury circular. These reasons are numerous, plausible, and imposing, but yet inconclusive and unsatisfactory to me. I will apply to them the test of truth, and show, as I think, to the satisfaction of the Senate, that by such a test, each of those reasons will vanish into smoke and empty air.

The Senator begins his enumeration, by telling us "that complaints were made of extensive frauds practised in the sale of the public lands." Sir, I will ask him, who made those complaints? I will ask, who it was that charged fraud upon the land officers? Shall I tell him who they were? These charges were mainly made by the late Senator Poindexter, and by his allies in politics. By him, and others equally hostile to the late Executive and his Administration. These charges were made some years preceding the Treasury order, and with the known design of reaching a certain land officer in Mississippi. I will ask the Senator if these charges had any influence with the late Executive, or with us? Yes, sir, they had an influence with the late Executive, and with us; and that was, to induce us all to denounce, in turn, the late Senator and his associates, and to defend, with zeal, and skill, and perseverance, the individual alluded to. This was the influence, as well as my memory serves me, which these complaints had upon us. Who else complained? Were there any such complaints made by the Legislatures of any of the States? Were any such complaints made by the people, in the form of petition? No, sir: as far as my memory serves me, we had no such complaints from any of these sources. I will go further: I will ask the Senator, did any friend or foe of the late Executive, from the new States, where the public lands lie, or from any of the old States either, where the public lands do not lie, rise in his place and propose any remedy for these complaints? No, sir. Did the late President deem these complaints of such vast importance as to form the subject of any general or special message to Congress for legislative remedy? No, sir. Did the Secretary of the Treasury complain to us of the then existing state of things, and solicit our interference? No, sir. There were, according to my recollection, no complaints made except those to which I have alluded. And those we laughed at as the bitter outpourings of disappointed ambition, and as the whining, senseless, and hypocritical effusions of our political adversaries, who were, above all things, desirous of bringing the Administration into odium, contempt, and disgrace. And if we had not viewed these complaints in this light, but had, on the contrary, believed them well grounded, what need was there either for the Treasury order, or for Congressional interference, to prevent these fraudulent practices? In the first place, we all knew that no land officer can buy land without the special permission of the Secretary of the Treasury. In the second place, we all knew that if land officers were disposed to commit fraudulent practices, that the Treasury order would not mend the matter. No, sir; they could as readily sign receipts for specie as for bank rags. And, again: As a full and comprehensive answer to every objection, if the land officers were guilty of fraudulent practices, the President held in his own hands the ample remedy. He had but to remove them from office and appoint others in their places who were competent and faithful. This reason, therefore, for the necessity of the Treasury order, in every light in which it can be presented to my mind, seems to me utterly groundless, and on that account I am sorry that it has been gravely enumerated as one.

The next reason, sir, which the Senator assigns in justification of the Treasury order, is that "of alarming attempts to monopolise large tracts of land in the hands of individual and associated proprietors." This reason, I think, I can fully answer in a very few words, and satisfy the Senate, that, if that had been desirable, it could have been accomplished without the aid of the Treasury order. If the late Executive had wished to prevent a monopoly of the public land, all he had to do to accomplish his object, was to withhold his proclamation for a sale of the public lands. This prompt and simple remedy would have cured the evil without the agency of any Treasury order. If it had been the pleasure of Congress to prevent a monopoly of the public land, all they had to do, was to withhold the annual appropriations for the the surveys, and the object was accomplished without the intervention of the Treasury order. And did the Executive or Congress either show any determination on their part to stop the sales of the public lands. No, sir: Congress passed the usual annual appropriations for the public surveys, and the Executive, on his part, brought the lands into market, as rapidly as it was desired by those interested; and I will add, that if either the one or the other of these things had not taken place, that it would have created in the West no little sensation.

While upon this branch of the inquiry, I will give the honorable Senator the views entertained in the new States, so far as I understand them, upon the question of land monopolies. I will give them cheerfully, and hope they will not fall upon his senses, "like seed sown by the way side, which the thorns and thistles grew up and choaked," but that they may be remembered by him in time to come, and be of some service to him hereafter.

There are, sir, in the new States, three kinds of land monoplies, which are felt as almost intolerable grievances. The first of these is that of the Indian monopoly. Whilst their title is unextinguished, the lands cannot be settled upon, or cultivated by our citizens, nor do they yield any tax or tribute to the States. The war now going on in Florida, the apprehended difficulties with the Cherokees in Georgia, will go far to show the Senate the light in which this monopoly is viewed by the citizens of the States interested. It is considered as such a grievance, that we find the people of those States, and their friends, readily disposed to risk blood and treasure, and, as some allege, national faith and honor too, to remove this monopoly. Sir, this feeling, upon this kind of monopoly, is not local. It exists wheresoever this monopoly exists. And the Senator will find, with all his intellect, that he will strive in vain to convince the people interested, that it is better for the United States, and better for them, that their lands should remain in that situation than to be disposed of for even bank rags by the bale, and that, too, to "associated proprietors."

The next most objectionable monopoly of the public land in the new States, is the monopoly of the Federal Government. It is true that we can settle, and live and breathe upon the lands owned by the Government, unless, indeed, we should be driven off from it by the military force, as was recently most graciously intimated by the Senator from Kentucky that we ought to be, under the provisions of the obsolete act of 1807. This permission to settle upon the public lands is the only benefit derived while these lands are monopolised by the Federal Government. These lands, in that condition, yield no revenue by taxation to the States. They are but sparely settled, and but indifferently improved by the occupants, on account of the uncertainty of the time they will be permitted to remain undisturbed in their possessions; and on account of the great uncertainty they feel of ever owning the land, or of being remunerated for their labor upon it. This monopoly is considered a great grievance; so much so, that at almost every session of Congress we have tons of petitions, I may say, in one form or another, beseeching and imploring Congress for the passage of graduation laws, of pre-emption laws, of donation laws, or for some other remedies by which the Federal title may be extinguished.

If the Senator will but reflect upon these things, I think he will agree with me in opinion that the citizens of the new States, with every disposition to do as he desires them; to swallow whatever logic he may wish to poke down them; to cry when he cries; to mourn when he mourns—will nevertheless find themselves unable to sympathise with him anp his friends on this occasion, in their blubbering grief over the mighty misfortune which had befallen the country, in having a part of the Federal title to the lands in the new States extinguished with the notes of their specie-paying banks. No, sir; upon this subject they will find themselves unable to make the squatters groan by telling them, most piteously, in tears, in sobbing emotions, that the public lands, "the rich inheritance of the blood and treasure of our Revolutionary fathers," have, in some instances, actually gone into the hands of speculators for bales of "bank rags." No, sir; he will find, and that, too, I hope, before it be too late, that he must tune his instrument to a different key, if he expects us of the West to dance to his music, or join him in his pithy lamentations.

Sir, the third and remaining class of land monopolists in the new States are the speculators. This class is generally detested by the citizens of the new States, and for the reasons so eloquently assigned by Senators. But, sir, there are degrees in hatred. As much, sir, as these land monopolists are disliked, the Indian or Federal monopoly of the public land is still more disliked. The quantity of land owned by any speculator is small, compared to that held by the Government. The land held by speculators is of some profit to the State; it is taxed, and taxed freely. These assessments form no inconsiderable item in our State revenues. They contribute largely in defraying the expenses of our local Governments. The taxing power over them is unrestricted, and it is properly exercised with no sparing hand. The tax these speculators feel, and feeling it, as they do, they are ever willing and anxious to sell out upon liberal terms, as to time and price, and mode of payment. I need but to refer you to the papers in my State, containing their advertisements, as an evidence of their anxiety to sell. Many can, and do, in fact, buy lands of speculators, who are unable to purchase of the Government, even at the minimum price. They purchase of them on time, and frequently for property. For these, and many other reasons which could be assigned, the monopoly of land by the speculators is less objectionable than a monopoly of them either by the Indians or the Federal Government. They are, nevertheless, unpopular, and, therefore, every lashing the honorable Senator or his friends may give these nabobs, will be highly gratifying to the great mass of the community.

Sir, I do not speak from books, for with them I but seldom hold consultation, but from memory; and unless that greatly deceives me, the first proposition ever made, in my time, to retard the sales of the public lands, was that made by Mr. Foote some years ago, when he was a member of the Senate. And how was that proposition met? It was scouted down in this body, and condemned throughout the West. The next effort made to stop the sales of the public lands was that of the Treasury circular. That of Mr. Foote failed because it was tangible; that of the Treasury circular has partially effected its object, because, thus far, it has been beyond our reach.

Now, sir, I will repeat my interrogatories to my friend from New York, and again ask him, if there were any complaints made from any of the States, or their people or their representatives, that these lands were becoming individual property too rapidly? If so, I will esteem it as a special favor, if he will favor me with the name of the State, the number of the petitioners, or the member of Congress who made that complaint. Sir, if there were any such complaint, that the public lands were becoming individual property too rapidly, it has wholly escaped my observation.

The Senator next tells us, in justification of the Treasury order, that the banks aided individuals, through loans and discounts, to the means by which they were enabled to extinguish, in part, the Federal title to the lands in the new States. If the banks have done this, all I have to say is, that they have done for the new States a very acceptable service. Sir, it is unquestionably true, that the banks did discount excessively, not only to the purchasers of the public lands, but to merchants, to factors, and to planters. The banks were stimulated to these excesses by both of the political parties in this country, and the blame, if any should attach, should be mutually shared between them. We gave them the public deposites, and the joint action of the two parties placed the distribution fund also into their vaults. Being thus strengthened and doubly armed, and, at the same time, avaricious, as well as a little ambitious to convince the world, that our destruction of the United States Bank, so long their terror and their master, was rather a blessing to the community than a misfortune, they went heedlessly on discounting, not only upon their own capital, but upon their trust money or deposites, as banks, I believe, invariably do, until they made money excessively abundant. This abundance raised the price of every thing. The country became drunk with apparent prosperity. Every body, land speculators as well as others, were trying to live by their wits, and to accumulate large estates without labor. Then, we all seemed to think that the millennium had actually arrived, and that we had nothing to do but to "eat, drink, and be merry."

This, sir, was the situation of things when the Treasury circular was issued. And what was its effects? The banks, as well as the public, were taken by surprise by it. Runs were made immediately upon the banks for specie to buy land; these runs forced them to curtail their discounts; and by adhering to this rigorous process, which they had to do for their own preservation, they sustained themselves for eight or ten months afterwards, indeed, until a general suspension throughout the United States occurred. Their rapid curtailment rendered money scarce, and knocked down the price of every thing. Property fell from 25 to 50 per cent. Many were forced to sacrifice their estates, and ended in total bankruptcy. This was one of the fruits of the Treasury circular; and now let me ask my honorable friend what good has grown out of it? It has beggared thousands, it has embarrassed a whole section of the country; and, lastly, it has bankrupted your Treasury! And why have these things been done? They have been brought about, we are told, to stop bank excesses. Was this necessary? Will not bank excesses, like excesses of every other description, correct themselves? I think so.

But the Treasury was in danger, we are told, of losing by a receipt of specie paying bank notes for lands. Was not the Treasury in as much danger of losing by those notes which were paid into the Treasury for customs? I should think so, sir. These bank notes at that time, and for many months afterwards, were equal to specie, and passed currently at par; and, nothwithstanding the war made upon the banks, their notes kept up at par for every thing but land, down to the time of the general suspension. Yes, but says the honorable Chairman, these bank notes fell 10 per cent below the specie par after the Treasury order issued. And this circumstance is insisted upon as an evidence of the dangerous state of the currency. Sir, is this a fair conclusion? I think not. The Government, when unrestrained by constitutional obligations, have it in their power to make any thing they please below par; and my surprise has ever been that these notes fell so little below par as they did. For every ordinary purpose, for every thing but for land these notes passed at par, until the general explosion. This I know to be true in my part of the country. Yes, sir, if the Government were not prohibited by the Constitution from doing so, they could make gold and silver too below par. Mr. Woodbury would but have to issue his circular prohibiting the receipt of gold and silver for lands, and for customs, and he would bring them down as much below par as he did the notes of the specie paying banks, and, if he had the power, it is possible he would do so, in order that he might not sustain any loss upon his Treasury notes.

Sir, specie, like bank notes, when abundant, increases the price of property; and, when scarce, the price of it is lowered. Specie, like bank notes, when abundant, stimulates speculation and engenders immorality, vices, and excesses; and, as my honorable friend has such a pious horror for all speculations and excesses, I suppose, if unrestrained by the Constitution, he would make war upon specie. Sir, specie seems to be coming into the country in such frightful quantities, that I really wonder that his anxiety for our morals will permit him to sit quietly in his seat. I wonder that he has not already introduced a bill full of pains and penalties, and penitentiary punishment, against this debauching buccaneer. It is not yet too late. He will yet have time before the session closes to give us a bill to prohibit the importation of specie, that "root of all evil," into the United States. And who knows but that he will do so. His apparent love for the precious metals must surely be altogether feigned; for we all remember when filthy "bank rags," even by the bale," seemed to stand as high in his affections, as does now his new love for specie. Sir, his deeply rooted antipathy for all the excesses which money can purchase, and his great anxiety for the public morals, will, I am sure, induce him to propose a law by which we shall be guarded against the one and shielded in the other; for, O, ye gods! how eloquently he discourses upon the besetting sins of the age! No reformer, I am sure, can equal him in sermonizing upon virtue, morality, and money excesses. Sir, when the Treasury is empty my friend seems to fear that we shall be in want; and, when it is full to overflowing, he fears we shall fall again into extravagant excesses. Sir, I should be extremely happy if I could see my friend perfectly composed, and willing to let the world jog on in the old-beaten track under the provisions of the resolution of 1816, and to find him willing to give up his guardianship of the public morals, his notions of an exclusive specie currency, and, lastly, his long-cherished and beloved Treasury circular.

Sir, upon the subject of the public lands, I have ever had but one opinion, and that is: that those lands should never be considered a source of revenue. They are not so considered by any other Government than ours. They should be granted generously and freely to the States in which they lie. Our revenue should come solely from the customs. And holding, as I do, these opinions, the honorable Senator will never get my sanction to the Government holding those lands an hour longer than I can help it. No, sir, I am for getting those lands for the citizens of the respective States for specie, or bank notes, or without either, which would still be more acceptable, if I can. Those lands are no longer pledged for any public debt, and there is as much moral justice in selling the public lands in the old States for the common benefit, as there is for selling the public lands in the new States. They are all alike the fruits of the joint struggle of our revolutionary ancestors. But the lands of neither should be sold for the common benefit. They should belong exclusively to the States in which they lie. The Senator has kindly told us why the Treasury circular was issued. He has also told us why this order was confined to the lands and not extended to the customs. He tells us, in so many words, that there was wisdom in this discrimination. Of that we will now consider and then decide.

But before entering into his argument to establish this propriety, he has with great research and minute particularity, grouped together many instances in which this discrimination was heretofore made. And here let me remark, that all of those instances were in favor and not against the lands. But, unfortunately for his argument, all the instances he has given us, are irrelevant to the point in issue. He tells us, what is most unquestionably true, that in many instances land scrip was a legal tender in payment for lands, and not for customs. But in giving us those instances, he has lost sight of a very material and important point in the history of this discrimination. This discrimination grew out of a special contract with the States. In consideration of extensive cessions of land to the United States, it was agreed upon and stipulated that the United States would pay in land out of the ceded territory a certain class of claims which the States owed in land to their citizens. This was, in other words, a property obligation, payable in land, and not in money. These property notes are common in the western country. Nothing is more usual than for one farmer to give his note to another for so many dollars, payable in corn, hogs, cattle, and sometimes for manual labor. And no honest man ever thinks of requiring money upon such an obligation. This was the kind of contract the United States made with the States, and the scrip was nothing more or less than the property note of the United States, payable in land. It was paid in good faith by the United States, and no body ever thought it a cash obligation. It was a debt not due, and owing to the United States, but it was a debt due, and owing by the United States. It is, in short, no discrimination in the debts due and owing to the United States. And so the Senator must tax his ingenuity again, before he will succeed in establishing the point he has labored so hard to prove.

The Senator tells us, that "an excessive currency of any character, has a necessary tendency to sink the value of that currency when compared with the value of marketable property for which it is exchanged. Hence the invariable nominal rise, in the market, of property of all descriptions which is open to a free market, when that which is used as money is abundant and cheap; and one of the strongest evidences that our paper currency was excessive during the years 1835 and 1836, is found in the fact that prices constantly advanced, although the supplies in almost every department of trade and production were unusually abundant, and no extraordinary demand was known to exist. The duties which constitute our revenue from customs are almost all a rate per centum imposed upon the value of the article. If, then, the quantity of dutiable goods imported be the same, and the value be nominally increased in consequence of an excessive currency, the value or the duties will be nominally increased in the same ratio, and therefore the collection of the duties in the cheapened currency will keep the real value of the revenue from the importations at a given standard."

Now, sir, all this I comprehend, and I am not disposed to controvert it. But I shall controvert what follows. He tells us that: "Not so with our public lands. They have not been, and are not, in this sense, open to a free market. Their value, per acre, is fixed by law, and however much the currency in which they were purchased may have been cheapened by abundance, they could not rise, with other property, to a price which would restore the equilibrium. They were bound down by a statute vale; and when the currency to be received in payment for them was designated, the same nominal value of that currency, however much it might be cheapened by excess, would purchase the same quanty of the lands."

Now, sir, I consider this false, and I cannot help expressing my surprise that the honorable Senator, in his eagerness to justify the Treasury circular, should attempt to palm these statements upon us for gospel. Sir, the public land is open to a free market; it is sold at public auction to the highest bidder; every body is invited to the sales; every body is authorized to purchase the land except the public officers; and if this is not a free and open market, what, in the name of Heaven, is a free and open market? I should like for the Senator to tell me. "But the price of the land is fixed by law?" In this true, sir? I say it is not true. I say the price of the public land is not fixed by law: the minimum price of it is fixed by law, but not the maximum. Their price, he says, "is bound down by statute value." Where is that statute? Produce it; for such a statute is new to me, and to every other settler in the Western country.

Sir, being wrong in his premises, his conclusions throughout must of course partake of the same error. Sir, if bank paper was excessive, and that I concede, and on that account was of less value than specie, there was as much propriety of applying the Treasury order to the customs as to the lands. The evil to be guarded against was the quantity of bank rags, and not the source from which they found their way into the Treasury: for it is the same thing to the Treasury, whether I pay a dollar of depreciated bank paper into it for lands, or you pay a similar dollar into it for customs. The loss is the same to the Treasury. And therefore, if three-fourths, or more, taking one year with another, of the whole revenue, as it is, is derived from the customs, it would seem to me that there would be more propriety in applying the principles of the Treasury order to the customs than to the lands; because so much the greater quantity of bank rags gets into the Treasury from that source; secondly, because in the cities where the customs are collected, specie is generally more abundant, and more easily obtained; thirdly, because, from the very nature of things, the citizens of the new States are doubly taxed. They, sir, pay their equal portion for the customs, and then the additional tax for lands. But still I am for no discriminating rule; for although the agricultural interest of the country is the vital interest of it; although it is the chief pillar upon which our whole fabric rests; yet I am for no discriminating rule even its favor; all I desire for that interest is an equality, and nothing more.

Sir, the discrimination in the moneys received for the public dues is odious to the people; and are they to be reconciled to it being told that bank rags will not buy goods in Europe—that good money is required in that quarter for that purpose, and hence their banks will not fall into such excesses as ours? Sir, are we to be tickled into good humor with such sophistry as this? Do we not know that it is our exports that purchase foreign goods?—exports which the New York merchants pay us for with their bank rags? Sir, our Western banks, notwithstanding the run made upon them, under the operations of the Treasury circular, yet kept up and paid specie for their notes until your Eastern banks failed.

Sir, this discrimination is odious to the people, and the longer it is continued in operation the more so will it become. They have felt, and still feel, its deleterious consequences. It is not your wealthy speculators only that it reaches; it reaches the industrious, laboring, poor man. He is not able to go to New Orleans for specie; and if he does, he is but illy prepared to pay the premium for it. So long, sir, as this Treasury order is in force, the banks cannot resume specie payments with any advantage to the community. Throughout the whole West the land sales are now coming on, and you will take for these lands nothing but specie. What is the consequence? If the banks resume specie payments they will be afraid to let a dollar of their paper out. And why? Because they know that if they let a dollar of paper out in the morning, that it will be changed into specie at the counter before night, in order that they may obtain acceptable land office money. Your Treasury order, therefore, keeps up the causes of a depreciated currency among us. It keeps up ruinous rates of exchange against us; and the longer this is done, the worse it will be for all parties.

Sir, if the President will not rescind that order, I hope there will be found stamina and independence enough in both Houses of Congress to do it for him. Sir, if he is anxious for political martyrdom, I hope he will not require his friends to mount the funeral pile with him.

Sir, if he would but condescend to listen to the advice of an honest hearted friend, as I know myself to be; to one who will always tell him what he considers wholesome truths, whether they be acceptable or not—I would tell him to rescind the Treasury order without delay; I would tell him to surrender up manfully all notions of false pride, and to do it promptly, generously, and with a good grace; and while insisting upon the purity and patriotism of his motives, and his thousand virtues, which no candid man will question, I would advise him frankly to acknowledge his error, and atone for it to his friends by repealing that odious order instantly. Let him do this, and his friends will be found once more with their heads up, ready to stand or fall with him in the approaching contest. I would advise him not to procrastinate an action upon this subject, until he will find himself forced into it by the representatives of the people. I sincerely hope he will not wait to be driven to such an extremity; an extremity in which his friends will not, and cannot, but in which his enemies will, rejoice.

SPEECH OF MR. WILLIAMS, OF MAINE,

In Senate, May 14, 1838—On asking leave to bring in a bill to provide for running and marking the Northeastern Boundary line, according to the treaty of 1783.

On a former day, I gave notice that on this day I would ask leave to introduce a bill to provide for running and marking the Northeastern Boundary line, according to the treaty of 1783, and pursuant to that notice, I propose now to ask that leave. The object of the bill is to make it the duty of the President to cause that line to be run and marked, as it is described in the Treaty of Peace.

Among the few questions remaining unsettled between this country and foreign nations, there is, probably, not one so irritating, and so likely to disturb our amicable relations, as that of the Northeastern Boundary. It is now more than half a century since our ancestors, by their struggles and sufferings in the war of the Revolution, successfully resisted the tyranny and oppression of the mother country, and obtained for themselves and their posterity the acknowledgment that the then colonies of Great Britain were free, sovereign, and independent States, and a relinquishment, by his Britannic Majesty, of all claims to the Government, propriety, and territorial rights of the same and every part thereof; and yet, at this day, it is a fact that the British Government usurp possession, and claim jurisdiction, over more than one third part of the State of Maine, then part of the province of Massachusetts Bay, the government and territory of which were expressly relinquished. Yes, sir, notwithstanding the territory now in dispute was, at the formation of the treaty, part and parcel of the then province of Massachusetts Bay, and so represented and designated upon Mitchell's map, which was used and referred to by the commissioners in making the treaty, it is true that the British Government now claim it as a part of New Brunswick, then Nova Scotia, and deny to this Government the right to occupy it, or to exercise any jurisdiction over it. This claim, by the British Government, is comparatively of recent origin, (having sprung up since the treaty of Ghent,) but is persisted in with great tenacity, and has been, and still is, the cause of continued border difficulties between the people and authorities of the State of Maine and of the province of New Brunswick, and those troubles are increasing daily. Already have some of our own citizens been arrested upon our own territory, dragged to a foreign jail, imprisoned, tried, and condemned, under the pretence of offences against the sovereignty and laws of a foreign Government, but in fact for no crime other than obeying or attempting to execute the laws of their own country within our rightful limits. And the Government and people of Maine are warned, by the authorities of New Brunswick, that any attempt to exercise jurisdiction within what they denominate "disputed territory," will be resisted and repelled "if the whole military force of British America should be necessary to effect it." This is a condition of things that cannot, and will not, be submitted to. Soon after Maine was separated from Massachusetts, in 1819, measures were taken for the protection of the timber upon a part of what is now claimed to be disputed territory, surveyed some of the lands into townships, and made preparations for opening roads and settling the country. Some of these acts were complained of by the British Government as inconsistent with the understanding between this Government and Great Britain, "that, pending the negotiations for settling the boundary line, each party should abstain from any acts of sovereignty over the contested territory, and upon the request of the General Government, Maine postponed some of her proposed improvements. At the same time the authorities of New Brunswick were extending their claims to ownership and jurisdiction, which furnished cause of complaint by Maine to the General Government, which was communicated by the latter to the British Government, producing at some times a disavowal of the acts, and at other times a claim that the acts were justifiable. In this state of things the attention of the Legislature of Maine was often called to the subject of their boundary, and the history and evidence of their title have been embodied in reports and resolutions which were forwarded to Congress, and the aid of the General Government urgently requested to bring about the settlement and establishment of the line of boundary. More recently, and since the commencement of the present session of Congress, (very soon after the receipt of the last communication from the British Government upon the boundary question,) the President caused to be sent to the Governor of Maine a statement of the correspondence which had been had between the Governments of the United States and Great Britain upon the subject of the boundary, since the rejection of the opinion of the arbiter in 1832, with a request that he would adopt such measures as he might deem necessary to ascertain the sense of the State of Maine with respect to the expediency of attempting to establish a conventional line, as well as to additional surveys and explorations with a view to the satisfactory adjustment of the controversy according to the terms of the treaty, or enabling the parties to decide more understandingly upon the expediency of opening a negotiation for a line that would suit their mutual convenience, &c. The message of the Governor communicating that statement to the Legislature, and the resolutions of the Legislature thereupon, which I had the honor a few days ago to present to the Senate, have been printed, and are in the hands of Senators. They are a full, unequivocal, and direct response to the questions propounded, and speak the language and determination, not of a party, or of a mere majority, but of the whole Legislature and people of Maine. This, sir, is no party question in Maine. The whole people of that State feel that they are injured, and that their appeals to the General Government for the protection and guarantee of their rights, which they believe the Constitution of the United States was designed to afford them, have already been too long disregarded; and they now hope and trust that Congress will adopt such measures as will insure the running and marking of the boundary line between that State and a foreign Government, according to the terms of the treaty. Such measures are not intended by Maine, and ought not to be regarded by others, as hostile, but as means, and probably the only means, of settling the question of boundary for many years yet to come. The bill which I propose to submit and urge the passage of, in conformity with the resolutions of my State, provides that the President shall cause the boundary line to be run and marked agreeably to the provisions of the treaty of peace of 1783. The time for executing this service, and the manner of doing it, is left entirely to the discretion of the President, and it is believed that it may be done without giving just cause of offence to Great Britain. What other mode of running this line of boundary can be pursued when it is considered that our Government has repeatedly proposed to the Government of Great Britain mutually to appoint surveyors or commissioners to run and mark the line according to the treaty, and that those propositions have been declined on the pretence that the description of the line in the treaty is so imperfect that it is impracticable to run that line so as to conform to the terms of the treaty, and that the British Government still refuses to assent to such a survey and running of the line unless this Government will agree to such preliminaries as would change, or render impracticable, the survey of the line of the treaty.

It will be seen by reference to the correspondence between this Government and that of Great Britain, since the rejection of the opinion of the arbiter, that our Government have been constantly endeavoring to open negotiations with Great Britain for the establishment of the line according to the treaty of 1783; that the British Government have declined to negotiate upon that basis, and have insisted and still insist, that a conventional line must be substitu- for the treaty line. That there may be no mistake upon this part of the subject, the correspondence between the two Governments should be examined with care, and it will show that on the 21st of July, 1832, Mr. Livingston informed Mr. Bankhead that the decision of the arbiter had been rejected by the Senate; and that the President, in pursuance of the advice of the Senate, proposed "to open a new negotiation with his Britannic Majesty's Government for the ascertainment of the boundary between the possessions of the United States and those of Great Britain on the northeastern frontier of the United States, according to the treaty of peace of 1783;" and it was further suggested that if the parties should be unable to agree upon the establishment of the treaty line, means might be found of avoiding the constitutional difficulties that hitherto had attended the establishment of a boundary more convenient to both parties than that designated by the treaty, and that such a negotiation would naturally embrace the right of navigation of the river St. John. On the 14th of April, 1833, Sir Charles R. Vaughan replied "that his Majesty's Government regret that they cannot discover in this proposition any probable means of arriving at a settlement of this difficult question. It appears to his Majesty's Government to be utterly hopeless to attempt to find out, at this time of day, by means of new negotiation, an assumed line of boundary which successive negotiators, and which commissioners employed on the spot have, during so many years, failed to discover, &c.; that his Majesty's Government will eagerly avail themselves of any probable chance of bringing the question to a satisfactory settlement, and will lose no time in endeavoring to ascertain from Mr. Livingston in the first place, what is the principle of the plan of boundary which the American Government appear to contemplate as likely to be to be more convenient to both parties, &c.; whether any, and what arrangement for avoiding the constitutional difficulties has yet been concluded with the State of Maine, that it was necessary that his Majesty's Government should be informed of the basis upon which it is proposed to negotiate before they can either entertain the proposal, or decide upon instructions to be given; that they must be previously assured that the President will possess the power of carrying into effect his part of any engagement, &c.; and that his Majesty cannot consent to embarrass the negotiation respecting the boundary, by mixing up with it a discussion respecting the navigation of the river St. John."

On the 30th of April, 1833, Mr. Livingston proposed to Sir Charles R. Vaughan that the disadvantages of the modes of settlement heretofore adopted might be avoided by appointing a new commission, consisting of an equal number of commissioners, with an umpire selected by some friendly sovereign, to decide on all points on which they disagree; or by a commission entirely composed of skilful men in Europe, so selected, to be attended in the survey and view of the country, by agents appointed by the parties. And further suggested that where two natural boundaries are named, and running from one towards the other on the prescribed course will not touch the other, the rule is not to consider the boundary as one impossible to be traced, but to preserve the natural boundary, and to reach it by the nearest direct course. Thus, if after more accurate surveys shall have been made, it should be found that the north course from the head of the St. Croix should not reach the highlands, which answer the description of those designated in the treaty of 1783, then a direct line from the head of the St. Croix, whatever may be its direction, to such highlands ought to be adopted, and the line will still be conformable to the treaty; and Mr. Livington informs Sir Charles R. Vaughan, that the anticipations of an arrangement by which the Government of the United States might be enabled to treat for a more convenient boundary have not been realized, and in the present state of things, they must treat on the basis of the establishment of the boundary presented by the treaty.

On 11th of May, 1833, Sir Charles R. Vaughan replies that he is convinced that it is hopeless to expect a favorable result from a renewed negotiation upon that basis; that with regard to the proposal of a commission of boundary, it would be with great reluctance that the British Government could consent to have recourse to such a measure; and that he does not sufficiently comprehend the other view which Mr. L. has partially developed, and suggests that in deviating from the direct north line might lead to mountains to the eastward of it, which would trench upon his Majesty's territories of New Brunswick, and invites Mr. L. to offer some more prompt and effectual measure for the settlement of the boundary, than the renewal of a negotiation on an inadmissible basis, or having recourse again to commissions of boundary, &c.

On the 28th May, 1833, Mr. Livingston informs Sir Charles R. Vaughan that the American Government make no pretensions further east than a line directly north from the source of the river St. Croix; but if, on a more accurate survey, it should be found that the north line mentioned in the treaty should pass each of the highlands therein described, and that they should be found at some point further west, then the principle would apply, viz: that the direction of the line to connect the two natural boundaries must be altered, so as to suit their ascertained position; and to simplify the operation, the President is willing that the commissioners should be restricted to the single question of determining the point designated by the treaty as the highlands which divide the waters, to which point a straight line shall be drawn from the monument, etc.

On the 31st May, 1833, Sir Charles R. Vaughan replies, that it appears to him that the question of boundary can only be set at rest by an abandonment of the defective description of boundary contained in the treaty, and the two Governments mutually agreeing upon a conventional line more convenient to both parties; that the proposition of Mr. Livingston is so restricted to the terms of the treaty, that the basis of it is the same as that which he has been instructed by his Government to inform the Government of the United States that it was hopeless to negotiate upon. While the point of departure of the line to be traced according to the proposition of Mr. Livingston is clearly established, the point at which it is to terminate is left in doubt, and to be decided by the special commission, etc. He wishes to be informed what limitations it is intended to put upon the course to be followed by the commission; whether the attention of the commissioners is to be directed to any particular spot, or whether they are to be left at liberty to stop at the first highlands answering the required description, and observes that the impression left upon his mind, after a conversation with Mr. Livingston, and the production of a map upon a small scale, is, that the highlands to be sought in the manner he proposed, would probably be found north of the St. Johns, but westward some miles of the river St. Francis, and that he would be happy to receive from Mr. McLane some further explanation of the intended course to be pointed out to the special commissioners.

On the 5th June, 1833, Mr. McLane replies that it is not expected that any limitations will be put upon the course to be pursued by the special commissioners, but such as are required by a faithful adherence to the description of the boundary in the treaty of 1783, and proposes to make another effort to overcome the difficulty, and discarding the due north line, should that become necessary; to seek for and find, in the first place, the "highlands which divide those rivers that empty themselves into the river St. Lawrence, from those which fall into the Atlantic Ocean;" and when these shall be found in any part of the disputed territory, north or south of the St. Johns river, to draw a line from the monument to the said highlands, and to that point thereof which shall be nearest to a due north line from the monument.

On the 10th February, 1834, Sir Charles R. Vaughan replies, that no satisfactory or useful result could be obtained from the local survey proposed by the American Government, until the two parties are agreed upon certain points urged by him, and says no doubt can exist that by going far enough to the westward, such highlands as those required by the treaty could be found, because it is well known that the high ground in the neighborhood of the source of the St. Johns divides the Kennebec, which falls into the Atlantic Ocean, from the Chaudiere, which falls into the St. Lawrence; and upon a full view of the matter, his Majesty's Government think that, in the first place, and previously to any further negotiation, they are entitled to claim from the Government of the United States an acquiescence in the decisions pronounced by the arbiter upon all those points which he has decided; and in the next place, that as a preliminary to any attempt to settle the remaining point by negotiation, they ought to be satisfied that the Government with which they have to treat is possessed of the powers necessary for carrying into effect any arrangement upon which the two parties might agree.

On the 11th March, 1834, Mr. McLane replies, that the arbiter having failed to decide the question submitted to him, the opinions of that arbiter, in the course of his reasoning upon the point submitted, are liable to many objections, which are regarded as insuperable, and repeats the proposition to submit the whole subject to the commission, with an unlimited discretion over all the points necessary to the proper decision of the subject committed to it.

March 16, 1834, Sir Charles R. Vaughan replies, that under such a commission, not a step could be taken, unless the two Governments agree upon two of the subordinate points, viz: the character of the land they are to discover as dividing waters according to the treaty of 1783, and what are to be considered as Atlantic rivers.

March 21, 1834, Mr. McLane replies that the United States have no power to discard the line called for by the treaty of 1783, without the assent of Maine; and that assent, in the present state of the controversy, while there remains a reasonable hope of discovering the true and original boundary, it is not possible to obtain; and under such circumstances, the Government of his Britannic Majesty is invited to unite with the President in another effort, aided by the adoption of a plain and easy rule of surveying, to find the line of the treaty of 1783.

December 8, 1834, Sir Charles R. Vaughan repeats the arguments before urged as to the necessity of agreeing upon the character of the highlands and the river question, and trusts that the American Government will be prepared to agree with that of his Majesty as to the construction to be put upon the passage of the treaty respecting the rivers which empty into the Atlantic ocean, and will concur in deciding that the Atlantic rivers which are to guide the commissioners in searching for the highlands described in the treaty, are those rivers which fall into the sea to the westward of the mouth of the river St. Croix; and he is instructed to represent to Mr. Forsyth that his Majesty's Government consider a clear agreement between the two Government on this point to be an indisputable preliminary to the establishment of any new commission of survey. Till this point is decided, no survey of commissioners can lead to any useful result. But the decision of this point turns upon the interpretation of the words of the treaty, and not upon the operation of surveyors; and his Majesty's Government having once submitted this point, in common with others, to the judgment of an impartial arbiter, by whose award they have declared themselves ready to abide, they cannot consent to refer it to any other arbitration.

April 28, 1835, Mr. Forsyth replies that it is with unfeigned regret the President learns the decision of his Majesty's Government not to agree to the proposition made in that spirit of accommodation by which the United States have throughout been influenced, without a precedent compliance on their part with inadmissible conditions; that the President has made it the duty of Mr. Forsyth to apprise Sir Charles R. Vaughan that he cannot agree to clog the submission with the condition proposed by his Majesty's Government, and that a new submission, if made, should be made without restriction or qualification upon the discretion of the commissioners, other than such as result from established facts, and the just interpretation of the treaty of 1783, and such as heretofore have been, and are now again, tendered by him to his Britannic Majesty's Government, and invites a proposition from his Majesty's Government.

December 28, 1835, Mr. Bankhead, under instructions from his Majesty's Government, argues the river question, and says that with respect to the President's proposal for a commission of exploration and survey, his Majesty's Government could only agree to such a commission, provided there were a previous understanding between the two Governments that, although neither should be required to give up its own interpretation of the river question, yet as the commission of survey would be intended for the purposes of conciliation, and with a view of putting an end to discussion on controverted points, the commissioners should be instructed to search for highlands, upon the character of which no doubt could exist on either side; repeats that his Majesty's Government are ready to treat for a conventional line, and proposes to divide the disputed territory equally between Great Britain and the United States.

February 29, 1836, Mr. Forsyth replies, that agreement between the two Governments is impossible, while his Majesty's Government continues to maintain the position indicated by Mr. Bankhead's note; declines the proposition of his Majesty's Government to divide the disputed territory equally between the two Governments, and says that the President will, if his Majesty's Government consents to it, apply to the State of Maine for its assent to make the river St. Johns, from its source to its mouth, the boundary between Maine and his Majesty's dominions in that part of North America.

March 4, 1836, Mr. Bankhead refers to his note of 28th December, proposing to instruct the commissioners to search for highlands, upon the character of which no doubt could exist on either side, and thinks that the Secretary of State has not given this modification on the part of his Britannic Majesty's Government of the President's proposition the full weight to which it was entitled; and again submits it, bearing in mind that the commissioners who may be appointed are not to decide upon points of difference, but are merely to present to the respective Governments the result of their labors, which it is hoped may pave the way for an ultimate settlement of the question; and he notifies Mr. Forsyth that the proposition offered in Mr. Forsyth's note, to make the river St. Johns, from its source to its mouth, the boundary between the United States and his Majesty's Province of New Brunswick, is one to which the British Government, he is convinced, will never agree.

March 5, 1836, Mr. Forsyth hopes that the President's proposition for making the St. John's the boundary, may, when brought before his Majesty's Cabinet, be received in a more favorable light than that in which it appears to have presented itself to Mr. Bankhead.

If, however, the river boundary be rejected before the President consents to the modification of his previous proposition for the appointment of a commission of exploration and survey, it will be necessary to be informed more fully of the view of the British Government in offering the modification, etc.

August 10, 1837, Mr. Stevenson makes known to Lord-Palmerston the earnest and unabated desire which the President feels that the controversy should be speedily and amicably settled, and expresses the anxiety with which the Government of the United States is waiting the promised decision of his Majesty Government upon the proposition submitted to it as far back as July, 1836.

January 10, 1838, Mr. Fox recapitulates the various attempts which have been made to settle the question of boundary and failed; and in reference to the only remaining proposition of a commission of exploration and survey says, that her Majesty's Government have little expectation that such a commission could lead to any useful result, and on that account would be disposed to object to the measure. But at the same time they are so unwilling to reject the only plan now left which seems to afford a chance of making any further advance in this long pending matter, that they will not withhold their consent to such a commission, if the principle upon which it is to be formed, and the manner in which it is to proceed, can be satisfactorily settled; and says that her Majesty's Government have stated their opinion that, in order to avoid all fruitless disputes as to the character of such highlands, the commissioners should be instructed to look for highlands which both parties might acknowledge as fulfilling the conditions of the treaty. But if the two Governments should agree to the appointment of such a commission, it would be necessary that their agreement should be first recorded in a convention; and it would obviously be indispensable that the State of Maine should be an assenting party to the arrangement.

February 6, 1838, Mr. Forsyth replies to Mr. Fox that the President, for the purpose of placing in the possession of the State of Maine the views of her Majesty's Government, as exhibited in Mr. Fox's note, and of ascertaining the sense of the State authorities upon the expediency of meeting those views, has directed him to transmit a copy of it to Governor Kent for their consideration; repeats that the American proposition is intended, and, if agreed to, will doubtless be successful, to decide the question of boundary definitively, by the adoption of the highlands reported by the commissioners of survey, and would thus secure the treaty line. The British modification looks to no such object. It merely contemplates a commission of boundary analogous to that under the fifth article of the treaty of Ghent, and would, in all probability, prove equally unsatisfactory in practice.

From this history of the efforts on the part of our Government to settle the line of boundary by negotiation, it must be apparent to every Senator that there is no hope of establishing the boundary of the treaty by negotiation. The Government of Great Britain has not, at any time since the rejection of the advice of the arbiter, consented to treat upon the basis of the treaty line, unless the American Government would, in advance, yield some point that would prove fatal to its just rights under the treaty; and although the British Government have professed to be eager to substitute a conventional line—one that shall be more convenient to both parties than the treaty line—they have never been willing to intimate what that line should be, or what equivalents on either side should be granted, except that, after fixing their own limits to what they denominate disputed territory, they would consent to divide that territory equally between the two Governments. It is evident and clear, that while our Government have been pressing upon the Government of Great Britain their anxious desire to settle the question of boundary according to the provisions of the treaty, and in some instances have been induced to go beyond what may fairly be regarded the legitimate construction of the treaty, in order to obtain an amicable adjustment of the controversy, it has been the purpose and endeavor of the other party to avail themselves of this disposition to obtain concessions and admissions on our part which, in their effect, would render the description of the boundary contained in the treaty utterly nugatory. After such a lapse of time, and after such efforts as have been made on the part of our Government to settle this question of boundary, and with such dispositions on the other part as are manifested by the attempts at negotiation which have been detailed, it is vain to hope that the question of boundary can be settled without some decided action on the part of Congress. What that action shall be depends very much upon the justice of our claim, and upon the pretences of the Government of Great Britain to resist it; and that Senators may be possessed of the means of coming to right conclusions, and of forming a correct judgment upon these points, it is proposed to state, in a brief manner, some of the grounds and evidence upon which it is believed that the right is clearly with us, and that the pretences of the British Government are of recent origin, and without any valid foundation.

By the first article of the treaty of peace of 1783, his Britannic Majesty acknowledges the said United States—viz: New Hampshire, Massachusetts Bay, etc.—to be free, sovereign, and independent States; that he treats with them as such, and for himself, his heirs, and successors, relinquishes all claims to the Government propriety and territorial rights of the same, and every part thereof. It is admitted, as well on the part of the British Government as of the United States, that the map which was used by the commissioners who negotiated the treaty of peace, and to which they had reference in forming the terms of the treaty, was Mitchell's map, of which copies, upon a reduced scale, are now exhibited to the Senate. Upon this map are represented New England, Province of Maine, Province of Sagadahock, on the west side of the river St. Croix, and Nova Scotia or Acadia on the east side of that river, with a line drawn from the source of the St. Croix, directly north to the river St. Lawrence, crossing the St. Johns. It is to be remembered that Mitchel's map was published in 1755, when the province of Massachusetts Bay, as well as the province of Nova Scotia extended to, and were bounded by the river St. Lawrence, and so continued to be bounded, until the formation of the province of Quebec in 1763. By the grant of King James the first to Sir William Alexander, afterwards Lord Sterling, in 1621, the boundaries of the Territory of Nova Scotia are, so far as relates to this question, thus described: "to the river commonly called by the name of Holy Cross, or the St. Croix, and to the furthcrest source or spring upon the western branch of the same, which first mingles its waters with those of the said river; thence by an imaginary direct line, to be drawn or run through the country, or over the land to the north to the first bay, river, or spring emptying itself into the great river of Canada, and from thence running to the east along the shores of the said river of Canada to the river, bay, or harbor, commonly known, or called by the name of Gachepe or Gaspee, etc."

By the charter of 3d William and Mary, 1691, it is declared "that the territories and colonies, called and known by the names of the colony of Massachusetts bay and colony of New Plymouth, the Province of Maine and the territory called Acadie or Nova Scotia, and all the tract of land lying between the said territories of Nova Scotia, and the said province of Maine, be erected, united, and incorporated into one province, by the name of our province of the Massachusetts bay in New England.

Upon referring to Mitchell's map, it will be seen that the line drawn upon it, from the source of the St. Croix to the river of Canada or St. Lawrence, is the westerly line described in the grant to Sir William Alexander, and Nova Scotia, as then known and understood; and the easterly line of the province of Massachusetts Bay: each of those provinces, when that map was made, extending northwardly to the river St. Lawrence. After the publication of Mitchell's map, viz: in 1763, by an order in council, the province of Quebec was formed, and the southwardly line of it thus described: "the said line crossing the St. Lawrence and Lake Champlain in forty-five degrees of north latitude, passes along the highlands which divide the rivers which empty themselves into the said St. Lawrence, from those which fall into the sea, and also along the coast of the Bay des Chaleurs and the coast of the Gulf of St. Lawrence to Cape Rosiers," etc. and the like description of boundary is contained in the commissions to Governor Murray, November 21, 1763, and to Goveror Carlton, April 21, 1767. By the act of Parliament, 14, George III, 1774, making more effectual provision for the government of the province of Quebec, it is enacted that all the territories, islands, and counties in North America, belonging to the Crown of Great Britain, bounded on the south, by a line from the Bay of Chaleurs, along the highlands which divide the waters that empty themselves into the river St. Lawrence, from those fall into the sea to a point in forty-five degrees of north latitude, on the eastern bank of the river Connecticut, etc. be, and they are hereby, annexed to, and made part and parcel of, the province of Quebec, as created and established by royal proclamation of the 7th October, 1763. In the commission to Guy Carlton, Governor of Quebec, dated December 27, 1774, the southern boundary of the province of Quebec is thus described:" bounded on the south by a line from the Bay of Chaleurs, along the highlands which divide the rivers that empty themselves into the river St. Lawrence from those which fall into the sea, to a point in forty-five degrees north latitude, etc. After the proclamation of October 7, 1763, the commissions to the several Governors of Nova Scotia, viz: to Montague Wilmot in 1763, to Lord William Campbell in 1765, to Francis Legge, esq. in 1773, and to John Parr, esq. in 1782, described that province of Nova Scotia thus: "to the northward by the southern boundary of our province of Quebec, as far as the western extremity of the Bay des Chaleurs; to the eastward by the said bay and the Gulf of St. Lawrence to the Cape or Promontory, called Cape Breton, in the island of that name, including said island, etc.; to the westward, (although our said province hath anciently extended, and doth of right extend, as far as the river Pantagonet or Penobscot,) it shall be bounded by a line drawn from Cape Sable, across the entrance of the bay of Fundy to the mouth of the river St. Croix, by the said river to its source, and by a line drawn due north, thence to the southern boundary of our province of Quebec."

The province of New Brunswick was established in 1784, and embraces what was, before that time, the northerly part of Nova Scotia. It is thus described in the several commissions to Governors of the province of New Brunswick, from the first one to Thomas Carlton, in 1784, down to that of the Earl of Dalhousie, in 1819, viz: "bounded on the westward by the mouth of the river St. Croix, by the said river to its source, and by a line drawn due north from thence to the southern boundary of our province of Quebec, to the northward by the said boundary as far as the western extremity of bay of Chaleurs, to the eastward by the said bay, and the gulf of St. Lawrence; to the bay called Bay Verte, to the south," &c. From all these documents, it is clear and undeniable that the western line of what was formerly Nova Scotia, now New Brunswick, is, and always has been, the river St. Croix, and a line from the source of that river due north, extending formerly to the river St. Lawrence, and since 1763 to the south line of Quebec; or, to what is the same thing, a line from the bay of Chaleurs, along the highlands, which divide the rivers that empty themselves into the river St. Lawrence from those which fall into the sea toward a point in 45 degrees of northern latitude, &c. That the north line of that province is as far north as we claim the north line of Maine to be, is proved, first, by the fact that the Bay Chaleurs is a part of that north line; secondly, by acts of the provincial Government, incorporating counties, and parishes, upon the Bay Chaleurs, and upon the river Restigouche, and regulating the fisheries in that river, granting land, and establishing roads, &c.; thirdly, from the acts, and declaration, of the Surveyors General of the provinces of Quebec and of New Brunswick, in 1787, when it was proposed by the authorities of the province of Quebec to run and mark the line between these provinces, as disclosed in the extracts hereafter to be mentioned.

Inasmuch as the province of Maine or Massachusett's bay formerly extended to and was bounded north by the river St. Lawrence, and as no change of its boundary had been made prior to the treaty of 1783, (except so far as the province of Quebec had been extended South of the St. Lawrence,) it is only necessary to see how far the south line of Quebec extends to the southward of the St. Lawrence, to ascertain the north line of the province of Massachusetts Bay, as it was at the time of the treaty, when his Britanic Majesty relinquished all claim to the government, propriety and territorial rights of the same and every part thereof. That line was described, in the proclamation, to be a line "crossing the St. Lawrence and Lake Champlain in 45 degrees north latitude, passing along the highlands which divide the rivers which empty themselves into the said river St. Lawrence from those which fall into the sea, and also along the coast of the Bay des Chaleurs," and in the act of Parliament "by a line from the bay of Chaleurs along the highlands which divide the waters that empty themselves into the river St. Lawrence from those which fall into the sea to a point in 45 degrees of north latitude, on the eastern bank of the river Connecticut." If there was any doubt as to what highlands were intended by these several descriptions, or as to their locality, in the absence of other satisfactory evidence, it might be sufficient to look upon the map of the country, then extant, and see that a range of highlands, extending all along from the western extremity of the bay of Chaleurs to Connecticut river, in 45 degrees north latitude, and north of all the streams flowing into the St. Johns river, is distinctly represented upon the map, and that no other range of highlands is indicated upon the map, between the bay Chaleurs and Connecticut river; and that this range, as indicated by the map, does divide the streams running northwardly into the St. Lawrence from the streams running southwardly into the sea. But a glance at this map must at once satisfy the mind that such highlands as are mentioned in the proclamation and act of Parliament must, in the nature of things, exist between the great river St. Lawrence on the northwest, and the Atlantic ocean on the southeast, and that such highlands must, of necessity, divide the rivers and streams represented on that map as running in different and opposite directions; and, but for the ingenuity of British agents and diplomatists, it would be difficult to imagine how any question could be made upon such a state of facts.

Thus far the question has been considered independently of the further article of the treaty of 1783, which was added "that all disputes which might arise in future on the subject of the boundaries of the said United States may be prevented, it is hereby agreed and declared that the following are and shall be their boundaries, viz: From the northwest angle of Nova Scotia, viz: that angle which is formed by a line due north from the source of St. Croix river to the highlands, along the said highlands which divide those rivers that empty themselves into the river St. Lawrence from those which fall into the Atlantic ocean, to the northwesternmost head of Connecticut river, (and thence round to the Southern boundary,) east by a line to be drawn along the middle of the river St. Croix from its mouth, in the bay of Fundy, to its source; and from its source directly north to the aforesaid highlands which divide the rivers that fall into the Atlantic ocean from those which fall into the river St. Lawrence."

The point of beginning, the terminus a quo, mentioned in this description of the boundary of the United States, viz: the northwest angle of Nova Scotia, not being fixed or marked by any actual monument existing at the time the treaty was formed, it was necessary so to describe it that its position and location might be ascertained and fixed by reference to other known monuments, and directing the manner in which a line should be extended from one to the other, and hence the further description of that angle, the point of departure, viz: "That angle which is formed by a line drawn due north from the source of St. Croix river to the highlands." To determine, therefore, the particular place and location of the angle thus described, it could only be necessary to commence at the source of St. Croix river, and run a line therefrom due north, until it should reach the highlands, and at whatever point of the highlands that line should meet them, would be the angle called for by the treaty. To effect this, the source of St. Croix river and the highlands must be ascertained, and it is matter of history that the two Governments were not, for years after the formation of the treaty, agreed as to what river was the St. Croix river, mentioned in, and intended by, the treaty; the American Government claiming that a river further east than the Scoudiac was the St Croix of the treaty; and the British Government contending that the Penobscot was the St. Croix of the treaty. This point of disagreement was settled and finally determined in 1797 by commissioners of both Governments under the provisions of the treaty of 1794, and a monument was accordingly erected at the source of the western branch of the river Scoudiac, or St. Croix river, as the source of St. Croix river mentioned in the treaty of 1783, and that monument has ever since been, and now is, recognised by both Governments as the point from which the line is to be drawn due north to the highlands. This point being fixed, and not now disputed, it remains to ascertain what highlands are to be reached by the line running due north from this monument, at which the northwest angle of Nova Scotia is to be located and fixed, and this is the point of difference between this Government and the Government of Great Britain, and of course requires a careful and close examination. In the former part of the description (in the treaty of 1783) of the highlands, at which the angle is to be formed, there is not any further designation of them, than that the line drawn due north from the source of St. Croix river to the highlands is the point from which the line of boundary is to start, and that line of boundary is "along the said highlands, which divide those rivers that empty themselves into the St. Lawrence from those which fall into the Atlantic ocean, to the northwesternmost head of Connecticut river"—the highlands called for, as constituting the point of departure of the line of boundary, must be the same as those upon which that line of boundary is to run along; and the highlands upon which that boundary is to run along, are highlands which divide the waters, etc. Further, in the latter part of the description of boundaries, in the treaty of 1783, the highlands intended are more certainly fixed, in the following words: "East by a line to be drawn along the middle of the river St. Croix from its mouth, in the bay of Fundy, to its source, and from its source directly north to the aforesaid highlands, which divide the rivers that fall into the Atlantic ocean from those which fall into the river St. Lawrence." The highlands mentioned in both parts of the description of boundaries are therefore the same and not different, and, to satisfy the description of them, must be such highlands as divide the rivers in the manner mentioned in the treaty.

That such highlands were known to be near to the river St. Lawrence, and between the source of St. Croix and the river St. Lawrence, is not only apparent upon inspection of Mitchell's map, used by the commissioners in forming the treaty of peace, and in preparing the description of boundaries, but was then matter of history and record in England, as well as in the British provinces in North America.

In Pownal's topographical description of part of the British colonies in America, in describing mountains, highlands, etc. he says: "And in the latitude of 45 or thereabouts, turning eastward, run away to the Gulf of St. Lawrence." Again: "Going from the same line in latitude 45 of the greatest height of this range of mountains, and following them to the east northerly, they all seem to range as united until again divided by the Bay of Chaleurs." Again: "All the rivers which have their sources amidst the northern ridges of this great range, fall into Canada or St. Lawrence river, as the St. Francis, Chaudier, and many others. All which have their sources in the southern ridges, fall into the Bay of Fundy or into the main ocean," etc.

The range of highlands thus described is near to the St. Lawrence and north of the St. Johns, and has always been claimed by the American Government as the highlands intended and described in the treaty; and although formerly admitted to be such by agents of the British Government, it is not so now; but the latter Government contend that the due north line from the source of the St. Croix shall stop at Marr's Hill, which is situated some thirty miles south of the Great Falls in St. Johns river, and not more than forty-five miles from the monument at the source of St. Croix.

To show that the highlands of the treaty were formerly understood and admitted by the agents of the Government of Great Britain to be situated north of the St. Johns river, and where the American Government now claim that they are to be found, the following extracts are submitted:

Extract from minutes of Executive Council of Quebec.

MONDAY, 9th July, 1787.—Present his Excellency the Governor, &c.

His lordship intimated the propriety of ascertaining the limits between this and the province of New Brunswick, and that the Surveyor General of that province would soon meet Mr. Holland for that purpose, &c.

Extract from Lord Dorchester's instructions to Mr. John Holland.

QUEBEC, July 9, 1787.—You will be pleased to accompany Mr. Finley to the Great Falls on the river St. Johns, in order to assist in marking out the boundary between the provinces of Quebec and New Brunswick, &c. You will there meet the Surveyor General of the province of New Brunswick, or some other person authorized by the Lieutenant Governor of that province, in concert with whom and Mr. Finlay, you will proceed upon that business. You will be guided therein by the enclosed descriptions of the boundaries of the provinces of Quebec, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick, extracted from commissions as Governor thereof, to which is likewise added the description of the boundary of the United States, taken from the definitive treaty for your information, &c.

Extract from Mr. Holland's report.

"July 26, 1787.—Pursuant to orders, proceeded to Great Falls, on the river St. Johns, and on the 16th met Capt. Sproul, Surveyor General of New Brunswick, who said that, conceiving his waiting for us at the Great Falls totally unnecessary, he was now proceeding on his way to the height of land or the carrying place between St. Lawrence and Lake Timisconta, as there (according to his idea) the boundary ought to be fixed. I observed, it was generally understood in Canada, that the line between the provinces of Quebec and New Brunswick should run from the head of Chaleur bay along the highlands in a westerly direction to the Great Falls on the St. Johns river, and from thence west to the westernmost or main branch of the river St. Croix. He answered that, should a boundary be fixed at or near the Great Falls, he would protest against such doings as contrary to directions laid down in his instructions. Afterwards, Capt. Sproul repeated the same to Mr. Finlay, adding that he would proceed immediately to the portage, to examine which way the waters incline on the heights there, that, by their course, he might ascertain the boundary between the provinces of Quebec and New Brunswick, as all the streams running into the rivers which empty themselves into the river St. Johns are in the province of New Brunswick, and those which fall into the St. Lawrence are in the province of Quebec. After many arguments to show the impropriety and disadvantage of fixing a boundary on the portage, &c. but more especially that the fixing that limit would materially affect the boundary between us and the United States of America, and that a large territory would thereby be saved or lost to his Majesty's dominions, &c. and requested Mr. Sproul to return with us to the Great Falls. He refused, saying that he had formed his opinion of the situation of the boundary from geographical knowledge and ocular demonstration, and it was unalterable, &c."

The written instructions from the Governor of New Brunswick to Sproul, dated 7th July, 1787, were to run the boundary line between the provinces of Quebec and New Brunswick agreeably to the act of Parliament for establishing the province of Quebec.

Extract from the report of the Commissioner of Council of the province of Quebec, appointed to consider the boundary between the provinces of Quebec and New Brunswick, &c. Oct. 18, 1787:

"The Commissioner most humbly submits to your Lordship whether it would not be for the advantage of both Governments that the province of Quebec be separated from that of New Brunswick by a line running along the highlands, which extend from the head of Chaleurs bay to the foot of the great fall of St. Johns river, and from thence crossing the river (so as to include the whole of the portage or carrying place) and continuing in a straight line toward the sources of the river Chaudeur, which rise on the highlands that commence at the said head of the Bay of Chaleurs, and extend all the way to the northwesternmost head of Connecticut river."

Extract from the arguments of the British agent, in 1797, before the Commissioners under the 5th article of the treaty of 1794.

"If it can be shown that the river Scoudiac, so called by the Indians, is this river St. Croix, and that a line along the middle of it to its source, together with a line due north from its source, formed a part of the western boundary of the province of Nova Scotia, and that the highlands formed the northern boundary line of this province at the time the treaty of peace was made, so as to form the northwest angle of Nova Scotia, by these western and northern boundaries, the intention of the treaty of peace is at once ascertained in the great point in controversy.

"But to apply these facts to the point more immediately under consideration, whether a line due north from the source of the Western or main branch of the river Scoudiac, or St. Croix, will leave to each of the parties to the treaty those rivers that empty themselves, or whose mouths are, within its territories, upon the sea coast respectively.

"The effect, so far as regards the United States, is completely secured by the treaty, in all events; and thence we have further reason to suppose it was intended to be reciporcal in this respect, if a just interpretation will warrant it. A line due north from the source of the western or main branch of the Scoudiac, or St. Croix, will fully secure this effect to the United States in every instance; and also to Great Britain in all instances except in that of the river St. Johns, wherein it becomes impossible, by reason that the source of this river is to the westward, not only of the western boundary line of Nova Scotia, but of the sources of the Penobscot, and even of the Kennebec, so that this north line must, of necessity, cross the river St. Johns; but it will cross it in a part of it almost at the foot of the highlands, and where it ceases to be navigable. But, if the north line is traced from the source of the Cheputnaticook, it will not only cross the river St. John within about 50 miles of Frederickton, the metropolis of New Brunswick, but will cut off the sources of the rivers which fall into the bay of Chaleurs, if not of many others," &c.

Extract from a letter of Robert Liston, his Majesty's Minister Plenipotentiary to the United States, to Ward Chapman, esq. agent of the British Government in 1798.

"I have considered, with attention, your letter of this date, and it appears to me evident that the adoption of the river Cheputnaticook, as part of the boundary between his Majesty's American dominions and those of the United States, in preference to a line drawn from the easternmost point of the Scodiac lakes, would be attended with considerable advantage. It would give an addition of territory to New Brunswick, together with a greater extent of navigation on St. Johns river," &c.

It thus appears that when the two Governments were contending with each other as to the true St. Croix, or place from which the due north line was to be run, it was well understood and admitted that such due north line would cross the river St. Johns, and that the highlands of the treaty were north of that river. If Marr's Hill (now claimed by the British Government as the highlands of the treaty, and which is far south of the river St. Johns,) had been then supposed or claimed to be the highlands, at which the due north line was to stop, why the zeal and effort of the British agent to fix the starting point (the source of the St. Croix) so far west as that the line, running due north from it, should not cross the St. Johns near Frederickton, but so far up that river as to be beyond where it was navigable and near to the highlands? Or why should Mr. Liston, the British Minister, write to their agent for managing the question before the commissioners, that, by adopting the course suggested, it would give to New Brunswick a greater extent of navigation on the St. Johns?

Again: at the making of the treaty of Ghent in 1814, it is manifest that the British Government made no pretension that the highlands were south of the St. Johns, or that any portion of the territory now denominated disputed territory belonged to that Government The idea that the St. Johns river was not an Atlantic river, that the highlands of the treaty were south of the St. Johns, or that the line of boundary was so imperfectly described in the treaty that it was impossible to find and locate it, was not then entertained. Hence we find that, on that occasion, the British commissioners first propose "such a variation of the line of frontier as may secure a direct communication between Quebec and Halifax." On being informed that the American commissioners had not authority to cede any territory, the British commissioners say that they were not prepared to anticipate the objections stated by the American commissioners that they had no authority to cede territory, however insignificant, although the proposal left it open to them to demand an equivalent for such cession, in frontier or otherwise; and further add, that "they are pursuaded that an arrangement on this point might be easily made, if entered into with a spirit of conciliation, without any prejudice to the interests of the district in question, [viz: the now State of Maine,] and Col. Bouchette, Surveyor General of Lower Canada, in his Topographical description of the province of Lower Canada, printed in London in 1815, says: "The main ridge, continuing its northeasterly direction, is intersected by an imaginary line, prolonged in a course astronomically due north from the head of the river St. Croix, and which ridge is supposed to be the boundary between Lower Canada and the United States; at least such appears to be the way in which the treaty of 1783 is construed by the American Government, but which ought more fairly to be understood as follows, viz: that the astronomical line running north from the St. Croix, should extend only to the first or easterly ridge, and thence run westerly along the west of said ridge to the Connecticut, thereby equitably dividing the waters flowing into the St. Lawrence from those that empty into the Atlantic within the United States and those that have their estuaries within the British province of New Brunswick. It is important, and must always have been had in contemplation, that an uninterrupted communication and connection should exist between all his Majesty's North American possessions; but, by the manner in which the treaty is insisted upon by the opposite party, a space of more than eighty-five miles would be placed within the American limits, and by which the British provinces would be completely severed; it would also produce the inconvenience of having the mail from England to Quebec carried over that distance of American territory, which may be deemed either as matter of indulgence, or complained of as an encroachment, according to the temper of the times."

Since it was ascertained that the American Government was not disposed to vary the treaty line, to cede, or to exchange for an equivalent, the right of communication between Quebec and Halifax, which seems so desirable to the British Government, other objections have been invented and urged by that Government against the claim and right of the American Government to the territory before admitted to be ours, and which is most clearly ours by the terms of the treaty of 1783. One of these objections is, that the St. Johns river does not empty its waters into the sea or Atlantic ocean, but into the bay of Fundy, and hence that the highlands which divide the waters running into the river St. Lawrence from those which run into the river St. Johns, are not such highlands as are called for by the treaty. Second: that there are not any highlands north of the St. Johns river which would be reached by running a due north line from the source of St. Croix river; and, thirdly, that Marr's Hill, about thirty miles south of St. John's river, on the due north line from the source of St. Croix, and the hills and mountains separating the waters which run in the St. Johns river from those which run into Penobscot river, are the highlands of the treaty, and along which the boundary is to be established. In answer to the first objection, it is sufficient to ask Senators to look at Mitchell's map, and they will see that the great river of Canada, or St. Lawrence, is laid down on the north of New England and Nova Scotia, into which certain rivers are represented as running from among the highlands therein indicated; and on the south and east is the Atlantic ocean, into which all the streams and rivers south of the same highlands appear to run, and St. Johns river is one of the latter. The objection that the St. Johns river empties its waters into the Bay of Fundy, and thence into the ocean, is none other than exists against the Penobscot, which empties its waters into Penobscot bay, and thence into the ocean; and to the Kennebec, which empties its waters into Sagadahoc bay, and thence into the ocean, and both of which latter rivers are admitted by the British Government to empty themselves into the Atlantic ocean.

To obviate the second objection, the following extracts are deemed sufficient. Colonel Bouchette, Surveyor General of Lower Canada, in his topographical description of that province, before quoted, states: "Beyond this range, at about fifty miles distance, is the ridge, generally denominated the Lands height, dividing the waters that fall into the St. Lawrence from those taking a direction towards the Atlantic ocean, and along whose summit is supposed to run the boundary line between the territories of Great Britain and the United States of America. This claim commences upon the eastern branch of the Connecticut river, takes a northeasterly course, and terminates near Cape Rosier, in the Gulf of St. Lawrence." And, "From the Connecticut river, the height of land on which the boundary is supposed to pass runs to the northeast, and divides the waters that fall into the St. Lawrence from those flowing into the Atlantic; and which height, after running some distance upon that course, sends off a branch to the eastward, that separates the heads of streams falling into Lake Tamisconata and river St John, and by that channel into the Bay of Fundy, from those that descend in a more direct course into the Atlantic."

Colonel Johnson, United States surveyor, in his account of the survey of the due north line in 1817, says that, proceeding north from the last mentioned ridge, the land continues very high, and not very uneven, 144 miles 26 chains, (north from the monument,) where the land is nearly as high as at 132 miles, and is the ridge which divides the waters emptying into the St. Lawrence from those which fall into the Atlantic ocean.

Colonel Partridge, United States Surveyor, states that the land at Grand Portage, near Lake Tamisconata, is 1336 feet above tide water of the St. Lawrence at St. Andre.

To the third objection it is answered that the location of the boundary at Mars Hill, would contradict all cotemporaneous understanding as to the highlands, which formed the boundary between the province of Quebec on one side, and the provinces of Massachusetts Bay, and Nova Scotia or New Brunswick on the other. It contradicts the arguments and opinions of the British agent, and of the British minister, at the settlement of the true St. Croix, of the treaty, and fixing the monument at the source of the Scoudiac river. It does not divide any waters running into the St. Lawrence from waters running into the Atlantic ocean, but does divide streams running into the St. Johns from other streams running into Penobscot river, and through those rivers into the sea or Atlantic ocean; in other words, it divides waters running into the Atlantic ocean, through the St. Johns river, from waters running into the Atlantic ocean, through the Penobscot river. Mars Hill is a separate, isolated mountain, and there is not any range of highlands extending from it in the direction toward Connecticut river. It cannot be the northwest angle of Nova Scotia, for the reason that the west line of Nova Scotia, now New Brunswick, continues due north more than 100 miles from Mars Hill. The highlands of the treaty must be where the northwest angle of Nova Scotia was at the making of the treaty. That Nova Scotia extended north, as far as the Restigouche, is proved by her acts of jurisdiction, incorporating counties, parishes, &c. upon that river, and the line between the now province of New Brunswick, and the province of Lower Canada, is upon the bay Chaleurs, and the range of highlands extending therefrom toward the head of Connecticut river, making the northwest angle of New Brunswick where the American Government claim it should be, more than 100 miles due north from Mars Hill. Further, the original west line of Nova Scotia extended from the St. Croix river, from its mouth to its source, and from its source directly north, to the St. Lawrence, (since changed to the highlands, or south line of the province of Quebec,) and that west line has not been varied, but now is the west line of the province of New Brunswick. It is not denied that the north line of New Brunswick is at least 100 miles north of Mars Hill, and yet, strange as it may appear, the British Government contend and insist that the northwest angle of Nova Scotia, now New Brunswick, is in the west line of New Brunswick, viz: at Mars Hill, a point in that west line, and about one-third of the distance from the source of St. Croix to the north line of New Brunswick, or the south line of Canada.

If Mars Hill be the northwest angle of Nova Scotia, now New Brunswick, it would be expected that the line of New Brunswick, in its further extent, must vary to the eastward of north; but so far from this being the fact, it continues (according to the American claim) due north, about 100 miles from that hill, and (according to the British claim) it turns west, and extends more than 100 miles to the head waters of the Kennebec and Chaudier.

Who, before this, ever heard of an angle midway of a straigt line? but so it must be if Mars Hill be the northwest angle of Nova Scotia or New Brunswick.

It should, also, be borne in mind that, according to the British claim as now insisted upon, and as marked upon map A, which is agreed to be a true representation of the topography of the country, and of the lines of boundary claimed by the respective parties, the tract of country which is situate west of the due north line from the monument, (and west of the west line of Nova Scotia, now New Brunswick, as described in all the commissions to the Governors of that province, from 1763 down to 1819, and probably to this day,) and between the lines contended for by the respective parties, contains from five to six millions of acres of land, and is now claimed as part of the province of New Brunswick. By what right or pretence can it be claimed as belonging to New Brunswick; even if it do not belong to the United States, it would rather seem to belong to Quebec, or Lower Canada, as now called. If Mars Hill, and the line running from it westwardly, and designated on map A as the line claimed by Great Britain, be along the highlands as described in the treaty of 1783, then it must follow that the territory in dispute is part of the former Province of Quebec, now Lower Canada, the south line of which is described in the same language as is the north line of the United States. But it is not so claimed, and never has been. There is no controversy between Maine, or the United States, with Lower Canada, as to the line of boundary between them. There is not, and never has been, any conflict of jurisdiction with that Province, and so late as 1815, the Surveyor General of Canada, Col. Bouchette, by authority of that Government, published a map of Lower Canada, upon a large scale, and from actual surveys, (which now hangs in the Senate chamber, and to which the attention of Senators is earnestly called,) which shows clearly and distinctly the highlands dividing the Province of Canada from the Province of Maine, now the State of Maine, and which highlands are identical with those for which the United States always have and still do contend. On the north of that range of highlands are marked the counties and parishes in Lower Canada, and on the south of it is marked the Province of Maine; and it would be with an ill-grace, after such a survey and map of Lower Canada, for any one to contend that Lower Canada extended over those highlands and south to the line claimed by Great Britain. But notwithstanding all the obstacles to the claim of New Brunswick to this territory, and all the absurdities to which such a claim is liable, it is a fact that the Government of New Brunswick not only claim actual and exclusive jurisdiction over it, but have granted land within its limits, have appointed a warden to superintend and protect it, and deny to the Government of Maine and of the United States the right of property and jurisdiction within it. Yet more: American citizens, residing upon that territory, are made amenable to the authorities of that Province, have been arrested at their own homes by officers of that Province, taken to Frederickton and there imprisoned, tried by their courts, condemned and punished for no other crime than asserting their rights as American citizens, and attempting to execute the laws of their country; and when we complain of these acts of outrage, and contempt of our rights as American citizens, we are told that Great Britain was originally the owner of the whole, and that their right continues until the line shall be settled, and the part released be formally set apart. Such doctrine is not applicable to the case in question. The treaty was not a grant of territory, but the acknowledgment of the independence of colonies, and prescribing limits to such as were declared to be independent; and when such claim is put forth and threatened to be enforced, in the language held by Sir Archibald Campbell, while he was Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick, and by Sir John Harvey, the present Lieutenant Governor of that Province, there seems no alternative but to submit, and abandon all, or to assert our rights, perform our duties to one of the States of the Union, and maintain the honor of the nation by running the line and giving protection to all our citizens within it.

In 1831, Sir Archibald Campbell, then Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick, in a letter to the then Governor of Maine, says: "It is, perhaps, unnecessary to remind your excellency, that until the unfortunate boundary question is definitively settled, it is my imperative duty to maintain inviolate the existing boundaries of the Province committed to my charge." And so late as September last, Sir John Harvey, Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick, in a letter to Governor Dunlap, of Maine, says: "I hold positive instructions from my Government not to suffer any act of sovereignty to be exercised by any foreign power within the territory in dispute betwixt Great Britain and the United States, until the right to that territory shall have been determined by negotiation by the two Governments; that he has no discretionary power whatever upon the subject; and that, if the whole military force of British America should be necessary to enable me to give effect to these instructions, that force would be placed at my disposal." Add to these official declarations that recently the British forces destined for Canada, without asking the permission of this Government, were marched across the disputed territory to Quebec; that preparations for a military post at Woodstock are being made, and that the military force at Fredericktion and Halifax has lately been increased by the addition of two regiments at the former, and three regiments at the latter place, and I need not say that the crisis has arrived when this controversy about our boundary should be taken in charge by Congress, and such measures promptly adopted as will afford protection to our citizens, bring the question of boundary to a speedy issue, preserve the rights of Maine, and save the honor of the nation.

How these objects shall be attained is for Congress, in its wisdom, to determine. It is altogether probable, that should Maine attempt to run the line, unaided by the General Government, conflicts might ensue which must eventually bring the General Government to her aid. Is it not better, more just to Maine, and less likely to disturb the peaceful relations between the two Governments, that the United States should at once undertake the survey of that line? If the Government of Great Britain will concur, and aid in the survey, there can be no trouble; if that Government should not concur, she cannot reasonably complain of our making it; and when made, it will remain for her to acquiesce in it, or to pursue such other course as she may think the merits of her pretended claim will justify her in adopting.

Sincerely desirous of preserving peace, I propose the bill to provide for surveying the boundary under the authority of the United States, in the full belief that it is the only mode in which the rights of Maine and of the nation can, or will, be maintained.

DISTRICT BANKS—SPECIE BASIS.

REMARKS OF MR. BENTON, OF MISSOURI.

In Senate, May 10, 1838—On the bill to recharter the banks of the District of Columbia. The question being on Mr. BUCHANAN'S amendment to fix the proportion of specie on hand to the circulation and deposites,

Mr. BENTON said: This is a point of great moment—one on which the public mind has not been sufficiently awakened in this country, though well understood and duly valued in England.

The charters of banks in the United States are usually drawn on this principle, that a certain proportion of the capital, and sometimes the whole of it, shall be paid up in gold or silver before the charter shall take effect. This is the usual provision, without any obligation on the bank to retain any part of this specie after it gets into operation; and this provision has too often proved to be illusory and deceptive. In many cases the banks have borrowed the requisite amount for a day, and then returned it; in many other cases, the proportion of specie, though paid up in good faith, is immediately lent out, or parted with. The result to the public is about the same in both cases; the bank has little or no specie, and its place is supplied by the notes of other banks.

The great vice of the banking system in the United States is in banking upon paper—upon the paper of each other—and treating this paper as cash. This may be safe among the banks themselves; it may enable them to settle with one another, and to liquidate reciprocal balances; but to the public it is nothing. In the event of a run upon a bank, or a general run upon all banks, it is specie, and not paper, that is wanted. It is specie, and not paper, which the public want and must have.

The motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCHANAN] is intended to remedy this vice in these District banks; it is intended to impose an obligation on these banks to keep in their vaults a quantum of specie bearing a certain proportion to the amount of their immediate liabilities in circulation and deposites. The gentleman's motion is well intended, but it is defective in two particulars: first, in requiring the proportion to be the one-fourth, instead of the one-third, and next, in making it apply to the private deposites only. The true proportion is one-third, and this to apply to all the deposites except those which are special. This proportion has been fixed for a hundred years at the Bank of England; and just so often as that bank has fallen below this proportion, mischief has occurred. This is the sworn opinion of the present Governor of the Bank of England, and of the directors of that institution. Before Lord Althorpe's committee in 1832, Mr. Horsley Palmer, the Governor of the Bank, testified in these words:

"The average proportion, as already observed, of coin and bullion which the bank thinks it prudent to keep on hand, is at the rate of a third of the total amount of all her liabilities, including deposites as well as issues." Mr. George Ward Norman, a director of the bank, states the same thing in a different form of words. He says: 'For a full state of the circulation and the deposites, say twenty-one millions of notes and six millions of deposites, making in the whole twenty-seven millions of liabilities, the proper sum in coin and bullion for the bank to retain is nine millions.' Thus, the average proportion of one-third between the specie on hand and the circulation and deposites, must be considered as an established principle at that bank, which is quite the largest, and amongst the oldest, in the world. It might be well also to remark that the same proportion, very nearly, prevailed in the Bank of the United States at the time of the removal of the deposites in October, 1833: it was, of specie on hand, $10,663,441; of circulation and deposites, $37,105,465; being at the rate of between one-third and one-fourth of specie in hand for immediate liabilities."

The Bank of England is not merely required to keep on hand, in bullion, the one-third of its immediate liabilities; it is bound also to let the country see that it has, or has not, that proportion on hand. By an act of the third year of William IV, it is required to make quarterly publications of the average of the weekly liabilities of the bank, that the public may see whenever it descends below the point of safety. Here is the last of these publications, which is a full exemplification of the rule and the policy which now governs that bank:

Quarterly average of the weekly liabilities and assets of the Bank of England, from the 12th December, 1837, to the 6th of March, 1838, both inclusive, published pursuant to the act 3 and William IV, cap. 98:

Liabilities.		Assets.
Circulation	£18,600,000	Securities	£22,792,900
Deposites	11,535,000	Bullion	10,015,000
	£30,135,000		£30,807,000

London, March 12.

According to this statement, the Bank of England is now safe, and accordingly we see that she is acting upon the principle of having bullion enough, for she is shipping gold to the United States.

The proportion in England is one-third. The bank relies upon its debts and other resources for the other two-thirds, in the event of a run upon it. This is the rule in that bank which has more resources than any other bank in the world; which is situated in the moneyed metropolis of the world—the richest merchants its debtors, friends and customers—and the Government of England its debtor and backer, and always ready to sustain it with exchequer bills, and with every exertion of its credit and means. Such a bank, so situated and so aided, still deems it necessary to its safety to keep in hand always the one-third in bullion of the amount of its immediate liabilities. Now, if the proportion of one-third is necessary to the safety of such a bank, with such resources, how is it possible that our banks, with their meagre resources and small array of friends, to be safe with a less proportion?

This is the rule at the Bank of England, and just as often as it has been departed from, the danger of that departure has been proved. It was departed from in 1797, when the proportion sunk to the one-seventh; and what was the result? The stoppage of the Bank, and of all the banks in England, and a suspension of specie payments for six-and-twenty years! It was departed from again about a year ago, when the proportion sunk to one-eighth nearly; and what was the result? A death struggle between the paper systems of England and the United States, in which our system was sacrificed to save hers. Her system was saved from explosion! but at what cost? at what cost to us, and to herself? To us a general stoppage of all the banks for twelve months; to the English, a general stagnation of business, decline of manufactures, and of commerce, much individual distress, and a loss of two millions sterling of revenue to the Crown. The proportion of one-third may then be assumed as the point of safety in the Bank of England; less than that proportion cannot be safe in the United States. Yet the Senator from Pennsylvania proposes less—he proposes the one-fourth, and proposes it, not because he feels it to be the right proportion, but from some feeling of indulgence or forbearance to this poor District. Now, I think that this is a case in which kind feelings can have no place, and that the point in question is one upon which there can be no compromise. A bank is a bank whether made in a District or a State; and a bank ought to be safe whether the stockholders be rich or poor. Safety is the point aimed at, and nothing unsafe should be tolerated. There should be no giving and taking below the point of safety. Experienced men fix upon the one-third as the safe proportion; we should not, therefore, take a less proportion. Would the gentleman ask to let the water in the boiler of a steamboat sink one inch lower, when the experienced Captain informed him that it had already sunk as low as it was safe to go? Certainly not! So of these banks. One-third is the point of safety; let us not tamper with danger by descending to the one-fourth.

Mr. B. here read an extract from a speech of Mr. WEBSTER, in which he quoted with approbation the rule of the Bank of England to keep on hand the one-third in bullion of its circulation and deposites, and in which speech it was averred that the same rule prevailed at the Bank of the United States. These remarks of the Senator from Massachusetts were in relation to the Safety Fund banks of New York, during the panic of 1833-34, and to show that those banks were not safe, because their specie on hand fell below that proportion. The attacks then made on these banks, though dangerous to them at the time, may have stimulated them to attain the point of safety. Certain it is they are now doing better than any other banks in the United States. They have all resumed! all the banks of the State and city of New York have resumed! and I give them applause, and wish them a safe deliverance from every danger.

Mr. B. continued. When a bank stops, the first thing we see is an exposition of its means, and a declaration of ultimate ability to pay all its debts. This is nothing to the holders of its notes. Immediate ability is the only ability that is of any avail to them. The fright of some, and the necessity of others, compel them to part with their notes. Cool, sagacious capitalists can look to ultimate ability, and buy up the notes from the necessitous and the alarmed. To them ultimate ability is sufficient; to the community it is nothing. It is, therefore, for the benefit of the community that the banks should be required to keep always on hand the one-third of their circulation and deposites; they are then trusted for two-thirds, and this is carrying credit far enough. If pressed by a run, it is as much as a bank can do to make up the other two-thirds out of the debts due to her. Three to one is credit enough, and it is profit enough. If a bank draws interest upon three dollars when it has but one, this is eighteen per cent. and ought to content her. A citizen cannot lend his money for more than six per cent. and cannot the banks be contented with eighteen? Must they insist upon issuing four dollars, or even five, upon one, so as to draw twenty-four or thirty per cent. and thus, after paying their officers vast salaries, and accommodating friends with loans on easy terms, still make enough out of the business community to cover all expenses and all losses, and then to divide larger profits than can be made at any other business?

Mr. B. complimented the late General Assembly of Louisiana in having incorporated into an act the English proportion of one third specie for the circulation and deposites combined; and also for having adopted the important provision of a limitation on the denomination of notes to a minimum of twenty dollars. He made no remark upon the general character of the bill which contained these provisions, and which had not ripened into a law. He only spoke of the two provisions mentioned; any thing further would be improper; and he mentioned these provisions as setting an example which it would be good for the Congress of the United States, and for every State in the Union, to follow.

We now touch a point, said Mr. B. vital to the safety of banking, and I hope it will neither be passed over without decision, nor decided in an erroneous manner. We had up the same question two years ago, in the discussion of the bill to regulate the keeping of the public moneys by the local deposite banks. A Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEBSTER] moved the question; he (Mr. B.) cordially concurred in it; and the proportion of one fourth was then inserted. He (Mr. B.) had not seen at that time the testimony of the Governor and Directors of the Bank of England, fixing on the one third as the proper proportion, and he presumed that the Senntor from Massachusetts [Mr. W.] had not then seen it, as on another occasion he quoted it with approbation, and stated it to be the proportion observed at the Bank of the United States. The proportion of one fourth was then inserted in the deposite bill; it was an erroneous proportion, but even that proportion was not allowed to stand. After having been inserted in the bill, it was struck out, and it was left to the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury to fix the proportion. To this I then objected, and gave my reasons for it. I was for fixing the proportion, because I held it vital to the safety of the deposite banks; I was against leaving it to the Secretary, because it was a case in which the inflexible rule of law, and not the variable dictate of individual discretion shou'd be exercised, and because I was certain that no Secretary could be relied upon to compel the banks to toe the mark, when Congress itself had flinched from the task of making them do it. My objections were unavailing. The proportion was struck out of the bill; the discretion of the Secretary to fix it was substituted; and that discretion it was impossible to exercise with any effect over the banks. They were, that is to say, many of them, were far beyond the mark then; and at the time of the issuing of the Treasury order in July, 1836, there were deposite banks, whose proportion of specie in hand to their immediate liabilities were as one to twenty, one to thirty, one to forty, and even one to fifty! The explosion of all such banks was inevitable. The issuing of the Treasury order improved them a little; they began to increase their specie, and to diminish their liabilities; but the gap was too wide, the chasm was too vast to be filled; and at the touch of pressure, all these banks fell like nine-pins! They tumbled down in a heap, and lay there, without the power of motion, or scarcely of breathing. Such was the consequence of our error in omitting to fix the proper proportion of specie in hand to the liabilities of our deposite banks: let us avoid that error in the bill now before us. True we are now legislating not for the whole Union, but for a District of ten miles square. Our legislation is confined to a narrow district, but our example spreads over the wide Union. That example, for good or for evil, will have its influence; and let us endeavor to set some good examples in the provisions of these charters; let us endeavor to lessen the dangers, and to increase the safety of banking; and, for that purpose, to require them to keep specie on hand to the amount of the one-third of their circulation and deposites, and also to issue, or use no note of less denomination than twenty dollars. To make this latter provision effective it would be necessary to banish all notes under twenty dollars from the District.

TREASURY NOTE BILL.

SPEECH OF MR. RHETT,
OF SOUTH CAROLINA,

In the House of Representatives, May 13, 1838—On the Treasury note bill.

Mr. CHAIRMAN: It is not my intention, on the present occasion, to discuss at length, the various subjects embraced by the remarks of my honorable friend and colleague, [Mr. THOMPSON,] who has just taken his seat. When the Independent Treasury bill comes up for consideration, I may take an opportunity to controvert many of the positions he has assumed, with respect to this great conservative measure; but, at present, I shall confine myself chiefly to the subject strictly before the committee—the authorizing a reissue of Treasury notes, in the place of those which have been returned into the Treasury in the payment of public dues, before the period contemplated for their redemption by the act of October last. To judge of the propriety of this measure, it is necessary to look to the state of the Treasury. In a communication addressed to the House a few days since, on this subject, by the President of the United States, it is stated, that there are in the Treasury, of available means, in round numbers, but $216,000, and in the Mint, but $347,000. Demands to a large amount are suspended in the departments, waiting for payment from the means to be provided by Congress; and the present means will carry the Government but a few days longer, when, if not provided with them, it must stop. Of unavailable means, the resources are abundant. Twenty-eight millions are on deposite with the States. Fifteen millions more are due from the banks and individuals—one-half of which will come in with the next six months. The necessity of the Treasury is an immediate, present necessity; not extending (unless increased by your legislation) beyond the next four or six months, and limited chiefly to the next two or three months. This, sir, is the nature of the necessity, and this the state of the Treasury. The embarrassment is accidental and temporary, occasioned by the legislation of Congress for the relief of the banks, by which the means in the Treasury have been postponed, and the premature return of the notes authorized to be issued by the October law, before the period of their redemption. The remedy proposed by the bill under consideration, is this; to authorize other notes to be issued, as the emergencies of the Treasury shall require, in the place of those which have been returned into the Treasury, before the period contemplated for their redemption—not exceeding the limits imposed by the act of October, as to the amount and time of issue. The relief will be immediate, and will create the debt only when necessary, and to the amount necessary.

To this bill, there are various objections urged; but nearly all of them are but iterations of those which were pressed at the extra session, against the original bill, to which this may be considered an amendment. They were then answered; but being of such a nature, I suppose, in the opinions of those who presented them, as to require repetition to ensure recollection—they are brought forward again; and to aid this very commendable design, it may not be improper, again, briefly to notice them.

First then: Treasury notes are unconstitutional, because they are bills of credit, and this Government has no right to issue bills of credit.

Mr. Chairman, I am a State Rights man. I am disposed to regard with great jealousy every power exercised by this Government; and to require, in every case, that it shall be shown, either by express grant, or by nesessary implication, that the power claimed is clearly given by the Constitution. Now, sir, the Government wants to borrow money, for some four or six months. I turn to the Constitution, and find no prohibition to this Government to "emit bills of credit," but the power "to borrow money" given, without any limitation or restriction as to the manner or form in which it shall be done. What is the meaning of borrowing money? Is it not getting money on your credit? The shape in which you put out your credit or promise to pay is perfectly immaterial. I hold in my hand a Treasury note, and a certificate of stock. To "borrow money" in the latter form, gentlemen say, is constitutional, in the former not. The Treasury note is a promise on the part of the United States to pay to B or his order a certain sum, one year from date, with six per cent. interest; the certificate of stock is a due bill, certifying that a certain sum is due by the United States to B, or his assigns, one year after date, bearing five per cent. interest. Now, sir, what is the difference between these two methods of borrowing money? Both are promises to pay, one year after date, at nearly the same rate of interest. Both are transferrable—the one by endorsment—the other by assignment, which may be in blank; and thus afford the same facilities for passing from hand to hand. There is, in fact, but one material difference between the two forms of loan, and that does not appear upon the face of either. The Treasury note may be received, according to a clause in the October law, in payment of public dues; and thus be redeemed before the expiration of the year. Yet even this peculiarity in these notes, is not uncommon in the issue of stock; which is often made redeemable at the will of the Government. But can the time or manner of redeeming the loan, in the least degree, affect the constitutional power of making it? If so, then the constitutionality of the form, depends upon the greater or less convenience of redeeming the loan. If the method is prompt and easy, as is provided with respect to these Treasury notes, it is unconstitutional, I suppose; if it is postponed, and rendered difficult, then it is constitutional. Nor can the interest to be paid, at all affect the constitutionality of the issue. If you have the power to "borrow money," it is your duty to the people, who must ultimately pay the debt by the sweat of their brows, to borrow it upon the cheapest terms possible. If from the abundance of capital, and the superior credit of the Government, and the uses to which this credit may be applied, you can borrow money at two or three per cent. interest, or at no interest at all, it is your duty to do it. The only question is, do you want money, and do you design to borrow it? The Constitution leaves the method absolutely at your own discretion and control.

My colleague has quoted the case of Craig vs. the State of Missouri, by which it has been determined by the Supreme Court of the United States, that a State cannot emit a bill of credit. Now, sir, suppose that there was in the Constitution, an express prohibition (which there is not) to the United States emitting bills of credit, as there is to the States; this case would not at all affect the measure before you? In that case, Chief Justice Marshall, in delivering the opinion of the court, (every Republican Judge upon the bench dissenting,) put the decision upon the fact, that the certificates of the State of Missouri were designed to be the currency of the country, and a substitute for the constitutional currency of gold and silver. Is that the case here? The Treasury notes authorized by the bill on your table are limited to the amount of $10,000,000. None can be issued after the first day of December next, when they are all redeemable; and when received into the Treasury cannot be reissued. Do these features show any design of furnishing a currency to the country, as a substitute for the constitutional currency, and make these notes "bills of credit," in the meaning of the Constitution? The word "emit," says the Judge, "is never employed in describing those contracts by which a State binds itself to pay money at a future day, for services actually received or for money borrowed; nor are such instruments bills of credit." Now, what are these Treasury notes, but "contracts for the payment of money at a future day for services actually received?" to pay your army—your navy—your civil and diplomatic officers—you, yourselves? What are they, but evidences of debt, for "money borrowed" to carry on the machinery of Government? Why, sir, it is most apparent, that even upon the authority of this case, every State in the Union, despite the express prohibition to "emit bills of credit," would be authorized to issue these notes. Our minds are sometimes like our eyesight, capable of seeing things only at very remote distances. Gentlemen who deny the constitutionality of these Treasury notes, yet maintain that Congress may establish a United States Bank; and either as part or the entire proprietor of the stock, through its instrumentality, issue such notes, to any amount, expressly designed to be currency. We have no right to issue these notes say these gentlemen, because they may enter into the currency; yet, under the power "to regulate commerce," they maintain that we have the power to supply a currency for the whole Union—and control and crush, if we please, all the banking institutions of the States. Thus it is, that things which are most obvious, are undiscerned, and the remotest inferences, and most metaphysical deductions, are apprehended with the clearest distinctness and conviction. During the whole period of the last war, Treasury notes were freely issued, in all respects, similar to those authorized by the bill. Mr. Dallas recommended them—Mr. Madison approved of them, and Cheves, Randolph, Clay, Lowndes, and Webster filled some of the seats we now occupy. To these men, the constitutional objection did not even occur.

The following table shows the issues:

1812—June 30. In Treasury notes bearing interest of 5 and 2-5th per cent. redeemable in one year -	$5,000,000
1833—Feb. 25. Same interest, redeemable in one year - -	10,000,000
3814—March, 4. Same interest, redeemable in one year - -	10,000,000
1814—Dec. 26. To be issued in lieu of that amount of loans heretofore authorized - - -	7,500,000
1814—Dec. 26. To be issued -	3,000,000
1815—Feb. 24. Do. do. -	25,000,000
	$60,500,0000

The next objection urged against the bill by my honorable colleague is, that by the issue of the Treasury notes it authorizes, a Government bank will be established. I cannot but suppose, Mr. Chairman, that my colleague, in making this objection must have misapprehended the provisions of the bill. He must have supposed, to justify any thing like an argument in support of such a position, that, both as to time and the amount of the issue, the bill is entirely unlimited. He cannot be aware, that no notes can be issued by its authority, after the first day of December next, when all are redeemable; and that the amount can at no time exceed ten millions of dollars. A bank without any capital, with a charter for six months! Surely the argument is answered by the statement of the facts.

It is said, however, that another form of borrowing is better. Go in at once for a regular loan on time, by issuing stock for some $10,000,000. That will be proper and constitutional, and will be doing the thing in a dignified manner. Now, Mr. Chairman, in the first place, no loan such as gentlemen propose for the time needed by the Government, can be negotiated in this country, in the present situation of the banks and the currency, unless the Government will receive the irredeemable paper of non-specie paying banks. If the object of gentlemen is to drive the Government into the arms of these banks, and to implicate it with the irredeemable currency of the country, for the support of the banks, certainly a loan in their paper will be a very good way to accomplish the object, and place the Government in their power. But if the loan is to be negotiated in specie, or the notes of specie paying banks, it cannot be done. Would any such bank or banks, in the doubtful position in which they are now placed, venture to take a loan of ten, or even five millions of dollars, at the rate of five per cent. and pay for it in specie, or by an issue of their notes? Would individual capitalists do it? They could scarcely obtain the notes of specie paying banks, or specie, with which to carry the loan into effect. There are now, I am told, not more than nine millions of specie in New York, and but little more than half of that amount of the notes of their banks in circulation. But could the capitalists or the banks easily obtain the means, what inducement would there be to take a loan for six months, which the wants of the Treasury only require? What compensation would there be in an investment for so short a time, to induce the capitalist to call in his bonds and mortgages, and sell his stock or real estate? The same obstacle exists to the sale in this country of the bonds of the United States, due to the Government. These bonds are of $2,000,000 each; one payable within six months, and the other the year after. Suppose, however, that the loan could be effected in New York; how do gentlemen reconcile this operation with their tender professions of an exclusive regard for the welfare of the banks? There would be created an immediate demand upon the banks of New York for $10,000,000 in specie, or their notes, convertible into specie. Do gentlemen want another crash—another stoppage of specie payments, upon which new changes may be rung of the hostility of the Government, and their own entire devotion to the banking institutions of the country? A loan ought not to be effected in the present situation of the banks. It cannot be effected, unless made upon time; redeemable in some five or ten years. Gentlemen from the North may go for such a measure. They desire a debt upon the country; and the greater, and the longer continued, the better for them. But how will gentlemen from the South reconcile this policy with their views of duty? To place a permanent debt upon the country of $10,000,000, to meet an emergency of but six months' necessity. My colleague proposes, however, that the loan should be negotiated in Europe, and the amount brought back in specie. But this, sir, would be postponing the cure until the patient is dead. The wants of the Treasury are now, at the present time, chiefly within the next two or three months. Long before the loan could be negotiated in Europe, and the avails be returned, the Government will be bankrupt and disgraced—its faith and its engagements dishonored. If the relief could be postponed for six months, why not authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to recall back a portion of the amount deposited with the States? That would be a far more Southern measure; for then the amount contributed would be, as it was deposited, upon the principle of direct taxation; and the South would not be compelled, through indirect taxation by duties on importations, to pay a disproportionate share of the contribution. But the most remarkable part of my colleague's proposition is that the loan, when negotiated in Europe, should be brought back to this country in specie. He has just made a most elaborate argument to show that every importation of specie from Europe must necessarily depress the price of our cotton. To him the importation or the existence of specie in the country brings no satisfaction, because it is at the expense of our great staple, and consequently injurious to the South. Well, sir, under the increased abstraction of specie from Europe, which his operation will occasion, what will become of our cotton, declined and now declining in Liverpool? If his argument is good, his whole plan of relief will operate as a double injury to the South; it will establish a debt, and depress the price of our cotton. The veins and arteries will be opened at the same time. Sir, my friend's project for relief will not do. The other projects for a loan will not do. We must pass this bill, or disgrace and dishonor the country. If this measure stood alone on its own merits, gentlemen know that it would pass this House with scarcely a dissenting voice. Although the necessities of the Treasury are far greater and more immediate than at the extra session, many gentlemen who then supported the Treasury bill to which this is an amendment, oppose now most bitterly this measure. Why this change? Why the combination, so obvious to the least observant, to defeat the bill? It is, sir, because gentlemen connect this measure with the Government, and the Government with the great financial and political contest now waging in the country. In ordinary times, with $28,000,000 on deposite with the States, and $15,000,000 due the Government by the banks and individuals, one-half of which will come into the Treasury within the next six months, no man would think of denying to the Government the use of its own credit for a few months, in a form sanctioned by unbroken usage, at the only period the necessities of the country required its use. No one, for such an emergency, would think of proposing impracticable methods of relief to the Government; and useless, if practicable. The idea would be spurned, that any triumph of party, or measure of policy, could compensate the country for the degradation and dishonor which would attend a violation of its faith and engagements. But unfortunately, sir, the country is divided—this House is divided, upon the great issue which the president of the Pennsylvania Bank of the United States, on the part of the banks, has presented to the country. The Government and the banks, he says, are in the field face to face, and one or the other must be driven from it: My colleague utters the same opinion, and says that "a mortal conflict is now waging between the Government and the banks." I do not admit that any such contest exists in the Southern States; and especially on the part of the banks of that State which I, in part, represent. In that quarter of the Union, the banks have the good sense to perceive that, if united to the Government, the banks will soon become the Government, or the Government the banks. Patriotism and interest, therefore, in their estimation, alike dictate an entire separation of the Government from the banking institutions of the country. But, sir, I agree with my friend that such a conflict does exist in another part of the country. I deny, however, that this Government has made or seeks the contest; or has placed itself in the field against the banks. On the contrary, if facts can show any thing, they all show, if fairly viewed, that so far as the present Government is concerned, it has neither sought any contest, nor evinced any hostility, to the banks of the country. Suppose, sir, that the Specie Circular was a cause of embarrassment to the banks—did the Government do more than it had a right to do with respect to its own property? Had it not a right to sell or not to sell its own lands, and to dictate the terms on which it would sell them? Admit that the deposite of the surplus revenue with the States was clumsily executed—were the banks, in that operation, required to do more than they had engaged to perform? Did they not, for compensation received, of their own accord, agree to do what was required of them? and will any man seriously assert, or expect others to believe, that these measures originated in hostility to the banks? and that implicated, as the Government was, with millions on deposite with the banks—committed, as it was, against the re-establishment of an United States Bank, contrary to every principle of duty or common sense, it would seek a contest in which it had nothing to gain, and every thing to fear, from the combination of the banks and capitalists against its measures and power? Even the corporation bankrupt law, so much declaimed against, suggested by the President of the United States, but which received no support in this House, meditated no hostility to banks; but was only intended to apply to those banks which should cease to be banks, by becoming insolvent. Sir, it is a truth unquestionable, that if the banks had fulfilled their own promises and engagements, the idea that this Government had warred upon them never would have been raised; and if they have not been able to meet their engagements, in their too eager pursuit of gain, who is to blame but themselves? The Government did not control their issues, nor has it taken away any of their means to meet them. On the contrary, since their suspension of specie payments, what indulgence has been refused on the part of the Government, that their warmest friends have required, consistent with the laws and the safety of the revenue? What functionary of the Government—what member on this floor, or in the other wing of the Capitol, has expressed any hostility to these institutions? The real ground for offence—the whole war—exists in the proposition to separate the Government from all connection with the banks. The banks do not like the separation; and, because it is proposed by the Government, they declare that it is war. To have nothing to do with them, and to leave them unmolested in the full enjoyment of all their chartered privileges, is atrocious hostility.

To avoid them—to fly away from their agency or assistance, is to make a "mortal conflict" with them. The Government only asks what the humblest citizen has a right to require, that it should be let alone, to manage its own fiscal affairs in its own way; but the banks and the capitalists will not let it alone. They insist that they shall be taken into the Government, and participate in managing its revenues; and, because the Government declines their intervention or co-operation, they proclaim that they and the Government are in the field, face to face, and that one or the other must perish. Whilst hypocritically crying out that they are pursued, they are, in fact, in combination with the great Federal party of the country, hunting down the Government, and storming the battlements of the Constitution for its overthrow. Sir, although distress brings confusion, and, in times of trouble, the people are most liable to be deceived, it will be impossible to conceal from them the true issue forced upon the country, according to the vaunting declarations of the banks themselves. It is a contest between the banks and the Government—the capitalists and the people. The Government, and the people to whom the Government belongs, are on the defensive, and, I trust, they will calmly and immovably remain so. The demands on the one side are another United States Bank, capable of controlling the whole currency of the country—or a reconnection of the Government with the State banks. On the other side, it is insisted that the Government has no more right to connect itself with banks than with individuals; and that an absolute and entire separation from them is its right and duty. Such are the measures of the assailants and the assailed.

To divert attention from their own aggressions and designs, it has been urged by the banks, that by the Government separating itself from all banks, two covert measures of hostility are meditated. By receiving in payment of the public dues nothing but specie or its own paper, it is designed to bring the whole currency of the country to gold and silver, and thus dispense with all bank paper; and secondly, by using its own paper, it is intended to supply a paper currency on the part of the Government for the whole country, and thus destroy all bank paper. Neither of these assertions have any foundation in fact; and are, in truth, inconsistent and antagonistical to each other. If the Government should issue a paper currency, which should be a substitute for all the bank paper in circulation, how would the circulation be a mere metallic circulation? And if the country is reduced to a mere metallic circulation, how could a Government paper currency be in circulation? My colleague has dwelt upon both of these points. He has gone elaborately into statistics to show how impracticable for the uses of the country would be a currency of gold and silver without any paper, in the form of credit, in circulation. Sir, he should have first shown, that receiving specie in payment of the public dues by the Government, would have the effect of destroying all the solvent banks in the country, abolishing all credit, and reducing the currency to nothing but gold and silver. According to the most liberal calculation, the Treasury, under such a policy, will not require more than ten millions of specie to carry on its operations; and this, according to the plan proposed by its friends, will be gradually drawn, in a series of years, from the metallic supply of the whole world; whilst there is in the United States alone, at the present time, not less than eighty millions of dollars. To argue gravely that such a cause can produce such an effect, and that, by the employment of ten millions of specie, the Government designs forcing upon the country the use of no other curreney than gold and silver, and the prostration of the banks and all credit, is as poor a compliment to the sagacity of the Government as it is to the intelligence of the people. Sir, I have never yet met the man, either in or out of Congress, who has ever maintained the propriety or possibility of reducing this great and enterprising country to a mere hard money currency. If you were to abolish to-morrow every bank in the land, paper credit, in the shape of the notes of individuals or some other form, would crowd into your circulation. Is it not remarkable, that gentlemen should be so eager to attack what nobody defends? They stuff up a man of straw, and then show their dexterity in shooting it down. And that other diversion from the true issue before the country—that the Government designs to establish a Government bank, and to destroy the State banks by a substitution of its paper in the place of theirs. Where is the proof of any such design? In the destitution of facts, even the paltry and carefully restricted issue of Treasury notes authorized by the bill before you, has been relied on to make out the charge. In another part of this building the same charge has been made, because the Government proposes to do what it has done ever since it was established—draw upon its own funds—a privilege undenied to the humblest citizen of the country. The only measure which gives the least semblance to any such design, was a measure proposed, not by the Goverument, but by myself, at the extra session of Congress, and voted down by a large majority—that bills receivable in payment of the public dues should be issued instead of Treasury notes. But this measure was intended to be confined strictly within the wants and operations of the Government. There was no assigned capital —no discounting of notes, or dealing with individuals, proposed. Sir, neither the banks, nor the capitalists of the country, believe that any hostile designs exist towards them on the part of those who oppose their association with the Government, or refuse to bend it before their ambitious and selfish pretensions. We intend to maintain the banking institutions of the States, in all their powers and privileges, with as much fidelity and energy as they can evince. These are mere tubs to the whale—mere pretexts to divert the attention of the people from their true designs. The know that the banks rest in security, beneath the protection of the State sovereignties who created them, and to whom alone they are responsible. They know that there are not twenty men on this floor, who would consent that this Government should touch, much less destroy them; and that those who are most strenuous for the separation of the Government from all banks, oppose the re-establishment of an United States Bank, (their panacea for all the ills of the currency,) expressly upon the ground, that this Government has no right, by the establishment of such an institution, to enter the States, and cripple or crush the banking institutions they have established. Not then, upon policy only, but upon constitutional principles, we are necessarily the fast friends of the banks of the States. Sir, the capitalists are in no delusion as to this matter. These pretexts are but feints in the battle, to disguise the true point of attack. If they can succeed in making the people believe that they are the party wronged—that the Government, and not their own imprudence and weakness, caused them to fail in redeeming their promises, and that it is now seeking their destruction; why then, the more confusion and distress to the people, the greater the odium to the Government, and the more power they will possess of accomplishing their design of controlling its action, and making it contributary to their credit and aggrandizement. Hence, the violent and sudden contractions and expansions in the currency a few years since, by which thousands were injured or ruined. Hence, the innumerable suits which crowd the courts of the country on the part of the banks, whilst refusing to meet their own promises to pay. Hence, the refusal lately to resume specie payments. Through the agitations of distress, and the mists of tears, the people are to be confounded and blinded, and the Government is to be struck down and throttled beneath the gripe of monopolists and money changers. The last blow—the "crowning mercy," may be the measure alluded to by my honorable colleague—"stopping the supplies" to the Government—destroying the bill upon your table, without any adequate substitute to meet the wants of the Government. "If ever there was a time," he says, "when this old method, common with our English ancestors, of redressing the rights of the people against their Government, was justifiable, it was now."

[Mr. THOMPSON rose and said, that he did not recommend such a measure, or say that he would vote for it; on the contrary, he had declared his willingness to vote for a loan or any other constitutional method of supply.]†

I have stated, Mr. Chairman, the words of my colleague as I understood him to utter them, and my statement is not incompatible with what he says. I know that he did suggest a method of supply, in connection with his remarks—a loan in Europe—for which he said he would vote, but which he expressly declared at the same time he should not propose. This scheme I have already considered, and have shown, I think, that it will not answer the emergency of the Treasury; but if adopted, would, in fact, be "stopping the supplies." Let it be, sir, that my friend has merely hinted at this grand remedy. It is followed up by a proposition of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. HOPKINS,] for another form of supply, who declares at the time, that he shall not vote for his own proposition.* The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BELL] proposes another form, but he does not say that he will vote for it. Mr. Chairman, I trust that I mistake these intimations, and that gentlemen do not intend to carry them into effect. Is it come to this, that for usurping power or aggressing upon the rights of the citizens, but because the Government will not act—will not unite itself to banks—will not usurp a power (establishing a United States Bank) questioned from the very first origin of the Government—that it is to be violently suspended and overthrown? No one can doubt our control over the supplies. It is absolute—unlimited. But to stop them, is a revolutionary measure, justifiable only when we are prepared to dissolve the Government; throw away the shield of the Constitution and the laws—and reconstruct from the entangled elements of society, a new political fabric. I call upon gentlemen to look to the consequences boldly, before they trifle with them. Neither your civil nor military dependants are bound to serve you without bread or pay. Your army—your navy—your Judicial and Executive officers all over the land, will have a right to disband and leave your service. Suspend for a single day the laws and the Constitution of the country—and when, and where may it end? Let the spirit of anarchy and lawlessness at a time like the present, full of confusion and distress, of violent political agitation and fierce contention for power, once lift its hydra head in our land—and who shall strangle it? Sir, I bid gentlemen beware. They may sow to the wind, and reap the whirlwind. I am a friend to the banks, although no apologist for their abuses. I can be no enemy to the capitalist, for I own property; and hold that its accumulation is the necessary fruit and reward of civilization itself; but if they, in conjunction with the great Federal party to which they are allied, shall make this experiment upon the patience and patriotism of the people, their madness will be their ruin. Banks and capitalists are the natural allies to Government. They are the creations of law, and essentially depend on its steady and certain administration for their support. Credit is a delicate plant, often of slow growth, and can only live in the sunshine or peace, and the calm of confidence. Forgetful or regardless of their true nature and policy, for the first time in the history of the world, the banks of the country are arrayed against the Government; and the path of revolution is pointed to as the triumphant road in which they are to tread to power. Sir, let them enter it, and their ruin will be inevitable. The very first victims to lawless popular fury, may be those who shall have created, excited, and dared it; and even that marble palace, with its

*Mr. Hopkins in the debate subsequently declared, that he would vote for no supplies, until their custody was properly provided for, by new legislation. He had just proposed as an amendment to the Treasury bill, Mr. Rives's bill uniting the Government to a league of twenty-five State banks. Mr. Randolph of New Jersey, in the course of the debate expressed also the opinion that the abuses of the Government justified the House in "stopping the supplies."

splendid halls and lofty colonades, towering in all the pride and glory of classic architecture, may not be too high for the grasp of the people's rage. Over deeper, wider foundations, planted as they may have been firmly in the affections and interests of the people, the ploughshare of ruin has been ruthlessly driven.

Mr. Chairman, this method of embarrassing the Government, by "stopping the supplies," is not new even in the history of this country. It was tried during the last war, and we all know the result. The supplies were opposed by a certain party in this country within these walls; and, out of this House, after the supplies were voted, the same party did all in their power to defeat the Government in negotiating its loans to carry on the war. I do not intend, sir, to indulge in indiscrimate condemnation of the motives, although I do not approve of the conduct of this party. Many of them, I have no doubt, believe that their course was justifiable, upon the highest principles of policy. Their error was in acting upon the fear of speculative evils, instead of doing their immediate duty. At that time England was battling, not only for her own existence, but for the independence of all the nations of the earth. We had undoubtedly, the best and highest causes for war—but they might have supposed that success in such a contest might have been our ruin; and that if England was overthrown, our liberties and independence would perish with her. But they opposed their country in favor of a foreign enemy. Instead of rallying to the support of the Government, at a time of great danger and difficulty, they endeavored to paralize, embarrass, and overthrow it. Sir, what was their fate? The war rolled on—triumphantly rolled on—borne up by the patriotism of the people, responding to that lofty sentiment of him, whose brow in life wore the laurel of the hero, and whose memory should live forever embalmed in the lays of the minstrel—"our country right or wrong." Where are those who were for "stopping the supplies" during the war? Sunk forever into privacy, suspicion, and contempt! And so it will ever be. The Government might be weak or wrong; but the people will not stand passively by, and see it beaten down by a foreign enemy; nor will they now permit it to be appropriated and prostrated by the banks and capitalists of the country. Why, if we are to have masters, let them at least be those whom we can respect or fear. Let there be one battle-field at least, which can tell to after-times that one brave and mighty effort was made for our liberties: but to be overcome, not by the power of the sword, but by the influence of money—to give up the Government and Constitution of the country by the base instrumentality of colored votes, or distress wrung from the poor, or the terrors of anarchy—Sir, it will not be. The people—the people will come to the rescue. Although surrounded by mists and darkness, and drugged with distress, they will ere long awake; and rising up in the majesty of truth and justice, they will snap asunder the chains which ambition and avarice have forged for their ruin. They will soon perceive, from the principles and parties involved, that the disgrace of the Government in this contest will be their infamy—its fall, their overthrow: and that noble patriotism which, during the last war on land and sea, rallied to its support, will once more come forth in all its majestic power, and march on to victory. And in this mighty struggle where, sir, shall each of us be found? My position, at least, shall be in the van. If this Administration had continued in its strength, approving as I do nearly all of its measures, since I have been upon this floor, I should have been content to stand aloof, as I have heretofore done, and see it go on in its career of constitutional usefulness and duty; but the more it has fallen, the nearer I have found myself to its destinies; and now, if it is to fall in maintenance of the great financial measures, upon which I believe it has staked its existence, I am willing, I am ready, to go down with it. Better to fall with those who fall in defence of the Constitution and liberties of the country, than triumph with those whose victory, in my opinion, will be their prostration.

Mr. Chairman, our duty, on the present occasion, appears to me to require us to pass the bill before the committee as soon as possible. The necessities of the Government cannot be postponed. Let those who agree in this opinion determine to occasion as little delay as possible, by discussing the measure, and be ever ready to vote upon it. If those who oppose the bill think proper to consume time in discussion, and thus postpone relief to the Government, let them do it—on them be the responsibility. If they think proper to defeat the bill without any efficient substitute, let them do it. On them be the responsibility.

NORTHEASTERN BOUNDARY.

REMARKS OF MR. FAIRFIELD,
OF MAINE,

In the House of Representatives, May 29, 1838—The question being on the motion of Mr. EVANS, to refer the message of the President relating to the Northeastern Boundary to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. FAIRFIELD said, that as he and his colleague, who had just taken his seat, [Mr. EVANS,] had the same object in view in regard to the settlement of the disputed boundary line, he was happy to be able to say, that in the justness of many of the remarks of his colleague he entirely concurred. In regard, however, to the nature and proper construction of the proposition of this Government to the British Government, as contained in the letter of Mr. Forsyth to Mr. Fox, under date of the 27th of April last, he felt constrained to differ with him. But whichever was right in this respect, he agreed with his colleague in doubting whether any thing would come of it, even if accepted by the British Government. It might, he thought, reasonably be feared, that it would only be productive of delay and vexation. That, after years had been frittered away in prosecuting the object of the commission, we should find ourselves where we were at the beginning, no nearer to a determination of this long pending controversy, and Great Britain, in the mean time, enjoying most of the fruits of ownership. But the proposition—what is it? My colleague understands it as expressing a willingness, on the part of this Government, to authorize the exploration and survey, upon the terms suggested by the British Government, as their modifications of the original American proposition. He (Mr. F.) could not so regard it; but, on the contrary, simply as a proposition to open a negotiation upon that basis. The language of Mr. Forsyth is as follows: "By the accompanying papers, received from the Executive of Maine, Mr. Fox will perceive that Maine declines to give a consent to the negotiation for a conventional boundary; is disinclined to the reference of the points in dispute to a new arbitration; but is yet firmly persuaded that the line described in the treaty of 1783 can be found and traced whenever the Governments of the United States and Great Britain shall proceed to make the requisite investigations, with a predisposition to effect that very desirable object. Confidently relying, as the President does, upon the assurances frequently repeated by the British Government, of the earnest desire to reach that result, if it is practicable, he has instructed the undersigned to announce to Mr. Fox the willingness of this Government to enter into an arrangement with Great Britain for the establishment of a joint commission of survey and exploration, upon the basis of the original American proposition, and the modifications offered by her Majesty's Government." And he thereupon invites Mr. Fox to a conference upon the subject at an early day.

Now, though he (Mr. F.) did not profess to be at all familiar with the language and technicalities of diplomacy, yet he could not think that any thing more was intended by this than an offer to negotiate an agreement in which the terms of such agreement were all open for discussion and determination. The original American proposition and the modifications thereof suggested by the British Government, were to form the basis of the negotiation, and were not absolutely and unconditionally to be incorporated into the agreement itself.

One of the modifications of our original proposition was, that the commissioner should have the right to diverge westerly from a due north line in search of "highlands," and not easterly. Another was, that they should run from the source of the St. Croix to highlands that both parties would agree were the highlands named in the treaty. This would give to Great Britain much more than she has now the hardihood to claim directly, for the point of highlands which both would agree were the highlands of the treaty would extend but a short distance northerly of the head of Connecticut river. Neither of these can Mr. Forsyth be considered as assenting to; indeed, the terms of his letter would seem almost necessarily to exclude them; for an agreement to the effect of either proposition might, perhaps, be regarded as virtually assenting to a conventional line, which the General Government have again and again admitted they had no right to do. And Sir Charles R. Vaughan, in his letter to Mr. McLane, February 10, 1834, takes the same view of the nature of such an agreement; and, therefore, insists that Maine should be a party to it. Mr. Forsyth then, in a letter, in which he was communicating the decision of the State of Maine against investing the General Government with power to agree to a conventional line, and acknowledging her authority in that respect, could not fairly be considered, in whatever language he may have expressed himself, as indirectly agreeing to any such line, or to an arrangement necessarily involving it.

Our original proposition was for the establishment of a joint commission of survey, with power to decide and settle the question conclusively. The proposition of the British Government was to have such a commission of survey merely by way of experiment, to ascertain facts, but without the power of binding the parties. These are the propositions which are to constitute the elements of the agreement now proposed.

But to settle this question of construction conclusively, and not to leave it to the determination of general reasoning, Mr. F. said he would ask leave to read a letter from Mr. Forsyth to one of the Senators from Maine. This Senator, understanding that different opinions were entertained as to the extent and design of the proposition of this Government to the British Government, addressed a letter to Mr. Forsyth, asking for an explanation of it; in answer to which he received the following:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
May 26, 1838.

SIR: I have had the honor to receive your letter of the 24th inst. and to state in reply, that from the negotiation to which the British Government has been invited, the President anticipates the establishment of a joint commission with an umpire whose power will be restricted to the purposes of exploration and survey only, without authority finally to decide upon the rights of the parties, as contemplated in the original American proposition. The suggestions that have been made on either side with respect to the mode of constituting that commission, the principles upon which it is to act, and the instructions to be given it, are all to be discussed and decided upon as justice between the parties and their respective rights shall be deemed to require. The object of the President in offering to make such an arrangement, as you will see by my note to Mr. Fox of the 27th April last, is to test the correctness of the opinion of the State of Maine, "that the line described in the treaty of 1783 can be found and traced whenever the Governments of the United States and Great Britain shall proceed to make the requisite investigation, with a predisposition to effect the desired object.

I have the honor to be, sir,
Your obedient servant,
JOHN FORSYTH.

To the Hon. REUEL WILLIAMS,
United States Senate.

This appeared to him (Mr. F.) as conclusive upon the subject, and showed that his colleague had misconceived the true meaning and import of the proposition, at which, it is believed, he will be much better pleased than he would have been to have had his views upon the subject confirmed.

But as to the original American proposition referred to in the letter of Mr. Forsyth, is it not equally clear that, in that also, my colleague is mistaken. That proposition is contained in the letter of Mr. Livingston to Sir Charles R. Vaughn, April 30, 1833, and is in the following words: "All the disadvantages of these modes of settlement, heretofore adopted, might, as it appears to the American Government, be avoided by appointing a new commission, consisting of an equal number of commissioners, with an umpire selected by some friendly sovereign, from the most skilful men in Europe, to decide on all points in which they disagree; or, by a commission composed entirely of such men, so selected, to be attended in the survey and view of the country by agents appointed by the parties." This is what is called "the original American proposition;" and is that alluded to by Gov. Kent in his message to the Legislature as a proposition equitable and fair, just to all parties, and full of promise of adjustment upon proceedings satisfactory to us. Subsequently, to be sure, Mr. Livingston speaks of certain well known principles which are observed in the running of boundaries, one of which is, that courses and distances should be controlled by monuments. But this is no part of the original proposition. They are entirely distinct and independent. One is the proposed agreement, the other is stated as an inducement to Great Britain to enter into the agreement.

The correctness of this, as an abstract proposition, Mr. F. said he presumed no one was disposed to question, though many doubted its applicability to a case of this sort, considering the direction in the treaty as equivalent to one for running to a line of latitude.

The further suggestions made by Mr. Livingston in subsequent letters, intimating that the commissioners might diverge to the west, and not to the east, of the due north line, in order to reach the highlands named in the treaty, were for the same purpose, to wit: to induce Great Britain to agree to the establishment of the commission of su vey, by showing her how she might possibly be a gainer by it. That suggestion, however, was not well founded in law or justice, and can never command the assent of Maine. But it did not constitute a part of the original American proposition; and therefore, no reference was had to it by Mr. Forsyth, in his late letter to Mr. Fox.

In closing, Mr. F. said he would repeat that however the proposition may be construed, he did not believe that, accepted or not, we should thereby make any progress towards a final determination of the question. The only effectual step now to be taken, was the passage of the bill lying upon the table; and he united with his colleague in hoping that the House would soon take it up, and give it all that consideration which its importance demands, and which the obligations of this Government to the State of Maine imperatively require.

BRANCH BANK, U. S. PORTSMOUTH, N. H.

REMARKS OF MR. CUSHMAN, OF NEW HAMPSH

In the House of Representatives, Tuesday, May 15, 1838—The Treasury note bill being under consideration.

Mr. CUSHMAN said he was unwilling to interrupt the public business for one moment, with any remarks of his, but as the gentleman from Rhode Island, [Mr. TILLINGHAST,] had thought proper to introduce into this debate a transaction which took place in the town in which he had the honor to reside, and one in which he participated, it was due to himself, as well as all others connected with that transaction, and the cause of truth and justice, that a plain and unvarnished statement of fasts should be made, and for this purpose he would, for a short time, claim the attention of the House. That gentleman has remarked the first difficulty to his knowledge, with the Bank of the United States, commenced in New Hampshire, in the attempt to remove the president of the branch which was established in that State. From that fact, he has taken the liberty to infer that the friends of the late, as well as of the present Administration, have manifested a deadly hostility, not only to that bank, but to all the banking institutions in the country.

Similar charges have been made, not only in this House, and in the other branch of Congress, but have been repeated over and over again, by every travelling politician, who has scoured the country, for political effect, from the time the transaction took place to the present moment.

Some have been so wild as to say, "that the attack made upon the President of that branch was done to induce the Bank to favor the designs of the Administration; and failing to induce the Bank to subserve the interests of the friends of the Administration, the whole power thereof was at once set in hostile array against that institution." A more unfounded charge could not be conceived. It has not even the shade of a shadow upon which to rest itself. This will appear from a plain, unvarnished, statement of facts. These facts are as follows: Some time in the spring of the year 1829 the merchants of Portsmouth conceiving themselves aggrieved by the course which had been pursued by the gentleman who had been, but a short time before, placed at the head of that Branch, memorialized the directors of the parent Bank to have that gentleman removed, and some other one appointed in his place. The principal allegations stated in the memorial against the directory of that branch were, as far as my memory serves me, that their measures were unnecessarily harsh and oppressive, and the want of a proper spirit of accommodation.

One sample of unnecessary harshness, about which much, at that time, was said, was an edict that all the debtors should pay to the bank twenty per cent. upon their notes every sixty days, when the loans had been made under an express or implied understanding that only ten per cent. should be paid at the end of every four months. And the merchants saw, or at any rate thought they saw, under the order of things, as they then existed, nothing but distress and ruin. It was under these circumstances that the directors of the parent Bank were requested to make such a change in the directory of that branch as would not only stay the hand of oppression, but restore confidence between the bank and the business-men of that place. The foundation of the memorial seemed to be the mutual benefit and accommodation of all concerned. Not only to aid those who were actively engaged in business, but to promote the interests of the bank itself. This fact no one would deny who was acquainted with the merchants whose names are attached to that memorial.

Now, sir, let us turn our attention to the political character of the memorialists, because upon this fact depends the issue. What was it? Were they, sir, the friends of that illustrious patriot and statesman, General Jackson, who but a short time previous had been elected the Chief Magistrate of the United States? Did they, in general, belong to the Democratic party? If they did, then there might have been some faint pretext for the allegations which have been made by our political opponents. But such were not the facts. No, sir, but far otherwise. That memorial was signed by about sixty individuals, the most of whom were merchants, and nine-tenths of whom then were and now are the political friends of the distinguished gentleman who was at the head of that branch, and from whose arbitrary administration they wished to be relieved; and a majority of the board of directors, which the memorialists proposed to substitute for the one then in existence, were the political friends of that gentleman, and were then, as well as at the present time, the friends of that institution.

Some of those who took a part in that transaction were members of the Democratic party, and were among the most firm and sincere friends of General Jackson.

Among that number was the present Secretary of the Treasury, the present Chief Magistrate of New Hampshire, and the humble individual who now has the honor of addressing you. But, sir, were either of those gentlemen, or any other friend of the Administration, the first to move in that affair? No, sir: those gentlemen only operated as they were operated upon by the political friends of those connected with the bank.

As to myself, I can assure this House, as well as the country, that it was with great reluctance that I took any part in that transaction. Although the gentleman at the head of that branch was opposed to me in politics, yet he did not cross my path. I had, therefore, no feelings of jealously to gratify, and, on my own account, I had never had any thing to do with that institution; and, moreover, had no desire to be connected therewith; and it was not until after a powerful appeal had been made to me by those merchants, that I gave my consent to aid them in removing the grievances of which they complained; and I believe the same was the case with Mr. Woodbury. He could have desired no aid from the bank; and as a majority of the proposed board of directors were strongly opposed to him in politics, he could have had no expectation of benefiting either his private or political interests. I have never entertained a doubt that his sole object was to promote the interests of the above mentioned memorialists; and for this purpose, and this purpose alone, did he consent to participate in that transaction.

As to Governor Hill, he was entirely ignorant of the whole subject until he received a letter from me relative to what had transpired in Portsmouth. On reception of that letter, in which were expressed the wishes, views, and desires of the merchants of Portsmouth, that gentleman, who is ever ready to relieve the distressed, and to do all the good in his power, drew up a memorial similar to the one which had been signed at Portsmouth, to which he procured the signatures of several members of the New Hampshire Legislature, which was then in session, and then forwarded the same to the parent Bank at Philadelphia, whither the other had been transmitted.

What followed the presentation of these memorials is, I presume, too well known to require comment. Suffice it to say, that although the request of the memorialists was not granted, and the gentleman whose conduct has been complained of, was reappointed to the same office for the succeeding year; yet before that year had expired, he left not only the bank, but the State. And the memorialists have the consolation of knowing that the representations which they then made to the directors of the parent Bank were true, and that the subsequent history of that branch verified every material fact which was set forth in those memorials.

Now, sir, inasmuch as those gentlemen who originated and sustained those memorials, were the political friends of the president of that branch, who then were, and now are, the open and avowed advocates of a United States Bank, I ask every fair and candid mind if there is the slightest foundation for the charges which have so often been made against those who participated in that transaction? I am confident the answer must be in the negative.

BANK OF WASHINGTON, D. C.

REMARKS OF MR. DAVIS, OF MASSACHUSETTS,

In Senate, May 17, 1838—On the bill for rechartering the District banks.

Mr. DAVIS remarked, that he had risen chiefly to correct an error. He had been informed that an expression which fell from him the other day, in the debate respecting the banks of this District, had been misunderstood. He had expressed some surprise that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] should condemn the Bank of Washington, because it paid specie for its bills, and gave him to understand it was difficult to please one who was neither satisfied with nor without a redemption of notes in specie. The Senator said this did not do justice to his views; for he complained that the bank did not put out its bills, and therefore had nothing to redeem; and its declaration was mere pretension. Mr. D. in reply, said he well knew that, so far as regarded active banking business, it was substantially a humbug. By the use of this phrase, it had been supposed that he concurred with the Senator in condemning the course of the bank. Nothing could be farther from the truth; and he thought he explained himself so fully at the time, that no one could misapprehend him, for he affirmed that the bank did all it could do. It was its duty to redeem its bills, and it had done so. This was just as it should be. But he added further that, in the existing state of things, no bank, pursuing this course, could keep its bills out, for paper was less valuable than specie by several per cent. The Bank of Washington could not, therefore, safely issue a dollar of its paper unless it had on hand a dollar of specie to redeem it. No bank could do business in that way without loss; for if as much money must lie idle in the vaults as is equal to all its bills afloat, the loss of interest is exactly equal to the gain, and nothing is left to indemnify for risk or to defray expenses. The Bank of Washington had not, therefore, kept out its bills because it could not work impossibilities; and, moreover, it was difficult to see how one as zealous for a specie circulation as the Senator could be anxious to have a bank withdraw it from circulation to give the public only dollar for dollar in paper. With his views, one would think it better to leave the specie afloat than to make this substitution of paper. All this he had said in substance, and supposed of course every one would understand what he meant by humbug: namely, that payment of specie was, under such circumstances, merely nominal, as the bank could not do business.

Now that he was up, he would add a few words more in regard to this bank, for he thought remarks unjust in their character had been made in relation to it. Its embarrassments in 1834 had been adverted to with great disapprobation, and urged as a reason for withholding confidence from it, and refusing to renew its charter. It was true it had been embarrassed, but he thought even that could be explained without leaving upon the corporation any stain of dishonorable reproach. He would, however, content himself with looking at its subsequent conduct, and see whether it afforded evidence, that if it possessed the public confidence, and whether it had given proof of a design rather to stand fair with the public than to make money. It had made no dividends for five years, not a farthing had the stockholders received during that time, but it had been sedulously employed in reparing and restoring its credit. It then had $21,000 of deposites; it now has $372,000, an amount, actually greater than its capital. He had before him a statement of its affairs then and now, both as to its liabilities and resources, by which it was most manifest, that by prudence and economy it had repaired its losses, and had justly entitled itself to the high confidence of the public which it now possessed.

It was the last among the banks to suspend payments, having redeemed over $40,000 of its circulation before it yielded to the pressure of the times. At the moment of suspension it had about $43,000 of bills in circulation. This event occurred in May, 1837; and in August following, it resumed the redemption of its bills in gold and silver, having suspended for about three months; and, sir, there is a striking fact connected with this, illustrative of the great confidence felt in the ability of the bank. During this period of three months, it went on like other banks, receiving its bills in payment of debts, on deposit, and in exchange for the bills of other banks. And how much of their circulation, think you, came in? Did the holders of bills rush upon them? Could those who owed the bank buy them up at a heavy discount, and thus pay their debts? All it was able to collect in during that time amounted to about $8,000, leaving in circulation, when it resumed, over $35,000, which has since been reduced to $13,000, or to a nominal sum; for it is probable most of this will never return.

Is not this a triumphant refutation of all the slanders about its having defrauded the public? Has it not forsaken its own immediate interest, and sacrificed all present advantages to the stockholders, to strengthen itself? Has it not promptly met its liabilities? What has it omitted to do which it ought to have done, or what has it done that it ought not to do? If any institution can present itself with clean hands, does not this do it? If any institution can atone for losses or errors in business, has not his done it? It stands in no shape wrong, unless we exact impossibilities. Mr. D. said, having now done this act of justice to the Bank of Washington and its officers, he would notice some misapprehensions which gentlemen labored under respecting the banks in Massachusetts. He then proceeded to show that, from the manner of conducting business in that State, the banks were necessarily made the collectors of the bills of each other, and, when thus collected in, they were withdrawn from circulation and exchanged, so that the circulation on paper always appeared much larger than it really was, for the bills thus held might, on an average, be considered as cancelling each other in the different banks. He then proceeded to prove, from the returns taken in this view, as compared with other States, that the banks of that State were in a condition beyond distrust; and he believed that no bank could comply with the laws of Massachusetts and fail to be sound. The system was guarded with great caution, but frauds would sometimes occur.

REMOVAL OF THE TREASURY BUILDING.

SPEECH OF MR. LINCOLN,
OF MASSACHUSETTS,

In the House of Representatives, April 17, 1838.—The House having gone into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. POPE, of Kentucky, in the Chair,) took up for consideration the following bill:

A BILL providing for the removal of the walls of the Treasury building, and for the erection of a fire-proof building for the Post Office Department.

Be it enacted, &c. That the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, authorized to cause the unfinished walls of the Treasury building, now in the process of construction, to be taken down, and the materials to be removed and applied to the construction of a fire-proof building of such dimensions and upon such plan of arrangement as may be required for the use and accommodation of the Post Office Department, on the site of the Post Office building recently destroyed by fire; and, for this purpose, that he be authorized to employ a skilful architect to prepare and submit to him the necessary plans for the proper construction of such building, having regard to the use of the materials aforesaid, which, being approved by him, shall be conformed to in the erection of the structure. And the said architect may be continued in the superintendence of the construction of the building, or another employed in that service, as the President may judge best.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That, for the erection of the building authorized by the first section of this act, in addition to the materials to be removed and applied thereto, as therein mentioned, there be, and hereby is, appropriated, the sum of one hundred and fifty thousand dollars, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated by law.

Mr. LINCOLN (chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Public Grounds, who had reported the bill) addressed the committee in substance as follows:

Mr. Chairman: The report which accompanies the bill, and which is on the tables of gentlemen, explains the views of the committee, and presents the general reasons upon which the measure proposed is to be sustained. I might be content to rest here the merits of the proposition, and wait the objections (if any) which are to be urged against it, had not circumstances, extraneous to the matter of the report, and subsequent to its presentation to the House, admonished me of the propriety of being well understood in the outset of this discussion. An appeal from the judgment and recommendation of the committee has been already made, by the architect of the buildings, to the House and the country; and I am anxious that no misapprehension should exist in the minds of members as to the course of proceeding, the statement of facts, or the results, which are intended to be presented. There are, indeed, certain minor and subordinate considerations, not particularly adverted to in the report, which are proper to be connected with the subject of inquiry, and will serve to assist to a better understanding of the occasion of the bill.

The new Treasury building is being constructed, under the authority of the fifth section of the act of July 4, 1836, which is in the following words:

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, authorized to cause to be erected, on or near the site of the former Treasury building, or on any other public lot which he may select, a fire-proof building of such dimensions as may be required for the present and future accommodations of the Treasury Department, upon such plan, and of such materials, as he may deem most advantageous; and that, for this purpose, there be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of one hundred thousand dollars.

Here, Mr. Chairman, is the authority under which the work was commenced and is proceeding. The law required three distinct acts to be done by the President, which in their character were previous, and necessarily prerequisite, to the construction of the building. First, in their proper order, he was to select a site, either near the old Treasury, or some other, as his judgment should prefer; second, to determine upon the plan and dimensions of the structure, and in the latter to see that they were sufficient for the present and future probable occasions of the Department; and third, as indispensably connected with the other two, to appoint an architect for the work. If the building is now ill-placed and defective, or otherwise obnoxious to the objections urged in the report, it arises from a default in the execution of the trust confided to the President in one or all the above particulars, or it has resulted from incapacity or unfaithfulness in the mode of construction by the architect. It is a necessary duty to show where the fault lies, that the mind may be disabused of prejudice which partial or party considerations may interpose to the correction, as far as may now be, of manifold and important errors.

The act, as I have before shown, passed on the 4th of July, 1836, the very day, as I recollect, of the adjournment of the session of Congress. I now hold in my hand, Mr. Chairman, evidence of the time and manner in which the late President of the United States discharged that part of the duty which Congress had devolved upon him. It is contained in a paper which I will send to the table, and ask to have read by the Clerk.

It was read in the following words:

Under the act of Congress, authorizing the President of the United States to cause a Treasury building and Patent Office to be erected, I hereby designate the Commissioner of the Public Buildings to superintend generally the detailed modifications of plans for them, the advertising and forming of the contracts, and the whole disbursements thereon; and to enable him to keep the accounts, make the payments, and prepare vouchers for settlement, and conduct the other correspondence relating thereto, I authorize him to employ a clerk at not over $900 a year, to be paid equally out of the appropriations for said objects. I further appoint Robert Mills as architect, to aid in forming the plans, making proper changes therein from time to time, and seeing to the erection of said buildings in substantial conformity to the plans hereby adopted; which are, in their general outlines to be, as to the Treasury building, that annexed by said Mills—and as to the Patent Office, that annexed by Mr. Elliott; the former building to be erected on the old site, and the latter one on the square north of the Post Office.

ANDREW JACKSON.

WASHINGTON CITY, July 6, 1836.

Mr. Chairman, resumed Mr. L. it is important that the date of this document should be regarded. It will be observed to be the 6th of July, the second day after that on which the act was passed. Here, sir, we find that within forty-eight hours of the enactment of the law, in the bustle of an adjournment of Congress, and the fatigue and lassitude occasioned by its protracted sessions, and the heavy pressure of business at its close, the duties required of the President in relation to the selection of the site, on a view and consideration of all the circumstances which should enter into the decision of such a matter, the preference of a plan, upon a comparison of many which might be presented of different designs of construction, and the appointment of an architect, were all performed. It would, indeed, seem, upon a superficial thought, that much more opportunity for consideration should have been given to either of these objects, especially to an inquiry for an appropriate plan. The future occasions of the Department, even if the present were known, involved large scope for contemplation. Who can limit, in imagination even, the growing business of this mighty Republic? But, sir, I intend not to impute blame to the Executive for this apparent precipitation. On the contrary, under the circumstances which I shall state, I hold him acquitted of fault therein. It will be remembered by those who were members of former Congresses; that this subject of the erection of a Treasury building had engaged for several sessions the attention of the Committee on Public Buildings. Numerous and very different plans had been offered for their adoption; and at length a preferred one, presented by Mr. Elliot, an architect in this city, was suspended in the lobby. For weeks it was made subject to the inspection of the members of the House, and remained upon the wall at the date of the passage of the bill. At the same time Mr. Mills was in the actual employ of the Government as an architect. He had come recommended to their service by some previous reputation, and had received several special engagements, with the approbation of the House, in repairs upon the Capitol, and particularly in the alterations of this Hall. With such testimonials of qualification, he presented himself for the appointment. What representations he made to induce to the adoption of his plan of building, or to commit to his discretion the arrangement and construction of the edifice, the committee had no means of being informed. The result only of his application is known in the brief letter of authority which has just been read at the Clerk's table; the evidence at once, as is seen, of the appointment of the architect, the designation of the site, and the plan of construction, upon the opportunity for inquiry and examination afforded by a single intervening day between the passage of the law, and the performance of the Executive trust in all these particulars.

But, sir, I have said, I impute no fault to the late President of the United States for this seeming precipitancy of action. He had reason to believe the architect previously employed by the authority of the House "honest and capable," and with the sustaining recommendations which he exhibited of sufficient skill and experience for the task. He might well also rely, that one who should be appointed to carry into effect the design of Congress would adopt, as a guide to his conduct, the plan which received the preference of the committee, and had at least the tacit approval of the House. The site also was indicated in the law, by the mention of its proximity to the old Treasury building, unless a preference should be given to some other place. Besides, it is again to be regarded that the President was, at this time, worn down by the labors and confinement attendant upon a protracted session of Congress, and the weakness and infirmity of impaired health, and within a few days left the city for that relaxation from arduous duties which had become necessary to the restoration of exhausted strength. The necessary application to the more important business of the nation upon his return, immediately preceding the following session of Congress, and his subsequent severe and continued sickness, precluded all further attention, and doubtless the bestowment of any thought upon the subject until the close of his term of office, on the 4th of March of the last year. In the meantime the work of construction had been commenced by the architect, the position of the building had been fixed, and its foundations laid, and the structure was rising to view. To whatever objection it might now have been exposed, there seemed no power for interposition. It is understood that representations were made to the present Executive unfavorable to the site and plan of the work. But the office of the law had been already fulfilled in these particulars. He rightly deemed that it was not within his province to change the location once determined upon, or to interfere with a plan of construction supposed to have been approved by his predecessor in office, and the building has thus been suffered to proceed.

Mr. Chairman, [continued Mr. L.] I have thought it not irrelevant to present the circumstances under which the architect was appointed, and the site and plan of the building were designated, to preclude any misapprehension of the personal application of the objections which the committee have urged to the design and execution of the work. Sir, I should deprecate the excitement of party feeling from a supposed implication of the conduct, either in act or neglect, of the late or present Executive in this matter. This is no party affair. The report of the committee, now upon your table, has the unanimous consent of gentlemen of both political parties, a majority of them the friends of the Administration. It truly presents, with the bill, the result of the deliberations of many weeks, most laboriously and faithfully devoted to the examination of the subject, and is entitled to all the confidence which patient inquiry and impartial judgment, with whatever capacity the committee possess, may claim. It is to be borne in mind also that it is not the work of the committee of this House only. Under a resolution of the other branch, concurred in here, we have brought to our aid the consentaneous advice and opinions of a committee of that body. Again I say, therefore, this is no party matter, and the indications abroad or in this House that it may be made so, are to be received with no sentiments but of reproof and regret. For myself, I shall continue to treat the subject, as I have hitherto regarded it, as one of business merely, a transaction having relation to property, aside from politics, in which the Administration and those who oppose it have a like concern, under the law, to see that the Government obtain those accommodations which convenience and the public interest have demanded. I full well know that it is a dry and uninviting topic; but I would fain hope for that attention to it from this committee which its bearing upon the Treasury and its importance to the country should secure.

I proceed now to consider the objections to the building, and to show where and with whom the responsibility lies for its defects. The report which accompanies the bill points to the position of the building, the plan of its construction, and the insecurity of the work, for the former; and to the architect appointed by the President, for the latter. In the judgment of the committee, with the architect, and with him alone, rests the fault for whatever cause of complaint justly exists. And here, let me remark that, in arriving at this conclusion, no unfavorable bias preoccupied the minds of the members, to the prejudice of Mr. Mills. For myself, I may truly say, that my prepossessions had been altogether in his favor; and, throughout the whole process of inquiry and examination by the committee, he was uniformly treated with a delicacy and tenderness towards his feelings and professional reputation, but ill requited in the extraordinary appeal which he has thought proper to prefer. It is now made painfully my duty, in discussing the principal subject, to connect with it an exposition of the incapacity or misconduct of the architect, for either the committee are wholly unjustified in their report, or to one or both of these causes are to be ascribed the errors of which they complain.

On the very threshold of their inquiries, the attention of the committee was directed to the actual position of the new Treasury building, in reference to the site. They saw that, with a greatly extended front, it was placed on an inclined plane of rapid elevation, and so protruded upon the line of the contiguous street, as to admit of no relief to the unequal height of the base, and an inconvenient access to the rooms. Moreover, it was brought, with its unfinished walls, into such near proximity to the office of the present State Department, as to indicate a design in the architect, if not to create a necessity, for the removal and destruction of that edifice. An examination of the interior arrangement of the structure suggested objections to the passage ways, and to the imperfect light which could be received into parts of the building. It was upon such observations, Mr. Chairman, that the architect was first called upon to explain the plan of his work. Sir, it is proper I should state that it was his inability to do this in a satisfactory manner, which induced to subsequent and more critical inquiries into the matter. When asked the occasion for precipitating the building to the line of the street, and carrying the unfinished walls to the side of the building occupied by the State Department, his excuse was, the positive command of General Jackson to preserve the building of the State Department, and the necessity, therefore, of conforming the walls to the position of the old edifice, with a view of connecting them with it. When it was pointed out to him that this object had not been regarded, inasmuch as the line of colonnade of the new structure was several feet in advance, while the principal wall receded as far from the front line of the building, his reply was, that the front of the old building was to be cut off, and the colonnade extended. It was then suggested to him that this would necessarily occasion the destruction of all the front rooms of that building. He said the front rooms must be taken away. When asked how he would dispose of the chimneys in that case, his reply was, they must be taken down also. It was remarked to him, by the committee, that the windows of the State Department did not correspond with those of the new building; his answer was, they must be altered and made to conform. It was further objected, that the buildings were of different number and height of stories, that the floors were not on the same level, that the passage ways did not coincide, and would not admit of communications with each other; and now it was that the architect admitted, for the first time, that there could be no conformity short of an entire change in the interior, and mostly so of the exterior structure of the old building; and it might be best to take it entirely away. Thus, the new building had been forced into an inconvenient and improper position, and arranged upon an objectionable plan of construction, under the pretext of respect to a mandate to preserve the old, while the destruction of the old had now become the preferable mode to the completion of the new. Sir, upon this exhibition of the reasoning and conduct of the architect, the committee did, indeed, entertain distrust of his judgment and fidelity. The commission in his hands gave no warrant for such an arrangement, either in the position or plan of the new Treasury building; and I will show that, neither in the one nor the other, has he the sanction or the authority of General Jackson.

The law requires that the President "cause to be erected, on or near the site of the former Treasury building, or any other public lot he may select, a fire proof buildng," &c. In the only paper signed by General Jackson on the subject, that of 6th July, 1836, which has been read, and which is both the evidence of the execution of his duty in the designation of the site, and his authority to the architect to engage in the construction of the work, he directs in so many terms, that the Treasury building be erected "on the old site." In connection with this, we have the word of the architect himself that he was specially enjoined to preserve the State Department. Indeed, the instructions could not have been otherwise; nor in the absence of instructions, could any other interpretation have been given to the law. This latter building was comparatively new. It had been erected since the last war with Great Britain, of durable materials, in a substantial manner, and at a cost exceeding the sum of one hundred and thirty thousand dollars. The reference by the President for the site of the new building was to the old Treasury; and, by enjoining the preservation of the State Department, he, in effect, prohibited all interference with it. Sir, whatever may be the pretence that the President approved or understood the present position and extent of the new building, it is utterly inconsistent with the little attention which he had opportunity to give to the subject, and repugnant alike to his written designation of the site, and his more explict verbal direction to the architect.

Nor is the architect better sustained in the plan which he is now prosecuting for the completion of the building. It is not the plan selected by General Jackson. I say this advisedly. The plan of present execution could not have been the plan of original design upon which the building was authorized to be constructed. Does any doubt of this? Let him but examine the foundations and present state of the structure, and regard the clear indications to the necessary mode of its completion. The whole design of the architect is to be seen in the drawing now suspended in the lobby, behind the bar. It presents the elevation of an edifice of given dimensions, corresponding with the front walls of the present building, extended over the site occupied by the State Department, and with a north wing covering the whole foundation of the latter building. It exhibits a corresponding wing at the south, and a projection of like proportion in the centre. Such, Mr. Chairman, are the outlines of the plan, and such the sure indications, from the actually existing state of the work, of the intention of the architect to its execution. Was such a plan ever approved by the Executive? And, from the consideration that it must destroy the very thing which the late President insisted should be preserved, (the building of the State Department,) the committee found, in the explanation of the plan given to them by the architect, a conclusive fact against the possibility of there having been such approval. Upon inquiry into the designs upon the drawing of the south wing of the building, it was said to be intended for the accommodation of the Post Office Department. And surely such an object could not have been contemplated by General Jackson in July, 1836. At that time, no want existed of such accommodation. The Post Office Department had then a convenient and appropriate building, and it was months after when the conflagration which caused its destruction could have rendered any thought of this further provision proper. Sir, there must be some mistake in this matter. In the very loose and indefinite terms of the commission given to the architect may be found the source of much of the present difficulty. He is there authorized "to aid in forming the plans, making proper changes therein, from time to time;" and these changes it is that lay at the foundation of all the mischief. It was this authority which has substituted for the simple, neat, convenient, and economical plan of Mr. Elliot, which had been approved by the committee, the complex, ornate, incongruous, and extravagant design of the present architect; which, instead of improving a bad site by the judicious position of an appropriate edifice, has added to the inconvenience of place by the faulty arrangement of an imperfect and unauthorized structure.

Mr. Chairman, lest I should be thought to press this point of objection beyond the degree of consideration to which it may be entitled, I beg leave to refer to a document which has not before come to the notice of the committee, to show that the design of the building, and consequently the expense involved in its completion, is not even now understood by the Government. In a communication made during the present session to the House by the President of the United States, in answer to a resolution moved at the special session, I believe by the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. EVERETT,] is the following statement:

"As the 5th section of the act of July 4, 1836, under the authority of which this building has been commenced, provided only for the erection of an edifice of such dimensions as may be required for the present and future accommodation of the Treasury Department, the size of the structure has been adapted to that purpose, and it is not contemplated to appropriate any part of the building to the use of any other Department."

Sir, I would respectfully ask, "what is the size of the structure," now in the process of erection? We have the plan of the building. We see its foundations, and the present state of its walls; and where and how are these to terminate? They are now open at both ends, more nearly resembling the tunnel of a railroad than the "dimensions" of a building. Again, the President says:

"As it is understood, however, that the plan of the edifice admits of its being completed either with or without wings; and that, if Congress should think proper, accommodation may be provided, by means of wings, consistently with the harmony of the original design, for the Department of State, and the General Post Office, it is not thought that the public interest requires any change in the location or plan," &c.

A report from the architect to the President is the authority for the understanding that "the plan of the building admits of its being completed with or without wings." Mr. Chairman, I much fear that the confidence of the President has been abused in this matter. Sir, the plan of the buildings is of a building with wings, and the plan cannot be executed without them. The main entrances would otherwise be cut off, and in no way else can the ends of the building now be finished, without violating every rule of architectural order. Your committee repeatedly and carefully inquired into this subject, and I feel well assured that there can be no completion of the present parts of the building, "no harmony of the original design," but with the addition of the wings. This misapprehension of the President is the assigned cause, too, why "it is not thought that the public interest requires any change in the location or plan." It may be fair to infer that, with more correct information from the architect, his conclusion would have been different in this respect also.

I have thus endeavored to show that the intentions of Congress in regard to the passage of the law have not been regarded, either in the designation of the site by the President for the precise location of the building, or the selection by him of the definite plans for its construction, but that the architect, availing himself of the opportunity which the absence or sickness of the late Chief Magistrate afforded, and under a misapprehension of facts induced in the mind of his successor, has substituted the dictates of his own judgment, or taste, or interest, both in the design and the location of the edifice. The work derives no sanction from the authority which was to direct to its construction; and the consideration of its defects, whatever they may be, is disembarrassed of all other reference than to their intrinsic character.

It was, Mr. Chairman, from the unsatisfactory result of their own observations, that the Committee on Public Buildings proposed to the President to be permitted to call to their aid the advice of some skilful, experienced, and unprejudiced artist. Their application was promptly responded to, and, by the appointment of the President, Thomas U. Walter, esq. an architect of high and deserved celebrity, then and now in charge of the construction of the Girard College, in the city of Philadelphia, one of the most costly and magnificent structures which ever adorned any age or nation, was engaged in their service. The report of this gentleman is upon the desks of members, and to the opinions which it expresses I shall advert hereafter.

The survey and examination by Mr. Walter having resulted unfavorably to the character of the work, the committee, with a scrupulous regard to the feelings and interest of the architect of the building, submitted to him a copy of the report, and invited an answer to the objections it contained. That answer is also given to the House. It could be matter of no surprise that there should thus be exhibited a conflict of opinions, the almost necessary consequence of diversity of taste or judgment, or of varied practice and experience; influenced, too, on the one side by the pride of previous opinion and of deep personal interest. In the spirit of impartiality and of anxious inquiry after truth, recourse was again had to the authority of the President to call to the assistance of the committee another well-qualified, unbiassed, and unprejudiced witness and judge of the work. In the report of Mr. Parris, appended to the printed report of the committee, we have the opinion of an architect to whose science, eminent skill, and large experience in his profession, the highest testimonials were offered, and whose judgment in the matter it will ill become less instructed and competent men to resist. That judgment is in accordance with the report of Mr. Walter, and condemns the structure, in its design and progress, from the very inception of the plan to its present point of execution.

Mr. Chairman, it has been the occupation and the duty of some portion of my life to consider the character of human testimony, to analyze, compare, and weigh facts and circumstances, and to arrive at conclusions from the prevailing power and force of evidence. The situation of witnesses is no inconsiderable element in the credit which should be given to their testimony. On the subject under discussion, we have, on the one hand, the confident assurance of the architect of the building in the fitness and thoroughness of the work, and, on the other, the impeachment, by two artists, both of the plan and execution.

I have before referred to the different positions in which these gentlemen stand to the subject; the one implicated in his conduct, his professional reputation involved, and the continuance of his employment here, perhaps, depending upon the issue of this investigation; the others involuntarily brought from a distance to an examination of the work, previously unapprized of its supposed defects, uncommitted by the expression of any previous opinion, and to be affected by no possible result. The preponderating claim to confidence might well be determined from these considerations alone. But there are other circumstances which are proper to be brought to view in this connection. The architect of the building, in his report to the committee, challenges what he is pleased to term the theory of the other artists against his long and successful practice; and, in support of the latter, points "to numerous fire-proof buildings erected by me" in South Carolina, and to "some of the custom-houses designed by me, and erected within the last five or six years in New England," particularly at Newburyport and New Bedford, in Massachusetts, and New London and Middletown, Connecticut; and to "the custom-house stores in Baltimore, now under construction, and designed by me as a fire-proof building."

Mr. Chairman, in respect to his claims to merit for the design of the custom-house stores in Baltimore, I beg to have read a letter from the architect employed in the erection of that building, addressed to an honorable member of this House, which I send to the table.

BALTIMORE, April 11, 1838.

To Hon. B. C. HOWARD:

RESPECTED SIR: I have taken the liberty of intruding on your time by asking the favor of you to explain to the President of the United States an error I have seen in Mr. Robert Mills's (architect) reply to Mr. Lincoln, and the architects Mr. Thomas U. Walter and Mr. Alexander Parris, on the inefficiency of the structure of the Treasury building. Mr. Mills says, in his reply, "the custom-house store in Baltimore, now under construction, designed by me." Sir, this assertion is altogether erroneous, as I will prove to you. From the first day, I was employed by the Commissioners, Messrs. Joseph White and James Howard, appointed to have this house constructed. On entering on my duties the first day, the Commissioners laid before me a general plan, and other sketches and plans designed by Mr. Mills, engineer and architect, and other plans designed by Colonel Small, of Baltimore, with instructions that I should examine those plans carefully until the next day, when they would meet, and I should report to them my opinion of the plans, whether there was any that I would recommend at their meeting. I made an unfavorable report, not accepting any of the plans submitted for my consideration. I was then instructed by the Commissioners to make drawings, and at as early a period as possible, and submit them for their consideration. On their examining my plans they approved of them. They sent the plans to Washington for examination, and they were there approved, sent back to the Commissioners, and I have built by them in this particular way.

I cannot see how Mr. Mills can claim, in his reply to the report of the committee of the House of Representatives, that he designed the plans of the custom-house store in Baltimore.

Sir, this assumption on the part of Mr. Mills I deem an injustice to me as a mechanic and draughtsman, who can design his own plans of edifices, and execute their construction afterwards.

I will not trespass on your time, as I know it is all important, but would beg of you the favor to inform the President and the Committee on Public Buildings of the grievances of which I complain. Your obedient and humble servant,

JOHN F. HOSS.

Mr. Chairman, I apprehend that, upon inquiry, the architect will be found scarcely more meritorious in relation to some of the buildings to which he has called the attention of the committee, as designed by him, and erected in New England. If, by the use of these terms, he intends only that he furnished plans and drawings for such buildings, or, in respect to some of them, that he directed the mode of construction and order of work, I have no authority to gainsay the expression; but that, in any other sense, he erected or designed the buildings, or, in regard to some of them, knows even in what manner they were executed, I may be permitted to doubt. In one thing, at least, he is, as I am informed, greatly mistaken. He claims that, at the time of his engagement upon the custom-houses in Massachusetts, he "found not a single bricklayer that knew how to turn a groin;" and that "up to that day, such a thing as a brick-groin was not to be found in New England." Sir, against this pretension of vanity, it has been stated to me, from a source not to be questioned, that long before Mr. Mills ever saw New England, or had himself "turned a groin," the Massachusetts General Hospital, in Boston, one of the noblest structures in that beautiful city, abounding in public edifices of the most approved models, had been constructed in its basement story upon precisely the same principle of arching; and that the practice was there well understood and familiar to mechanics. The fact imports but little of itself, but may serve to disabuse the public mind of false confidence in the genius and experience of the architect.

And here I gladly dismiss both the Architect of the Public Buildings and his report to the committee from further consideration. It seemed to me necessary to have bestowed upon them thus much particularity of attention, as upon the degree of credit to which they are entitled may, in a great degree, depend the disposition of the subject-matter under discussion. Sir, I again repeat, that, in what I have said, I indulge in no unkind feeling towards the individual. It is to the merits of his work of construction, to his capacity and fidelity in the service in which he has been engaged, and to the effect of his labors upon the public interest, to these, and to these alone, as brought to the view of the committee, within the scope of their duty to the House and to the country, that I have directed my remarks. I now pass to the provisions of the bill itself, and to the grounds upon which it is sustained by the committee by whom it has been reported.

The first proposition contained in the bill is, an authority to the President of the United States "to cause the unfinished walls of the Treasury building, now in the progress of construction, to be taken down;" and the report of the Committee on the Public Buildings justifies the proposition, by representations of the unsuitableness of the plan to the site of the building, the bad arrangement of the interior parts of the structure, and the defective character of the work. Of these in their order.

To the first point of objection I have already had occasion to call the attention of this committee, when referring to the act of Congress under the authority of which the building was commenced. That act contemplated a simple edifice for the accommodation of the Treasury only; and the appropriation of $100,000 to the object may be regarded as some indication, at least, of its anticipated cost and extent. But it is not to the enlargement of the plan of the structure that the objection is intended to apply. This may, indeed, transcend the authority of law, but is not a matter within the appropriate cognizance of the committee of which I have the honor to be a member. It is to the plan of the building, in connection with its actual position, the means of access to its accommodations, and its convenient occupation and use. These are not now subjects for doubt or speculation. The foundations of the building are laid, and the superstructure has risen upon them. They are visible to the eye, and the defects are obvious to the remark of every observer. Will gentlemen but accompany me to the site of the edifice, they will there see an extended base of several hundred feet, upon an inclined plane of more than fourteen feet, with one end buried in the earth, and the other elevated as far above the adjoining foot-way. They will find the face of the building so protroded upon the line of the street as to allow room only for a passage from the side-walk to the platform of a splendid colonnade, and thence to the principal halls, by a flight of narrow side-steps perpendicular to the base, and under which, also, must be the entrance to the front corridor of the basement. They will see, to their greater surprise, as I apprehend, what must be an anomaly in the process of architectural construction, the front and rear walls of a stone edifice carried to the height of two stories, with both ends open from the foundation, and with a durable brick building in the way of closing the one, and no authorized or determinate mode for completing either. Had the building been but thrown back from the street, and constructed upon the design approved by the Committee on the Public Buildings of the last Congress, bad as was the site, all these difficulties would have been avoided. By any mode in which it may now be finished, its position will be most awkward, its approach inconvenient, and its general appearance reproachful to the architectural skill and taste of the country.

But, Mr. Chairman, I have yet to learn upon what precise plan it is proposed even that the unfinished walls shall be carried out. They are now of unequal extent from the centre; and at the north, which is their shortest arm, approach within some three or four feet of the building occupied by the State Department. Here is no room for extension, but over the foundation of that edifice. What, then, I ask, is to be done? Is it the intention to destroy this valuable building? The plan, which hangs in the lobby behind me, indicates this. It is the plan of the architect; and one of the wings, delineated in the drawing, is made to occupy the very site of the present building. Or are the walls to terminate with their present extent? How, then, is the building to be closed, and in what manner the end finished? The committee were told, in answer to the objection, that the front approach was narrow and inconvenient; that the main entrances were designed to be at the ends, directly opposite to the principal halls, or passageways, of the building. But what space is there left for this accommodation, either for entrance or light to the passages between the two buildings, now brought almost into juxtaposition with each other? And at the other extremity, too, the south end of the building, with its main entrance fourteen feet above the level of the ground, what here is the plan of completion? and how are you to ascend from the street? If the design, as shown upon the plan, be carried out, the building is yet to be extended in this direction some ninety or a hundred feet; and steps descending from that extremity, at the elevation of the passageway, will reach far into the avenue, upon the south. Sir, if any one knows what is the present plan of execution, he has more information than I have been able to acquire.

A second reason with the committee for reporting the bill was the bad arrangement of the interior of the structure, and the want of adaptation to the purposes for which it was designed. These objections rest not in taste or opinion only. The defects are palpable, primary in importance, and, in the present advanced state of the building, beyond remedy. They consist in the narrowness of the halls or passage-ways, and the want of provision for the admission of sufficient light to the rooms. The building, carried out according to the plan, will be 456 feet in length, while the principal halls, running longitudinally through thi great extent, when finished, in the three upper stos ries, will be hardly more than nine feet in width- and, in the basement, but little exceeding eight. On this part of the subject, I beg leave to read an extract from the report of Mr. Walter, as descriptive of the character and consequences of this fault of construction:

"I should remark," says he, "that all the passages in the building are entirely too narrow for either beauty, convenience, or comfort. The main passage, by which all the rooms are approached, will be four hundred and fifty-six feet in length, (should the whole design be carried out,) while its width is only nine and a half feet. The only means of lighting this passage is by a window of four feet by eight at each end, and the secondary light it may receive from the cross entries, stairways, and glass that may be inserted in the doors. All these, however, will not amount to much. A passage as long as the one in question should have been at least fifteen feet wide, with as much light at each end as could possible have been introduced. Ampler arrangements should also have been made for introducing intermediate lights."

I may permitted, I trust, to refer also to the authority of Capt. Parris, in support of the opinion of Mr. Walter. He states, that—

"Considering the length of the building, the number of rooms to be entered through this passage, the many occupants and others having occasion of ingress and egress through it, in my opinion, this great thoroughfare for the whole building should have been, at least, fifteen feet in width; and I have not seen any sufficient reason for confining it to its present reduced limits. I consider this defect without remedy."

On the authority of these two experienced and accomplished artists, it might seem that the objection was conclusive. But I rest not here. There are facts, in the practice of the architect of the building, which speak a language as unequivocal as the opinions I have cited. The Patent Office, now in the course of construction, under his superintendence, of little more than one-half the extent of the Treasury building, has a passage-way of fifteen feet; and we have all seen upon our desks, at the present session, a plan for a Marine Hospital, prepared by this very architect, of less than two hundred feet in length, with a like breadth of fifteen feet passages. Wherefore, then, this great contraction in the most necessary and oft-frequented part of the Treasury building? Whether it result from mistake or design, the effect is the same, and alike injurious. Either fifteen feet passageways in a structure of one or two hundred feet in length are wastefully improper, or nine feet in an edifice of four hundred and fifty feet is insufferably defective. Had I not dismissed from regard the report of the architect, I might cite with effect his distinct admission that, "in respect to the width of the corridors and passage-ways, it would have added much to their beauty had they been half as wide again;" and, as regards the lighting these corridors and passage-ways, the pregnant expression of a belief only "that they will not be deficient in light, but that they will be sufficient for the transaction of the business of passing to and fro!" I will apply to this but the single comment, that, in the present advanced state of architectural science and improvement, that must be but an ill construction, indeed, of a national edifice, which is less ample in all its proportions than good taste demands, and can only subserve, by its accommodations, the most necessary and restricted uses.

Another branch of the same general objection of want of adaptation in the arrangement of the building to the purposes of its construction is, the deficiency of light in the front range of rooms of the basement and attic stories. In the former, the light can be but secondary and very imperfect. It is first to be admitted through a thick wall, by windows of only four feet square, into a corridor under the platform of the colonnade, and thence into the rooms back of the corridor. The dimensions of the windows of the attic are the same, and these will be much obscured by the columns and entablature of the colonnade. The light, whatever it may be, must be admitted near the floor, below the level of the height of the desks, and will not be sufficiently reflected for the necessary use. With this statement of position, it can hardly be necessary to seek the opinions of architects, to satisfy any considerate mind of the effect. But the declarations of Messrs. Walter and Parris are so direct and explicit to this point, and so brief withal, that I hope to be pardoned a reference to them: The former remarks:

"The rooms in the basement story will be entirely too dark and damp for office purposes, and the apartments in the third (attic) story, having windows but half the size of those below, will be so darkened by the colonnade as to render them almost useless. The only comfortable rooms in the building will, therefore, be found in the first and second stories, which embrace but seventy-five apartments."

The latter gentleman expresses the opinion that, from such observations as he has been able to make of the rooms in the basement story, "they will be entirely too dark for the occupation of clerks, and too damp, when closed, for the deposite of papers." In relation to the attic, he observes:

"The windows of the attic are too small. I was informed by the superintendent of the work that they are to be only four feet square, the top coming only five feet above the floor. The soffit, or under side of the entablature, will be placed but a small distance above the tops of the windows. All these arrangements combine to render the rooms dark, and, in my opinion, they will not be sufficiently lighted, especially in cloudy weather, to render them suitable for the occupation of clerks."

Is this, Mr. Chairman, a building to satisfy the expectations or the wants of the Government—a building in which one-third of the rooms are utterly useless for all needed purposes? Sir, let it be remembered that this House of Representatives, by a resolution of the last session, called upon the President for information of the number of apartments which would be required for the business of the Treasury. I now hold in my hand a report to him from the Secretary of that Department, by which it appears that 132 rooms were at this time wanted. The act, however, under which the building is being erected, directs that provision be made, not only for the present, but for the future occasions of the Department. The present edifice is to contain but 150 rooms in the whole and such portions of these unfit to be occupied as to reduce the number below the immediate requirement. Sir, I submit it to this committee if such manifest violation of the intention of the Legislature is not sufficient cause of itself for arresting the further progress of the structure. Let none be deceived by the suggestion that these objections are the dictates of apprehension merely, or the results of a misguided judgment even. There stand the walls, within view of this Capitol, as witnesses to facts. There are the narrow and dark corridors, and damp cells of the basement, to speak for themselves. There are the contracted halls and passages of the first and second stories in the uprising superstructure, with its open and exposed ends, to be seen and measured, in all their length and breadth. Feet and inches will not lie. The attic is yet to be added. But the plan of construction which has been commenced must now be pursued. The entablature, with its frieze and cornice, must surmount the columns, with their capitals, and the windows be placed within the obscuration of light which they will occasion. That "these rooms will be too dark for the occupation of clerks," we have the opinion of skilful builders, and neither the facts nor the effects will my own judgment permit me to doubt. Here, then, we are again brought to a stand. The inquiry is directly and pertinently presented, shall an imperfect building, in a bad location, and upon an objectionable plan, with four stories of rooms needed for occupation, and but two suitable for use, be carried to its completion; or shall the work of construction stop, the incumbrance be removed, and more fit and appropriate arrangements made for the future better accommodation of the Department? This inquiry it is now among the duties, and upon the responsibility, of this committee and of this House to decide.

Yet, with all these causes of objection, the committee might still have hesitated in recommending the demolition of the walls of the building, at the consequent sacrifice of a heavy expenditure, but for the admonition of another and more fatal defect, which rendered the duty equally clear and imperative. The architects who were employed to examine the structure, have condemned the work as deficient in the requisite strength and security. This objection depends upon principles of architectural science, and a rightful application of the rules of art. Sir, I profess no judgment in this matter above the skill and capacity, and fidelity of the artisans, who have been witnesses to the committee, and whose opinions accompany the report. If they are to be relied upon, and their judgment is worthy of any degree of confidence, here is an insuperable difficulty in the way of further proceeding with the work. The objection did not originate with the committee, nor is it obvious to any superficial and unpractised observation. I take occasion, in passing, here to say, that the representations of the architect of the building, in his appeal to the House, if they intended to apply to my associates or myself, are unfounded and unjust in this particular. The committee have nowhere asserted that of which he complains. They have at no time made or given countenance to a suggestion that "the arches had already cracked," that "the walls were falling," or that "the building was already crumbling into ruins." These are the imaginings of a jealous spirit, the cob-house fabrication of an artificer who builds but to show his skill on what he may most easily destroy. The opinions of the architects, Messrs. Walter and Parris, are the warrant to the committee for the impeachment of the strength of the work. To this point their language is so unequivocal and decisive, that I must crave the patience of gentlemen while I read some brief extracts from their reports.

"The second objection advanced (says Mr. Walter) is the weakness of the structure. My decided opinion in reference to this subject is, that all the outside walls are entirely too thin and too weak for so large a vaulted building as the one in question. These walls should have been, at least, three and a half feet thick, exclusive of the antæ, (or pilasters, as they are commonly called;) instead of which, they are only two feet three inches. And here, permit me to remark, that the strength which would have been derived from these antæ, had they been constructed according to the principles of stereotomy, is not only lost by the manner in which they have been built, but the walls, which would have been too weak without them, are actually rendered weaker by their introduction."

He describes these antæ as "occurring in every eleven feet around the whole building," and adds:

They "should have been constructed in courses corresponding with those of the ashlar, so as to have formed a band with it; but, under the existing circumstances, the band of the ashlar is cut off from the bottom to the top of the building, on each side of every one of the antæ; while the antæ themselves afford little or no resistance to lateral pressure, being composed of large stones set on the end of each other, without a single cramp or tie to hold them to the ashlar, or a dowel to keep them in their places. We have, therefore, a straight joint on each side of every antæ, extending its whole height, by which all the horizontal band of the wall is destroyed, except that which is obtained from the filling in of the brick work, which is so reduced by the thickness of the ashlar as to afford but little strength."

This, Mr. Chairman, let it be borne in mind, is the language of a professional architect, addressed to the Committee on the Public Buildings, upon the responsibility of his character, and the high obligation to fidelity in the execution of a trust committed by them to his skill and judgment. There is nothing doubtful or equivocal, either in the description he gives of the work, or the condemnation which he pronounces upon it. If there be error in either, it boldly challenges correction. Nor is he less explicit in his objections to other parts of the work:

"Another defect is evident (says he) in the vaulting of the vestibule on 15th street. These arches are all groined; and one half of their horizontal thrust is resolved on the front wall, without any counteracting influence whatever, except the wall itself, the bond of which is unfortunately cut off by the outside antæ, at the very point upon which the thrust of the arches is concentrated."

Again:

"In the plans for the upper stories, I find that the rooms directly over the vestibule are increased by omitting two of the cross walls that occur in the lower story, so as to throw the whole width of the centre building into one room of fifty-four eet in each of those stories, the whole of which is to be groin-arched in their compartments, without any provision whatever for resisting the lateral pressure of the arches. This plan of arching can never be executed with safety to the building. The arches in the lower story would probably stand, provided the centres were kept under them, until the walls receive the superincumbent weight of the structure; but the fate of the upper arches, if executed upon the same plan, is certain."

As a striking illustration of what is meant by the horizontal thrust of the arches against the resisting power of the perpendicular walls, I cannot forbear to refer to a demonstration of the character of this defect, in the descriptions given by Mr. Walter of the plan of construction proposed to be adopted in another public building (the new Patent Office) now in progress, under the superintendence of the same official architect. It may serve, also, to test the greater confidence which is due to the "experience and practice of thirty years" of the latter gentleman over the immutable laws of matter, and the well-settled principles of science, which he is pleased to characterize as the "theory" of his professional opponents. I read from the report of Mr. Walter, on page 16 of the printed document:

"The plan of the grand exhibition room, which includes the whole of the upper story, (of the Patent Office) being about sixty-five feet wide by two hundred and sixty feet long, provides for the same kind of vaulting as that of the lower stories. All the arches are to spring from columns to the exterior walls, suspending over this vast room more than 300,000 bricks, without any possibility of preventing the lateral thrust from acting on the outside walls; and that, too, almost at the very top of the building. Had the exhibition room been vaulted on this plan, the building must have spread with the keying, and the arches come down with the centres. The horizontal thrust exerted by each of these arches upon the outside walls, and which is resolved, in every instance, by the peculiar form of the arches, upon a single point, amounts to 12,256 pounds, while the resistance offered, under the most favorable circumstances, will not exceed 6,500 pounds."

But I will not weary the patience of the committee by reading further passages to show the want of soundness and substantial, enduring strength in the different parts of the structure. I earnestly commend the whole of the able report of this accomplished architect to the careful examination of every gentleman before he gives a vote upon the subject. They will find there set down many more and not less decisive instances of defect than I have brought particularly to their notice. In the description of the character and construction of the work given by Mr. Walter, he is fully sustained by the judgment and opinion of Capt. Parris. The latter pronounces decidedly "that the walls of this building are not sufficiently strong to sustain the lateral pressure of the arches, to be continued above the present height." Other architects, of no less reputation, have, with like explicitness, condemned the edifice. I have been informed that such was the result of the observations of the superintendent of the new custom-house in the city of New York, and of the principal constructor of the State House at Montpelier, in Vermont; gentlemen distinguished for professional talent, good taste, and the high degree of public confidence which they enjoy, and whose attention was casually drawn to the building while recently on a visit to this city. I might also adduce the more frequent and familiar remarks of respectable builders in and about the city, in connection with the extraordinary fact that, although the plan and construction of the building have been made the occasion of much severe criticism before the public, and of inquiry and close investigation by the committee, for many months, and this well known to the architect, he has not yet attempted to justify either his designs or his practice, by a single approving voice from another. Sir, it might seem that all this should suffice to satisfy the minds of honorable members on this floor of the insecurity and instability of the structure. The position which I occupy in the Committee on Public Buildings, devolved upon me the task of offering this exposition of the sources of information, the evidence, and the results of personal observation, which induced to the report; and, with no feeling or motive beyond a sense of duty, I am less solicitous for the disposition which may now be made of the subject, than that it should be fully and rightfully understood here and elsewhere.

Mr. Chairman, it is given as the deliberate judgment of one of the architects, "that the defects are beyond the reach of any remedy, and that the course dictated alike by prudence and economy, is to take down the whole building." Concurring in this opinion, the committee have accompanied their report with a bill for this purpose. For myself, I see not how, on any plan which has been suggested, aside from all exceptions to the supposed weakness of the walls, the ends are to be closed, the light admitted, the entrance and passage-ways made convenient, and the building advantageously and appropriately finished. By an official statement from the Commissioner of the Public Buildings, it appears that, discarding fractions, the sum of two hundred thousand dollars has already been expended, and a further sum of three hundred thousand dollars will be required for the completion of the building, making an aggregate expense of HALF A MILLION OF DOLLARS. I have seen another estimate, coming from the architect himself, which requires, for the execution of his plan, and which I verily believe is the only mode by which the building can now be finished, NINE HUNDRED THOUSAND DOLLARS! The calculations of others have carried it to a MILLION AND A HALF!

Sir, I vouch not for the accuracy of any of these estimates. The latter may be, and probably is, too large; but it is not to be supposed that the architect would swell the amount beyond the actual cost. And for what, I ask, is this heavy charge to be incurred? For a building with which, when completed, the Government and the country never can be satisfied—a building which will not answer the purposes intended by the law, badly located, inconvenient of approach, deficient in the required accommodations, and unsafe in its construction. Stop, then, the work at once. Do what the bill on your table proposes. Take down the imperfect and half-finished walls; and, if you would have a suitable edifice, employ a competent architect, select a proper site, adopt an appropriate plan of adequate diminsions, in the language of the law, "for the present and future accommodations of the Treasury Department," and let the work be executed in a style consistent with economy, and not dishonoring the good taste and architectural skill of the nation.

I proceed now, very briefly, to show that the measure which the bill is intended to effect, in the removal of the walls of the building, is recommended by considerations of economy, and will be attended with an actual saving of charge upon the Treasury. A few simple statements of calculations and deductions will afford this demonstration. I have before me, Mr. Chairman, a written communication from Mr. Mills, the architect, addressed to the Committee on the Public Buildings, from which I read the following:

"Upon the question submitted to me, what would be the estimated loss of labor and materials used in the new Treasury building, in the event of taking down the same, to be used again in erecting a building upon a new site, I would respectfully state as follows:

"1st. The present expenditures on this building amount to	$200,065 79
2d The value of the materials and work, when taken out and removed to a place of safety, with those on the ground, are estimated at	97,800 00
	$102,265 79
"3d. The site being changed, would render it unnecessary to regrade and pave 15th street, and construct a culvert under the same, estimated at (which deduct)	20,000 00
"Making the total estimated loss	$82,265 79
"4th. In the event of removing the building, there will be no necessity to take down or alter the present State Department building, which cost $100,000; and the saving here, which might properly be carried to the credit side of the account, would be	80,000 00
"Leaving an actual loss of only	$2,265 79

We thus have it from the architect himself, in plain black and white, and in precise, certain, arithmetical numbers, that the difference in amount of sacrifice between taking down the walls of the new building, or proceeding in their execution to the consequent destruction of the building of the State Department, will be but about two thousand dollars. I have before shown that the two buildings cannot stand together. And this is the inevitable alternative—either the old must be taken down, to give place to the execution of the plan of the new, or the walls of the new may be removed to the saving of the old. But these are not all the considerations, in stating the account current of profit and loss. To the small balance even of $2,265 against the removal of the walls of the new building, I propose the great under valuation of the property in the old. It is represented to have cost, at least, $130,000. At the certain present value of $100,000, the difference, instead of being $2,265 against the removal, would be $17,735 in favor of the measure. To this is to be added the cost of a parapet wall, or stone terraee, along the line of the basement, to guard the front from the caving earth and brick of the adjacent sidewalk at one extremity of the building, and to conceal the present exposed state of the rough foundation work at the other, as well as to give the appenrance of a horizontal line of colonnade, at an estimate of $20,000 more. It is threatened that there will be claims for damages, also, to the abutters on the opposite side of the street, by reason of reducing its grade, and obstructing a ready access to their buildings; but as the right, at best, is questionable, I have not taken it into the account. Taking, then, the items only which are derived principally from data furnished by the architect himself, it results that, by immediately stopping the progress of the work, and removing the unfinished walls, rather than prosecuting the plan and sacrificing the State Department building, a saving, at the least, little short of $40,000 will be effected.

There is yet another view of the matter, which presents the effect upon the interest of the Government in a more striking point of light. The estimated cost, by the architect, of the present plan of the building, if fully carried out, including the loss of the State Department, is $900,000; but would probably rise to a million. If the work is now arrested, and the design heretofore approved by the Committee on Public Buildings substituted in its stead, the State Department building will be saved, and an edifice of ample dimensions, and of plain and simple style of architecture, may be constructed for less than one-half the cost. But if the present plan be persisted in, the expense of the building in progress is not only to be incurred, but it will impose the necessity, at no distant day, of a similar process of construction on the opposite side of the square. It is well known that the building occupied by the Navy Department is defective, and must soon come down. It was, originally, badly built, and was greatly injured by fire, set to it by the British, on their incursion to the city during the last war, and is now not worthy of repair. Whenever it shall be rebuilt, whatever form of structure is adopted on the east of the President's square, to preserve uniformity must be conformed to on the west. Here, now, stands the building occupied by the Department of War, a substantial and valuable brick structure, corresponding in position and appearance with that of the Department of State. The destruction of the one is but the signal for that of the other; and the sacrifice and the outlay are thus to be repeated, to the expenditure of another million of dollars. Let gentlemen not be blind to this scheme of extended and wild extravagance. Once entered upon, it cannot be stayed. If the bill now before the committee shall be rejected, my word for it, appropriation after appropriation, without stint, will hereafter be required. The plan is but little understood. The object to which one hundred thousand dollars was first appropriated, now demands one million; and we have just seen how that will give occasion for a million more! But, Mr. Chairman, I hear the gentleman from Pennsylvania, near me, [Mr. PETRIKIN,] in an undertone, declare that he will not vote another dollar, either to build up or to pull down. Sir, we must do the one thing or the other. The walls of the new Treasury building cannot be permitted to remain in their present condition. They now darken the windows of the State Department, and the materials prepared for their completion incumber the public way. The eye of the gentleman himself would not long endure the offence of the unfinished pile, nor his spirit of economy rest satisfied with the waste of property which might be applied to a profitable use. I trust he will yet go with me for the bill, if for no other reason than as a measur eminently consistent with his own professed policy of "retrenchment and reform."

A single point more remains te be considered. In addition to the authority to the President "to cause the unfinished walls of the Treasury building to be taken down," the bill provides:

"That the materials shall be removed and applied to the erection of a fire-proof building of such dimensions and plans of arrangement as may be required for the use and accommodation of the Post Office Department, on the site of the Post Office building recently destroyed by fire."

This application of the materials, the committee who reported the bill were fully satisfied was recommended both by expediency and a regard to economy. The want of accommodations for the Post Office Department is scarcely less urgent than for the Treasury. Since the conflagration of the former building, the business of the office has been conducted in inconvenient and insecure apartments, and the accumulated valuable papers and records, the evidences and assurances of multiplied and extensive contracts and disbursements, are constantly exposed to the imminent hazard of destruction. If it shall now be determined, as I trust it will be, that the walls of the Treasury building be taken down, the materials must necessarily, from their quantity, be removed to some other place, to prevent incumbrance to the adjacent grounds and streets, and it would obviously, therefore, be most judicious to transport them directly to the spot, where they might be immediately and advantageously used. The stone, somewhat defaced by the two-fold process of construction and removal, although not substantially injured, will be less objectionable on the proposed site for the Post Office than in the more conspicuous position which will doubtless be selected for rebuilding the Treasury, and the construction of the building will be hastened at least a year by this direction to their application. That the materials are appropriate to the object is vouched by Mr. Walter, the architect, who, in answer to inquiries addressed to him on the subject, has certified that "there will be no difficulty whatever in arranging the design for the Post Office so as to bring all the materials of the Treasury building into use, with very great advantage!" In this opinion Mr. Mills also has expressed his entire concurrence, and presented to the committee a plan for a building, in conformity thereto.

But, Mr. Chairman, I hasten to a close, and to relieve the committee from the heavy tax which I have exacted from their indulgence. I have endeavored to state, in a manner, I trust, to be understood, the weighty considerations which influenced the Committee on Public Buildings after a laborious investigation, extended through a period of nearly five months, to report to the House the bill under discussion. Theirs was a task of duty; and they have performed it with reference only to the high obligations to its faithful discharge. The subject, as it was presented to them, related to property and business, and they have treated it, not as a political, but as a practical question, in which the necessary accommodations of the Government, and the pecuniary interests of the People, were especially to be regarded, For myself, I have indulged, on this occasion, in none of those feelings of pride for a display of national taste, and of emulation for national distinction in the cultivation and encouragement of the arts, which may well become the statesmen of this great Republic, in an age of improvement in all which adorns a state of civilization and refinement. I have left it for this committee and this House to compare what is about to be done with that which already exists; to judge how far, in the construction of the public edifices, in a day of peace and prosperity, they will fall behind the liberality and grandeur which was indulged, in a time of debt, insecurity, and public embarrassment. I leave them to contrast the magnificence of this Capitol, and the Executive Mansion, erected by the order, aud in the far-reaching wisdom, of enlightened and high-minded predecessors, with the design of structures which are about to mark the period and the policy of their own legislation; and to decide for themselves how much the one will give pre-eminence to their fame, or be in keeping even with the standard of the other.

DEBATE ON MR. CLAY'S RESOLUTION.

IN SENATE, May 25, 1838.

REMARKS OF MR. NILES.

Mr. NILES said he regretted to see such distrust of the Executive branch of the Government in any question, and still more, in that whence he had just witnessed it. Must not some confidence, and some discretion, be reposed in the Chief Executive officers, acting under a high responsibility to the laws and the country? or is confidence only to be reposed in the banks? Are we to presume that the Secretary of the Treasury will do wrong, and be governed in our legislation by mere suspicion? Sir, what are we called on to do? Why, in the first place, it is proposed to make the receipt of the notes of eight or nine hundred State banks compulsory upon the officers of the Treasury; to legalize this immense mass of paper money, and make it a tender for all dues to the Government. It would seem that this was going far enough, as it is placing the Government in a situation in which no individual is placed, and in which no bank is placed, as they all possess and exercise the power of receiving or refusing the notes of other banks, as they may think is for their own interest. But the Senator from Virginia [Mr. RIVES] is not satisfied with this; he wishes to go farther, and compel this Government to disburse the bills of these nine hundred banks, however troublesome or inconvenient this may be to the Treasury. After the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] who introduced the resolution, seems to have become satisfied that such a principle would be dangerous, and has moved to strike it out, the Senator from Virginia comes forward to sustain it, with a modification, providing that the bills which may be received shall not be presented to the banks issuing them, unless there be reason to believe that the bank is unsafe. This permission would amount to nothing, for how could your officers, who would be required to take the notes of the most distant banks in the Union, know whether the banks were safe or not? The proposition would be a prohibition against returning any notes received for redemption or payment.

In what situation, then, would this Government be placed? Why, sir, it would be compelled, by its own laws, to receive for revenues the notes of eight or nine hundred local banks, to retain them until wanted for expenditure, and then to disburse them, however inconvenient, and at whatever sacrifice. The object seems to be, sir, to make this Government the great absorbing power of the bank circulation of the country. Our officers are to be compelled to receive, to retain, and to pay out the paper currency of the State banks. We are to tie up our hands, and deprive ourselves of a right which belongs and is exercised by the humblest individual in the country. We are to subject this Government to restrictions which the laws of no State impose on any individual, nor on any moneyed corporation. The Federal Government is to be fettered and bound hand and foot, and to receive and pay out the multifarious local currencies of the States, which are not only unsafe, but must be depreciated.

Do gentlemen forget that bank notes are, and ought to be, a mere local currency; that they are, and always must be, at a discount at all points remote from where they are issued. He spoke of a state of things when the banks are paying specie for their liabilities. Will not the bills of a bank at Bangor be at a discount in Illinois, where they will be receivable for the public lands? and will not the notes of the banks of Illinois be at a discount in Maine, where they must be received for customs? You propose, then, to force this Government to take depreciated paper, and, at the same time, to deprive it of the poor privilege, which belongs to every individual, of returning it upon the banks for payment, if it shall be found necessary. You propose to subject your Treasury, and the people who pay the taxes to supply it with funds, to restrictions which must not only be attended with great inconvenience, but expose it to heavy sacrifices.

Is the Treasury of the whole country to be subjected to restrictions which are imposed on no bank in the country? Sir, the Bank of the United States, instead of being compelled to receive the notes of all the local banks in the country, would not take even its own notes issued by the different branches. It commenced in this way; but at an early period, in 1818, he believed, it adopted a different system, and the notes or drafts issued by the different branches were refused to be paid at the parent bank and the branches, except the one issuing them. This rule converted the branches into so many independent banks, so far as regards their issues; and this practice, which was believed to be in violation of its charter, was justified on the ground of necessity. The Bank declared that it could not carry on its business, that it could not exist, if compelled to receive the notes even of its own branches. As to the bills of the State banks, it refused all except those in the same town or place.

The Senator from Virginia is afraid to trust the Secretary; he fears he will oppress the banks; and, on the ground of this suspicion, he wishes to take awy all discretion, and compel him not only to receive indiscriminately the notes of the nine hundred banks in the country, but also to pay them out, whether it is for the interest of the Treasury to do it or not.

Mr. N. said he would agree with the gentlemen so far as this: that the discretion left with the Secretary was too great; but he regarded it as a consequence of the system of using the local currency of the States. The true remedy for this was to return to the lawful and constitutional currency; that would remove all difficulties, and leave no occasion for a discretionary power. He would not, however, say that there was not a middle course; he thought there was, and that the discretion of the Secretary might be limited and regulated by law; but his honorable friend had not gone to work in the right way to accomplish this object; he should apply his discriminating and regulating principles not to the disbursement, but to the receivability of bank notes. He does not seem disposed to do this; he wishes to throw open the door of the Treasury to all the local currencies of the States, and then to take away all discretion from the Secretary in regard to the same. Sir, if there is to be any restriction on Executive discretion, it must be in regard to the receivability of the notes of the local banks. This might be an improvement upon the present practice, and on this subject we are not without light to guide our course. This light is from a source which he hoped the Senator would respect, and which he was sure his friends over the way would respect; they were bound to respect it. The authority and example was one which they could not disregard; it will not do for them to deny that the late Bank of the United States acted on correct principles in the collection and disbursement of the public revenues. And what was the practice of this institution in regard to the local banks when the collection and disbursement of the revenues was farmed out to it? The Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON,] informed us yesterday what it was; he read to the Senate the general rules of the bank, by which its conduct was regulated. These rules were, that the notes of no State banks should be received for public dues except those of banks in the city or place where the Bank of the United States or its branches were located. All State bank notes were excluded except those in the place where the payment was to be made. And the notes thus received were to be returned once a week, and the balance demanded in specie or its equivalent. The notes of the State banks were not paid out at all; they were returned on the banks issuing them weekly for payment. Such was the manner in which your revenue was collected when it was farmed out to the Bank of the United States. But we heard no complaints then; this practice was not then deemed oppressive or unreasonable. But suppose the Secretary should adopt a course as restricted and unreasonable as this? My word for it, sir, the welkin would ring with cries of oppression, distress, hostility to the banks, war on the currency, on the credit system, and the like. The bare suspicion that the Secretary may pursue an illiberal course towards the State institutions alarms the Senator from Virginia; he cannot trust the officers of the Government, acting under a high responsibility, but he can trust a bank, acting without responsibility, and governed by no other principle than its own interest. Ought not your own Treasury to be placed on as favorable a footing in regard to the local banks as a great moneyed institution, which had the use of your revenues for nothing, or the mere trouble of collecting?

Sir, said Mr. N. I am willing to restrict the Secretary by enacting the rules of the late Bank of the United States; indeed, he would be more liberal, more indulgent, and enlarge the circle of the banks whose notes should be receivable, and be satisfied with their being returned for payment once a month, instead of once a week.

It seems to be supposed, sir, that there is great hardship, that there is something oppressive, in calling on the banks to redeem their bills. We are to be compelled to receive them, with an express prohibition against presenting them for payment. On what ground is it, that it is claimed we ought to receive the notes of specie paying banks? Is it not on the ground of their convertibility; that they are equivalent to specie, because they can be converted into specie on presentment? No one, sir, dares to propose the receipt of inconvertible paper; but we are called on to take convertible paper, because it is equivalent to specie, and can at any moment be exchanged for specie; and, in the same breath, it is proposed to take away its convertibility, and, so far as the United States are concerned, to reduce it to a level with irredeemable paper. Such appeared to him to be the strange inconsistency of those who urge the propriety of receiving the issues of specie paying banks, and yet wish to take from the Treasury the power of demanding specie for their bills.

But, sir, it is not difficult to see the scope and object of the resolution before us. It is intended to make this Government the general absorbent of the paper currency, and this, on the ground, in part, of aiding the banks in resumption. At a time so critical and peculiar as the present, we are to apply a powerful stimulus to the banks. And why shall we do this? We are told, to aid the banks in resuming. But the solvent and prudently conductly banks do not want this artificial aid; they are resuming without it; they choose to stand on their own strength, and know they could stand on no other.

The error in our legislation, for some years past, has been, that we look only at the peculiar state of the revenue and the country at the present time. Congress has not acted with even the ordinary foresight which belongs to individuals. Many years ago, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEBSTER] said that, in matters of finance, it belonged to Government to have a little more foresight than pertained to private individuals. It was a very just observation, but he regretted that the Senator, in his course since, had not been more fortunate in illustrating his own maxim.

Without going back father than 1834, what has been the legislation of Congress in regard to the revenue and the monetary affairs of the country? At that period, there was a scarcity of money, and a stagnation of business; and not looking beyond the existing state of things, it seemed to have been supposed that the importations would be greatly reduced, and that the revenue would rapidly fall off. An empty Treasury was then the subject of apprehension; and bold and persevering attempts were made to alarm the country on this account. The banks would not be able to do any business; commerce would decline, and all the sources of revenue be dried up. He did not know that any legislation was consummated, springing from the views of the subject; but this was owing to the disagreement between the two Houses. But the majority in the Senate then entertained the sentiments he had expressed. They wished to adopt measures to stimulate the action of the banks, and revive commerce; and without the aid of Congress, it was confidently asserted that the monetary affairs of the country could not be restored to a healthful state, and commerce could not revive.

But what was the result? Congress did nothing, yet in the autumn of the same year, the Bank of the United States commenced a rapid expansion, and the other banks followed, which continued during the years '35 and '36. Business became unusually active, the importations during the two years, exceeded by nearly one hundred millions the exports, as well as the general average of importations for the five preceding years. The sales of the public lands were equally unprecedented, amounting in the two years to more than forty millions; and the revenue flowed into the Treasury like a flood tide, so that instead of an empty Treasury, the great difficulty was to get rid of an immense and alarming surplus. To dispose of this surplus, and diminish the revenue, was the great object at the last two sessions of Congress. Having disposed of the surplus in 1836, Congress in 1837, was occupied during the whole session in devising measures to reduce the revenue. A bill to check the sales of the public lands, by confining them to actual settlers, and a bill to reduce the imports were among those measures. Fortunately they were not consummated. All these measures originated from the state of things existing at the time, without apparently much foresight, as to the changes which might reasonably have been anticipated.

And now, sir, with this experience before us, we are still going on in the same way; we are legislating for the present condition of the country, without the least foresight; the blunders of preceding years are lost upon us; we are as blind as ever, and cannot see beyond the present moment. Surely, sir, we afford but little evidence that Congress possess more foresight than belongs to individuals. We are now urged to adopt this resolution, to apply a powerful stimulus to the banks, to force them into premature action, and by forced means, give activity to business. If this, or any other measure, would have such an effect, that would be the strongest reason why it should not be adopted. Shall be go on making laws for the present moment only, or shall we look a little ahead? Shall we suffer the lessons of the past to be entirely lost? Surely, sir, no great sagacity is necessary to perceive that the present state of things cannot continue long. The tide has long been out, and is now beginning to return, and shall we thoughtlessly build our house at low-water mark, so as to be swept away by the returning flood. Are not the fluctuations, the flood, and ebb tides in our monetary affairs and commercial interests, as certain, although not quite so regular, as those of the ocean?

Now, sir, is the time to have an eye to the future, and not to be wholly influenced by the present posture of affairs. What the country wants is stability: stability in its legislation, its revenue, its currency, and its commerce. The revulsion has spent its force; the crisis is already past; the country is gradually recovering, and business returning. This process has been going on its its natural way, and has gone on as fast as it could with safety. To attempt to force it, will be highly dangerous, and probably eminently mischievous. When there has been a long course of over-action, brought on by a redundant currency, the principal difficulty in getting back to a healthful state of things, is in reducing the currency and bringing down prices, which had acquired a factitious elevation. This is attended with sacrifices and sufferings. The country has already passed through this scene: the currency has been reduced from one hundred and fifty millions to one hundred millions of dollars, a reduction of thirty-three per cent. in one year; and prices are also reduced in proportion. Our imports having stopped, and the exports been continued, foreign exchange has become favorable, and specie is flowing into the country. In this state of things, the banks require no artificial stimulus: having reduced their excessive issues, they cannot help resuming. Resumption is a matter of course with all sound banks. He spoke of those banks which have reduced their circulation; but this was not the case with those in some of the Southwestern States, which may not be able to resume for a considerable time.

When the country has passed the crisis, and is recovering, and recovering as fast as it can with safety, will it be wise for Congress to interfere, under a mistaken idea of aiding the banks and reviving business? How was it, sir, in 1816, when Congress attempted to assist the banks in resuming? The excess in the currency then was vastly greater, and the resources of the country much less. At that time, the paper circulation had swelled to one hundred and ten millions, and was undergoing a process of reduction, when the Bank of the United States was put into operation in 1817. That institution checked the reduction, by introducing a new species of paper credit, and by discounting freely during the years 1817 and 1818. This gave a stimulus to business; and for one or two years the country enjoyed great apparent prosperity. But this forced and premature activity was short, and soon followed by a relapse, and years of distress and suffering, almost unexampled.

All the Western banks, and many others, had to suspend the second time, and most of them were entirely swept away. This was the result of the establishment of branches at the West which discounted freely. The notes they put out were sent to the Eastern cities for remittance, and the payments made to the branch banks were in local notes, and in that way a large amount of the paper of the State banks fell into the branch banks. The sudden and dangerous extension of its loans and circulation by the Bank of the United States during the latter part of the year 1817 and 1818, brought that bank into a perilous situation, and to save itself it was compelled to commence a rapid curtailment. The large mass of paper of the State banks, in its Western branches, was converted into specie, which broke all the Western banks in 1819. A second contraction of the currency commenced, and continued until the one hundred and ten millions was reduced to forty-five millions, a reduction of about sixty per cent. This produced a rapid reduction of prices, and a scene of sacrifices, distress and suffering, almost unexampled in this or any other country. As late as 1820, Mr. Crawford informs us, that notwithstanding the reduction of the paper circulation from one hundred and ten millions to forty-five millions, the currency then was far from being sound; that the resumption was little more thau nominal; and that a still further reduction in some sections of the Union must take place place before the currency could become sound. This opinion was proved to be correct, for it was not until the year 1824 that resumption was complete in all the Western States. Such, sir, were the fruits of forcing a premature resumption by the legislatton of Congress, and the application of an artificial stimulus. The banks suspended in 1814, and the resumption was not complete, and the currency generally restored to a sound condition, before 1824, a period of ten years. And yet, sir, with these facts upon our records, and before the world, we are constantly reminded of the important and beneficial agency of the Bank of the United States in bringing about specie payments, and restoring the currency in 1816. This beneficial agency cost the country immense sacrifices, and long years of distress and suffering, which might have been avoided had things been left to take their natural course. The country was recovering, the redundance of the currency reducing, when the artificial stimulus created by the Bank of the United States was applied, which produced a forced resumption, and a premature restoration of business before the banks or the country were prepared for it.

Sir, shall those lessons, so recent and so severe, be lost upon us? Shall we profit nothing by experience? Shall we go on committing one blunder after another, shaping our legislation with reference to present circumstances alone—not looking ahead a single year, nor scarcely a single month?

Sir, in the present condition of the country, no more foresight is necessary than what belongs to ordinary sagacity. The course of events does not depend on doubtful or uncertain causes, but on well known and well established principles. The country has passed the crisis; the currency has been reduced thirty-three per cent. and as low as is required; prices have been reduced, importations diminished, foreign exchanges have become favorable; specie is flowing into the country; the sound and well conducted banks are resuming, and business is reviving. All this has been accomplished in one year, and when the financial concerns of the Government have been separated from the banks; when in fact, sir, the Independent Treasury scheme, represented to be so hostile to the banks, has been in practical operation. The process has been going on fast enough; as fast as the condition of the country would admit; and as fast as its strength has been restored, its energies and activity have been displayed.

In this condition of the country, what course ought Congress to pursue? His opinion was well known; he was for confirming and establishing, by law, the practical separation, which has existed, of the Government from the banks; of disconnecting our financial interests from theirs. This is the policy of the majority of this body; but if we cannot carry it out, what then shall we do? Shall we remove the existing barriers which, to a certain extent, do separate our revenues and our credit from the banks? Shall we open the door of the Treasury wider than it has even been, for the reception of bank notes? Shall we apply to the banks in their present critical situation the powerful stimulus of the entire credit of this Government, and thus force them into action before they or the country are prepared for it? Sir, the danger is not that the banks will be too slow in their movements; it is the other way—that they will be too rapid; that they will extend their discounts and their credit too fast, and before the country is prepared for such a change. This is the danger; and shall we contribute to increase it, by an uncalled for and dangerous application of our credit? Sir, it is time to act with caution, and with some little foresight. He beseeched gentleman, and particularly the majority, to be careful how they moved at a time so critical as the present; to be cautious how they assumed the responsibility of measures which may give a sudden and dangerous expansion and enlargement to the currency and bank credits. What has been will occur again; the results which have been witnessed have not proceeded from accidental causes, but from fixed principles. If we apply the credit of the Government to the banks, they will suddenly extend their discounts, increase their circulation, and impart a factitious impulse to trade and every kind of business. Importations will suddenly become large, speculation will revive, and particularly in the public lands, and your Treasury will be once more overflowing.

If, sir, the separation cannot be brought about, at this time, consistency requires that we should remain where where we are. If we cannot advance, let us not recede: if we cannot complete the separation, let us not bring the Government into a closer connection with the banks. It was often true of nations, as of individuals, that their greatest strength isshown in standing still. Let us remain where we are, and stand on the joint resolution of 1816, and the deposite act of 1836. There were principles in those acts which produced a partial separation of the finances of the Government from those of individuals and corporations; the latter had occasioned an entire separation during the suspension, and would continue it after resumption, so far as respected all banks issuing notes less than five dollars.

He was was aware that the ground on which it is claimed that the Government should loan its credit to the banks, to aid them in resumption, is that it will relieve the country. But he denied that there were any examples in history that justified the interference of Government to relieve the people from the evils of a revulsion brought on by a redundant currency. When it had been attempted, it had increased the difficulties it was designed to remove. England is the country to which we look for examples; and can gentlemen point to any there? What measures did Parliament adopt for the relief of the country at the commercial revulsions of 1793, of 1814, of 1825, and during the past year? Were the evils the nation suffered, believed to be within the reach of legislation? and if so, what were the remedies that were applied? Will gentlemen be so good as to inform us? In 1825, it is true, or the following year, Parliament removed in part the monopoly of the Bank of England, so as to allow of private banking beyond sixty-five miles from London. But this was a remedy very different from what is proposed here; and the success of it has been a subject of controversy ever since in that country.

In regard to the Treasury order of July 1816, he had but a word to say. It has no doubt performed the office expected from it at that time, and the condition of the country is now very different from what it was then. Still a similar state of things may occur, and that soon. He had at the last regular session voted for what was called the currency bill; that bill when ordered to be engrossed, contained no principle inconsistent with the Treasury order; it was only a re-enactment of the joint resolution of 1816, with some provisions of a restrictive character operating on the banks, and designed to exclude small bills, and favor the circulation of specie. After the bill had its third reading, and when on its final passage, on the suggestion, he believed of the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] a provision was inserted similar to that in the present resolution, which superseded the Treasury order. But with this principle in it, he voted for the bill very cheerfully, because it was then the policy of the Government to connect its finances with the banks, and through that connection to attempt to regulate their issues; or at least to impose restrictions and checks upon them. As long as this was the policy of the Government, he considered the Treasury order as inconsistent with that policy, as a general rule, and regarded it only as a temporary measure. To collect the revenue in specie to be immediately deposited in banks, and converted into bank credit, and then to be loaned out again in such form as the banks saw fit, appeared to him a very useless operation, attended with inconvenience, and producing no practical results, as respects the introduction and circulation of specie. If the revenue operations of the Government are to promote the circulation of coin, it must be paid out as well as collected, for if deposited in banks, they will use it as the basis of paper issues. As long, therefore, as the revenues of the country were connected with the banks, he could see no efficacy in the Treasury order as a general principle.

But the banks having exploded, and the deposite system failed, the policy of the Government is changed. We now propose to separate our finances from the banks, and to get back to the lawful currency as fast as we can. We may be defeated in this, but it is the present policy of the Administration and its friends. Under these circumstances, he was not disposed to give up any principle which produced a partial separation. If we cannot advance, he was not willing to recede, but hold fast to what we had gained; to occupy the ground we now do, and yield nothing which might bring us into a closer connection with the banking and credit system of the country.

Believing that the Treasury order violated no principle, that there were reasons for applying a different rule to the lands, than may be applied to the customs—the first being a sale of public property at a fixed price, and not an indirect tax on the country, and regarding the order as consistent with the policy of a separation, he could not vote to supersede it. The customs are a tax paid by the consumers, and if the currency varies, or sinks below the proper specie standard, the whole country has the benefit of it; not so with the revenue from the lands; that is only the consideration of public property sold, and if paid for in a depreciated currency, the benefit goes entirely to the purchasers. It is in effect to reduce the price, which was fixed and established on a specie standard, and if that standard is reduced, the price is to the same extent reduced, and that for the exclusive benefit of the purchaser. He was aware, however, that a large majority of the Senate, believed that the Treasury order ought to be repealed, and he should be content with giving his own vote against that and every other part of the resolution.

REMARKS OF MR. HUBBARD.

Mr. HUBBARD said that in voting, as he should, against the passage of the resolution, he was unwilling that it should be inferred, from so doing, that he felt any hostility to the local banks. He had been, and he still was, their friend; and those institutions which should so conduct themselves as to deserve confidence and to merit support, would continue to find in him a firm friend. He could not well conceive how the vote he was about to give conflicted with this sentiment. He had reasons for voting against the resolution, which, from the course the debate had taken, he felt himself now called upon to state; but there was not an unfriendly feeling towards the State institutions which mingled with those reasons. He had long been of the opinion that the true interests of all well regulated banks, and the convenience of the Government and the safety of its funds, demanded that an entire practical separation ought to take place between the Government and the banks; that no longer should the affairs of the one be commingled with the affairs of the other. This he believed both the interests of the Government and the interests of the banks demanded. It is now proposed by the resolution on the table, that hereafter no discrimination should take place as to the kind of money in which the public revenue should be received; and the propriety of passing the resolution must depend upon the construction given to the joint resolution of April 30, 1816, and also upon the expediency of restraining the exercise of Executive discretion under that resolution. If the resolution of 1816 is general, imperative, and obligatory, he entirely concurred with the Senator from South Carolina, that there would be no occasion for the passage of the joint resolution now on the table; but he totally differed with the Senators from Massachusetts and South Carolina as to the true character, the fair import, of the joint resolution of April, 1816. It is contended by those gentlemen that the resolution is obligatory, absolute, and imperative; that it is general in its provisions and mandatory in its terms.

He entirely differed from those gentlemen in this matter. He did not, for himself, believe that that resolution could fairly or justly receive such a construction. That it had ever received such a practical construction by those charged with the execution of the laws, none would pretend. He had, on a former occasion, given, very much in detail, his views upon this subject; and after what had been said pending this debate, he felt no necessity, or even a disposition, to repeat his former arguments. But he hazarded nothing in saying that, under every Administration since the adoption of the resolution, the construction for which he now contended had been given to it. It has uniformly been regarded as a resolution, not general and universal in its obligations; not of the binding and absolute force of positive law; but merely permissive in its character. The law of 1789 required the revenues to be collected in gold and silver; special acts made Treasury notes receivable for the public dues; and the charter of the Bank of the United States had declared that the bills of that bank should also be received in payment of all taxes, and for debts due the Government. The joint resolution of 1816 was not called for to re-enact the provisions of those existing statutes. It neither added to, or took from, the power of those laws which made Treasury notes or the bills of the Bank of the United States receivable. But the resolution was passed to correct an existing, a growing, and an alarming evil. The Treasury Department had, from necessity, during the period of the war, been obliged to receive for the customs, for direct taxes, and for every description of the public dues, the notes of non-specie paying banks. This had been done not only without law, but against law. Necessity alone had compelled the Department to this cour e; and it was to check this evil that the joint resolution of 1816 was offered. The Senator from Massachusetts says that when he first proposed the resolution, it did not contain the provision permitting the receipt of the notes of banks which are payable and paid on demand in the legal currency of the country; that this was added by way of amendment. Suppose the resolution had been passed precisely in the terms in which it was offered by the Senator from Massachusetts, would it have added an iota to the existing laws? Certainly not. The purpose was to correct an evil practice, and not to enlarge the provisions of existing statutes. And if Congress had adopted the precise resolution offered by the Senator from Massachusetts, it would have been nothing more and nothing less than a declaration on the part of Congress, that the Secretary of the Treasury must thereafter desist from the receipt of local paper. But the resolution was amended; and will it be said that, by the terms of the resolution, the Secretary of the Treasury could require the revenues to be collected in the bills of the Bank of the United States, to the exclusion of specie, and of Treasury notes? Certainly not. Will it be said that he could require the revenues to be collected in the bills of local banks, to the exclusion of the notes of the Bank of the United States? Certainly not. The resolution provides that the Secretary of the Treasury "adopt such measures as he may deem necessary to cause, as soon as may be, all duties, taxes, debts, or sums of money accruing, or becoming payable to the United States, to be collected and paid." How? In what? 1st, in the legal currency of the United States; 2d, in Treasury notes; 3d, or notes of the banks of the United States;" which media of payment were then, by law, provided and declared; and the resolution further adds: "or in notes of banks which are payable, and paid on demand, in the legal currency of the United States." He would ask that, if the resolution had simply provided that the Secretary of the Treasury "ought to adopt such measures as he may deem necessary to cause, as soon as may be, all duties, taxes, debts, &c. to be paid in the notes of banks which are payable, and paid on demand, in specie," and contained nothing more, whether it would have repealed the act of 1815 making Treasury notes receivable? and whether it would have made it the bounden duty of the Secretary to have received such notes? He thought this could not, with propriety, be contended? The very language of the resolution gives to the Secretary a discretionary power—it does not impose an imperious obligation. It is either one thing or the other—it is either absolutely obligatory, or else confided to the sound discretion of the Secretary. He believed that this whole matter, by the terms of the resolution itself, was within the discretion and control of the Executive. He believed that the resolution was introduced and passed to correct an existing evil—to give to the Department the sanction of Congress that no further disregard of existing laws, in the collection of the revenues, would be countenanced. Such a declaration was made necessary: the state and condition of the country, the long continued practice of the Department, in the collection of irredeemable bank paper, absolutely required such an action on the part Congress, in order to produce a change in the practice. There was no alteration whatever in the obligation of existing laws, by the adoption of the resolution of April, 1816.

By the sixteenth section of the charter of the Bank of the United States, which was incorporated in 1816, it was provided "that the deposites of the money of the United States, in places in which the said bank and the branches thereof may be established, shall be made in said bank and the branches thereof, unless the Secretary of the Treasury shall at any time otherwise order and direct." And by the fifteenth section of the same charter it was made the duty of the United States Bank to transfer the public funds from place to place, without charge to the Government, as the bank might be thereto required.

After the adoption of the resolution, the notes of local banks which should be received in pursuance of its provisions constituted "a portion of the money of the United States;" and if the construction given to that resolution by the Senator from Massachusetts be correct, the Bank of the United States was bound to receive this description of money on deposite; and was equally bound to transfer it as a part of the public funds, as the Secretary of the Treasury might from time to time require, and that without charge to the Government. And yet one of the first acts of the Bank of the United States, after its incorporation, was a refusal to receive the notes of all specie-paying banks in deposite, and to credit the Government therefor as cash; and a refusal to transfer, in effect, this part of the public funds, when required by the Secretary of the Treasury.

The resolution of 1816 was thus regarded by the United States Bank, and by the Secretary of the Treasury, as it has ever since been regarded, not as imperative and obligatory, but merely as discretionary and permissive; and was then, and has ever since been, treated accordingly. The select committee appointed in 1823 to examine the charges against Mr. Crawford, then Secretary of the Treasury, so treated the matter. The charges made against Mr. Crawford necessarily produced a commentary upon the joint resolution of April, 1816. The committee remarked that—"At the time of the adoption of this resolution, debts accruing to the United States, whether on account of the sales of public lands, or at the custom-house, or from other sources of revenue, were, in fact, received in some parts of the country, but evidently in disregard of the law, in the notes of the State banks which did not redeem their paper by cash payments. By this resolution, it was obviously made the duty of the Treasury Department to correct that departure from law as soon as practicable; and it was, as is equally obvious, imperative on the Department, after the 20th February, 1817, to allow nothing to be received in payment of debts due to the United States, but the legal money of the United States, Treasury notes, notes of the Bank of the United States, or of those State banks, the notes of which were payable and paid on demand in cash."

And it would seem that language could not be more explicit, that the Secretary was not, after the 20th of February, 1817, "to allow" to be received depreciated local bank paper, in the collection of the public dues; but if the notes of State institutions should be received, the Secretary should allow only those "payable and paid on demand" in the legal currency of the United States, to be received. There is not in the resolution a partial direction to the Secretary of the Treasury to receive even this description of local paper.

Mr. Crawford had made large permanent deposites with certain local banks, amounting to nine hundred thousand dollars; the interest on which would be $54,000, and the committee state that,

"It is alleged in the memorial, that this sum of fifty-four thousand dollars was thus annually paid for receiving and transmitting the public money; a service which, it is said, the Bank of the United States was bound to perform without any compensation. The committee does not see the ground of this obligation on the Bank of the United States. That institution is, indeed, bound to give necessary facilities for transferring the public funds from place to place, but this can only mean cash funds; and it is bound, also, to receive money in deposite for the United States; but it is not bound to receive in deposite as cash, the bills of any banks whatever but its own, although they may come within the provisions of the resolution of 1816. The committee do not perceive any thing in the principle of these arrangements with the banks, either in violation of law, or contrary to the usage of the Government; since the Treasury has, for many years, had agreements with more or less of the banks, by which the public moneys were deposited in such banks, and drawn from them when wanted; certain terms and conditions, as to the mode of drawing, being stipulated, such as were thought beneficial, both to the Treasury and the banks."

He could not well understand how the committee could exonerate Mr. Crawford from the charge against him, if the joint resolution of 1816 was general in its character, and universal in its obligation. If the resolution had received the construction then which is now given to it, the course of Mr. Crawford would have been plain, and any departure from that course would have provoked the severest reprehension. If the resolution had been then considered as obligatory, Mr. Crawford would have been bound to receive the notes of specie paying banks, and to have deposited the same in the Bank of the United States and its branches.

But Mr. Crawford gave to the resolution the same construction prior to the investigation of the committee in 1823 which has been uniformly given to it since at the Treasury Department.

"On the 1st of August, 1820, the Treasury issued circular instructions to the receivers of public moneys, authorizing them to receive, in addition to specie and bills of the Bank of the United States and its branches, notes of the incorporated banks in Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Richmond, and in the States of South Carolina and Georgia, (except the City Bank of Baltimore,) and of those specie-paying banks in the State in which the land office is situated. 'This instruction,' it is added, 'supersedes those which have heretofore been given on the subject, except in so far as they prohibit the receipt of the paper of any bank which does not discharge its notes, on demand, in specie; and that prohibition must, in every case, be rigidly adhered to.'"

Here, then, was the construction given to the joint resolution of 1816 by Mr. Crawford himself; and this very circular was incorporated in the report of the select committee; and yet there was no objection made against this construction of Mr. Crawford by the committee who then had him on trial. Such had been the practice of the Government from the adoption of the resolution to the present period. He differed therefore wholly in the views which had been expressed by the Senators from Massachusetts and South Carolina as to the true import of that resolution. It gave to the Executive, in plain terms, the control of this whole matter—a discretion over this whole subject—and that control and that discretion had been exercised by the Executive Department as circumstances from time to time demanded. And had any complaint been made by the State banks, or by individuals, that this was an assumption of power on the part of the Executive, to receive the bills of particular banks, and of the banks of particular States, to the exclusion of all others? And yet the course of the Department has been perfectly well known, and no pretence whatever has been asserted, that the Department, in so doing, had disregarded the positive requirements of the law. As he had observed, the resolution was either imperative or permissive: if imperative, its obligation was universal, general, unqualified. There was no authority given to the Executive to receive the bills of any particular banks to the exclusion of all others; or the bills of the banks of any particular States, to the exclusion of the bills of the banks of all the other States. If the terms are absolute, there is no escape—there is no exception. The notes of all the banks which are payable and paid on demand in the legal currency are receivable; not the notes of the banks of Baltimore and of Boston, but the notes of all banks within the description; and if this be the fair construction of the resolution of 1816, there certainly was no occasion for the second clause of the resolution as originally offered by the Senator from Kentucky.

This, in his judgment, was not the true construction and the fair import of the resolution of 1816. He believed that by the resolution itself a descretion was given, and most properly given, to the Executive Department over that matter. And he believed that discretionary power should remain unchanged and undisturbed. He was willing to confide to the Executive this control. And had not the late President of the United States seen fit to have issued the Specie Circular, as it has been called, of July 1836, this resolution would not have been proposed. That order was promulgated by Executive authority; and in his judgment, it should be controlled, and, when necessary, annulled, by the same power which created it. The Executive is answerable and responsible for it.

He could not doubt that the President of the United States would rescind this circular whenever the interests of the country required it. If the reasons which induced its promulgation have ceased to operate, there can be no doubt that the order will be rescinded. It was the work of Executive power, and its causes and its effects must be well known to the Executive Department; and whenever a proper occasion shall arrive when this order shall be rescinded, he believed it would be done. He was disposed, at all events, to leave it to Executive discretion. It had been said, and undoubtedly well said, by the Senator from Alabama, and by other Senators, that this circular was in its origin a proper measure; that it was just and patriotic in its conception; that it was called for by existing circumstances; that it had performed its office, and that its repeal was now demanded. If this be so, and he could not gainsay it, as the sentiment had been repeatedly expressed by gentlemen better acquainted with the subject than he was, he could not doubt that its immediate repeal would take place, but he was disposed to leave it to Executive discretion. But what is the present resolution? To do away with all discrimination as to the kind of money in which the revenues shall be received hereafter; limiting the exercise of Executive discretion under the joint resolution of 1816. He doubted the policy of the measure. He was disposed to leave the whole matter, as it had been more than twenty years, entirely to Executive discretion. If there shall be, at any time, danger of loss from the kind of money in which the public dues shall be collected, that danger will proceed from the paper currency received for the public lands. There is no danger to be apprehended from the kind of money in which the customs shall be collected, for this plain reason, that disbursements on the Atlantic frontier keep pace with the receipts. There is no danger of there being at a port of entry any extraordinary accumulation of revenue from customs. Not so with the receipts arising upon the sales of the public lands; and it may be wise and prudent for the Executive, under the joint resolution of 1816, to inhibit the receipt of paper money at the various land offices for a time, until the accumulation can be transferred or converted into specie. The self-same cause which rendered the Specie circular of July, 1836, necessary, may again occur, and again demand the issuing of a similar order. And he would ask whether there would be occasion, or even a propriety, to extend that inhibition to the receipts for customs. No one would say that in July, 1886, there was the slightest reason for interdicting the receipt of paper money for customs; and yet if this resolution should become the law of the land, no such inhibition can hereafter extend to the receipts for the public lands, without embracing also the receipts for customs. He thought there might be an occasion for the exercise of such a discrimination. Senators had admitted that such an occasion existed in 1836. It may again occur, and for one he was not disposed to interfere with that Executive discretion over the subject which has existed since the adoption of the resolution. For these reasons he should give his vote against the passage of the resolution.

REMARKS OF MR. CALHOUN.

Mr. CALHOUN said, that he agreed with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEBSTER] that the resolution of 1816 conferred no discretionary power on the Executive, and that the Specie Circular was illegal and unconstitutional. Such was the unanimous opinion of the Opposition at the last session, and it was accordingly opposed, not only as having been issued without authority, but also on the ground that it was an assumption of power calculated to give vast influence to the Executive, and, as such, was of a most dangerous character, in which he understood the Senator concurred. Entertaining these views, it was impossible for him to vote for this resolution. It indeed superseded the portion of the circular that made a discrimination between the medium in which the public lands and the customs should be paid; but in doing that, it abandoned to the Executive the right to designate at its pleasure in what the public dues should be paid, with the single exception that he should make no discrimination between one branch of the revenue and another. He could never agree to confer such power on the Executive, or any other department of the Government. It would give a great and dangerous influence to that branch of the Government; and he must say, that after what he has heard from the Senator and his political friends in opposition to Executive power and influence for the last few years, he was at a loss to reconcile their votes on the present occasion with what they had so often avowed to be the principle on which they acted. Nor was his surprise diminished by the reason which he has assigned as a justification of his course.

He [Mr. W.] admits that this resolution surrenders the power in question to the Executive, and that he may, under the authority which it implies, direct the revenue, at his option, to be collected in gold and silver or bank notes; but alleges, in justification, that the power was in reality surrendered at the last session by the Senate, in voting for the measure introduced by the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. RIVES.] He would admit that that measure, like this, yielded the power, but he could not agree that those who voted for it believed that the Executive had the power to issue the circular. On the contrary, it is well known that the great body of the Opposition who voted for it regarded the exercise of the power as a plain and dangerous act of usurpation; but then, as now, were willing to yield it to get clear of a present inconvenience. The measure failed then to become a law, by the President withholding his approval; and now the Senator, on so frail a foundation, abandons a power to the Executive which he, and those who act with him, denounced as illegal, unconstitutional, and dangerous! He regards a mere vote of the body as sufficient to establish a most obnoxious principle without further struggle; and, for the purpose of getting clear of a temporary inconvenience, is willing to confer discretionary power too high to be entrusted to a Washington, on that department of the Government which he has so often held up to our jealousy and fear.

He admitted that where there was no principle involved, and where the subject was one of slight importance, we might regard a vote of the body as deciding the question; but, in a case like this, where the power and principle involved are of great importance, nothing could be more feeble and unwise than to surrender our ground on the first trial of streng h, and that under such doubtful circumstances. As connected with the subject, he would avail himself of the opportunity to state what was his course in reference to the circular at the last session. A Senator from Ohio, now no longer a member of the body, [Mr. EWING,] moved a resolution to repeal it. Though decidedly opposed to the circular, he hesitated to vote for his resolution, on the ground that he doubted the right of Congress to repeal an Executive order, though we might supersede it by passing an act inconsistent with it, as is now proposed by this resolution. He expressed his doubts to the mover, and the apprehension that a direct repeal might bring the Senate into a conflict with the Executive, in which it would be difficult to maintain our ground. It was, however, soon ascertained that the supporters of the Administration, who were opposed to the circular, would not vote for the repeal, on the ground that it denied the authority of the Executive to issue the circular, which they maintained. The consequence was a compromise between the Opposition and that portion of the friends of the Administration, and the measure of the Senator from Virginia was the result. Though urged to assent to it, he refused, on the ground on which he now opposes this resolution, that it abandoned the right to the Executive to issue the circular, to which he could not bring his mind to assent, either then or now. He had another reason. He then foresaw what was coming. He clearly perceived that the explosion would take place whether the circular was repealed or not; and he would not agree to do any thing by which the least share of the responsibility would attach to him. He was free from all blame, and was determined, as he now is, to avoid any acts by which the disaster that has befallen, or may hereafter, might be imputed to him. He intended, when the measure was on its passage, to have stated at large his views on the subject, and his reasons for voting against it; but was accidentally prevented, and as he did not choose to vote against it without presenting his reasons, he declined answering when his name was called.

He not only agreed with the Senator that the resolution of '16 conferred no discretionary power on the Executive, but that its object was simply to prevent the receipt of the notes of banks that refused to pay on demand. During the late war, the Treasury had been compelled to receive such notes, and the practice, as illegal and pernicious as it was, could not be arrested immediately on the return of peace, or without the intervention o the authority of Congress. Having performed the function for which it had been adopted, the resolution itself ought to be considered defunct.

He could not agree with those on the one hand, who considered it mandatory, or on the other, as conferring discretionary power on the Executive. It was a simple recognition of the long-continued practice of the Treasury to receive the notes of banks that were paid on demand, while it overruled the more recent practice of receiving those that were not; and it may fairly be considered as a sanction of the former, and the condemnation of the latter. It is well known how the practice originated. The act of Congress, passed in 1789, directed all the dues of the Government to be paid in gold and silver coins. The then Secretary of the Treasury, in the face of this positive law, acting under the dangerous and delusive idea still entertained by the Senator from Massachusetts, that bank notes were identical with gold and silver, ordered them, contrary both to law and the Constitution, to be received at the Treasury as specie. Congress acquiesced, and thus gave its implied sanction to this dangerous order, which has been productive of so much mischief. Thus things stood when the general suspension took place this time twelve months, when the Government became disconnected entirely from the banks. That event ought to be fairly considered as putting an end to a practice that ought never to have existed, and restoring the ascendancy to the laws, which are still on the statute books unrepealed, and which direct nothing but the legal coins of the Government to be received in the public dues. He regretted that the Executive did not seize the occasion, and rescind, as it might fairly have done, the original order of General Hamilton, and thus restore the currency to what the Constitution intended. It would have been, in his opinion, the proper course, and one in which the country would have sustained it triumphantly.

His object in making these remarks was not to influence the Senate, but to place himself on the ground on which he desired to stand in reference to this question. He saw what was coming, and experience had taught him the necessity, in discharging his duty, to guard against misrepresentation. No opportunity had been omitted for years past to distort and misrepresent all he said, or did, which he had been able to baffle only by a rigid adherence to what he believed to be right, accompanied by a faithful exposition of his views on all trying questions. He did not doubt but that another explosion would follow at no distant day; and he believed the Senate was moving precipitately and thoughtlessly in the direction that would produce it.

The Senator tells us that the present crisis is very like that of 1816. He could not agree with him. The two were in his opinion wholly unlike, both in the causes which led to them and the consequences likely to follow. The former occurred in a period of war, and grew out of circumstances connected with it; and as the only other general suspension that had ever occurred before took place under similar circumstances, (he meant the one in England,) the impression was that the suspension was the mere incident of war, and belonging exclusively to such periods. The only thing then thought to be necessary was to cause a resumption, when it was believed the system would move on steadly and successfully, without the hazard of a shock, till another war. We were all, in fact, at that time, very ignorant of the real character of the banking system, and the dangers to which it was exposed. But what is the fact now? The stoppage has taken place in time of profound peace and universal prosperity. The system has sunk down, and stopped on a dead level. It is in vain we again call on a United States Bank to put it in motion. The establishment of one would crush half of the existing institutions, and cause a derangement and distress greater than what followed in 1818, '19, and '20, after the establishment of the former.

The only safe remedy is the total and entire separation of the Government from the banks. The evil lies in the union, and the remedy in disconnection. That has already partially restored the system to a healthy condition, and, if persisted in, would affect a permanent cure. Had it not been for the separation, the disease, instead of being arrested in a great degree, as it is, would have been greatly aggravated, if not wholly incurable. Instead of resumption, bank paper would have gone on rapidly depreciating; all of the cities along the coast would have been interested in depreciating their bank paper. The more they depreciated it, the less duty, in point of fact, they would have had to pay, and the city that depreciated most would have drawn all the trade. The separation prevented this state of things, and threw the inducement into the opposite scale, that of resuming, instead of depreciating the paper. Continue the remedy, and a complete restoration would follow; but instead of that, our daily study is to get clear of it, and to return to that very state of things which caused it.

It is time we should reflect and understand the laws that govern the disease that now afflicts the country. When a suspension takes place, there are but two modes by which a cure can be effected; the one is to leave it to the gentle operation of time, without coercion, under the simple application that has been made in this case; and the other is to resort to a United States Bank, or some other instrument of coercion. The former has the advantage of effecting a cure without destroying the public institutions, and oppressing the debtor class, but leaves the patient subject to relapse. It simply brings the system back to where it stood prior to the attack, and leaves it exposed to another. To guard against a relapse, the tonic which stopped the disease must be continued. It must not be discontinued on the first intermission of the disease. Such is the present case. The tonic that has arrested the disease, as he has stated, is the withdrawal of the Government from a connection with the banks. It has brought the banking system back to where it was before the suspension, and, if continued, will restore it to health; but, if discontinued, will be sure to be followed by a relapse.

The other remedy is to establish a National Bank, and to keep the system right by its controlling influence; and those who are in favor of it are impatient to lay aside the remedy that has already proved to be so efficacious, and at the same time so gentle. They may succeed in that, but unless he was wholly deceived, they will be entirely deceived in their favorite remedy. It will be, in his opinion, impossible to establish a Bank. All the powerful existing institutions, and those that are contemplated, will be opposed to it, which, added to those who are opposed to it on the higher grounds of the Constitution and liberty, will interpose an obstacle not to be overcome. But if it should be established, it would prove but a temporary remedy. It would crush, as he has stated, half of the existing institutions, leaving an open space for its own operation; and during this state of things, the currency would be comparatively sound, and safe from the hazard of revulsion. But a new crop of banks would again spring up in the course of ten or fifteen years, which would again encumber and crowd each other, and cause another struggle for existence, just as was the case before the expiration of the charter of the late Bank, to be followed by similar, but more disastrous consequences.

He would say to those with whom he has been acting on this occasion, you have a good cause, and all that is wanting is firmness and fidelity to it. Be careful to avoid every act which will leave the people doubtful as to your sincerity. Nothing would prove so fatal to the cause. What has been done already has caused great mischief in unsettling the public mind. Nothing was so fatal to a good cause as art and management. He had had some experience in political affairs, and had never yet known a good cause, honestly and manfully maintained, fail to succeed.

REMARKS OF MR. BUCHANAN.

Mr. BUCHANAN said he would confine himself to a few observations on this question; because he desired that a final disposition might be made of the subject before the adjournment of the Senate to-day. He was decidedly in favor of the first branch of the resolution, which would repeal the Specie Circular; and was opposed to all the rest.

First, then, as to the repeal of the Specie Circular. He would not now go back to its origin, or discuss the question whether it ought ever to have existed. I shall consider this question, said Mr. B. under the aspect in which it presents itself at the present moment, and in the existing condition of the country. I find that the banks generally throughout this immense country are now engaged in a struggle to resume specie payments; in which may God speed them! The curse of an irredeemable paper currency is one of the greatest curses which can befal any people. It is then the imperative duty of this Government to remove every obstacle in the way of resumption which it can, and by all the means within its power to aid in this great effort. Upon this principle, I think that the Specie Circular ought promptly to be repealed. It is due to the people of the Western and Southwestern States. Whilst throughout the whole Atlantic frontier, the dues of the Government may now be paid in the notes of specie paying banks, in all the new States gold and silver alone are receivable. Whilst the customs are payable in bank notes, nothing but specie can be received for public lands. Is this equal—is it just, in the present circumstances of the country? I ask how is it possible for the Western banks to resume specie payments in the face of this Specie Circular? Should they make the attempt, what would be the consequence? In addition to the ordinary sales of public land by private entry, public sales of large bodies of land are now advertised throughout the Western and Southwestern States. If all the lands purchased must be paid for in specie, the inevitable consequence will be, a ruinous and exhausting drain of gold and silver from the banks in that portion of the Union, to supply the demand thus created. It will operate precisely like a foreign drain of specie from the banks of our commercial cities; because it will be transported to a great distance—to the extreme frontiers of the country—in order to pay the debts of the Government; and a great portion of it can never return to the places from whence it was taken. If this Treasury Circular should not be repealed, our brethren in the West will suffer all the evils of a depreciated paper currency; whilst we of the East will be redeemed from this calamity. And why? Because, whilst we in the East, under the joint resolution of 1816, will have the notes of our banks received in payment of the customs, the people of the West will have the notes of their banks excluded in payments of the public lands. I think that if the Government be not bound to aid the banks in resuming, it ought, at least, not to stand in the way. The resolution of 1816 ought to be rendered uniform in its operation thoughout the whole country, by the repeal of the Specie Circular; and all the banks and all the people ought thus to be placed on a fair and equal footing in their efforts to resume specie payments.

He could not agree with his friend from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON,] that the Specie Circular operated as a pre-emption law in favor of those who desired to become actual settlers and cultivators, and against speculators. Directly the reverse was probably the fact. Was it easier for the farmer to obtain specie than for the speculator? That was the question. Was it not manifest that the speculator—the man who could command extensive means and enjoyed the favor of the banks, could more easily procure gold and silver than the cultivator of the soil, who was almost obliged by the necessity of his condition to sell his productions for the common paper circulating medium of the country? He apprehended that it would be found, upon examination, that under the operation of the Specie Circular, the farmers who desired to purchase small tracts of land, had to obtain their specie from these very speculators; and that at an extravagant premium.

He was opposed to the second branch of the resolution of the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] for what he deemed to be the strongest reasons. We are (said he) engaged in a great struggle, and it is vain to disguise the fact. We must either have a Bank of the United States, or the Govern mant must keep and transfer its own money, by its own officers, from the time when it is received until it is disbursed. This is the question to be determined. I am in favor of the proposed separation of the Government from all banks; but this question may remain a long time undecided. Whilst we are engaged in the struggle—whilst the Sub-Treasury bill is pending before the other House, and before the country, shall we form a more intimate connection with the banks than has ever existed before? Shall we make the receipt of bank notes mandatory, when it has heretofore been only permissive—under the resolution of 1816? Whatever doubts might originally have existed as to the true meaning of that resolution, the uniform practice of the Government under it has settled its construction. The Treasury Department, and the Bank of the United States acting as its agent, have always determined what notes they would receive and what notes they would reject. The general rule has been the proper rule; and that is only to receive the notes of sound, specie paying banks, in the vicinity of our depositories, which can be immediately converted into specie, in case specie should be required to meet the demand of the public creditors. We have lived under the operation of this joint resolution for two-and-twenty years; and, during that whole period, it has been executed in such a manner that the notes of specie paying banks have always been received in payment of the customs. Can any body then suppose for a moment that the Secretary of the Treasury will now, at this late day, upon the repeal of the Specie Circular, disregard the practice of all his predecessors, and require all the dues of the Government, not only for public lands but for customs, to be paid in gold and silver? Certainly not. The Senator from Kentucky has himself read a letter from the Secretary to the president of a bank in New York, which conclusively proves that he has determined to receive, as formerly, the notes of sound, specie paying banks.

[At the request of Mr. BUCHANAN, the Secretary of the Senate here read that part of Mr. CLAY's resolution, relative to the receipt of bank notes, as follows: "And that, until otherwise ordered by Congress, the notes of sound banks, which are payable and paid on demand in the legal currency of the United States, under suitable restrictions, to be forthwith prescribed and promulgated by the Secretary of the Treasury, shall be received in payment of the revenues and of debts and dues to the Government."]

Now, said Mr. B. what is the difference, in point of discretionary power conferred on the Executive, between the Senator's resolution and the existing law? Nothing at all; unless we can suppose that the Secretary of the Treasury will arbitrarily refuse to receive the notes of all specie-paying banks, under the resolution of 1816. The Senator has himself admitted—every person must admit—that we cannot receive the notes of all the nine hundred State banks now in existence. Nobody will pretend that the notes of the Bank of Missouri, though it has always been a sound specie-paying bank, ought to be received in New York or Boston in payment of the customs. Neither will it be contended that the notes of a bank in Maine ought to be received in Arkansas or Louisiana in payment of public lands. From the very nature of things, in order to secure the public revenue, there must be considerable discretion vested in the Secretary of the Treasury. The Senator admits that, under his resolution, the Secretary must decide what notes shall be received, and what notes shall be rejected; what banks are sound, and what banks are unsound. Turn this question as you will—although in principle there is a great difference between the Senator's proposition and the resolution of 1816; because the one is mandatory and the other merely permissive—yet, in practice, they will be identical. His resolution, according to his own comment, amounts in fact to nothing more than the resolution of 1816, in the manner in which it has been construed and executed ever since its adoption; because the practice, under that resolution, has always been to receive the notes of such banks in the vicinity of the different collectors and receivers of the public money, as the deposite banks would accept from them, and place, as cash, to the credit of the United States.

Should the Senator's resolution be adopted, a consequence would follow to which I desire to direct his attention. It has been the general sense of the country that we should discourage the issue of bank notes of a less denomination than five or ten dollars. Without accomplishing this purpose, we can never have a specie circulation for the small every-day transactions of life, which we all desire. We have, therefore, for years been struggling to reach this result. According to the existing law, the Secretary of the Treasury cannot receive the notes of any bank which issues notes of a less denomination than five dollars. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. RIVES] has gone further, and has proposed gradually, and in a series of years, to exclude the notes of all banks which issue notes under twenty dollars. Ought we now to abandon this salutary principle, by making it mandatory on the Treasury Department to receive the notes of banks which issue one dollar notes, and shin-plasters? If not, then we ought to reject the latter branch of the resolution of the Senator from Kentucky. It is general in its terms, and will repeal all former restrictions of this nature.

Mr. B. would say a few words in regard to the remark of the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. Calhoun,] that he would not receive any thing in payment of the public dues, which he could not lawfully tender to the public creditor. He, Mr. B. would not now, whatever he might do in another condition of the country, vote for an immediate and unconditional collection of the revenue in gold and silver. Whilst the country was struggling for a resumption of specie payments, he would not vote for any measure which might prevent this consummation, so much to be desired. The gentleman from South Carolina had himself pursued a different course in the amendment which he proposed to the Sub-Treasury bill. By that amendment, he had authorized the reception, as heretofore, of the notes of specie paying banks for two years, and afterwards excluded them gradually for the six succeeding years, so that eight years must elapse, before we could reach an exclusive metallic currency for the General Government. This was acting like himself; it was acting like a statesman. He [Mr. CALHOUN] knew that sudden and violent changes could not be made in the settled policy of a country, without doing the people great injury. In such cases, all great reforms must be gradual, in order to be successful. He, therefore, had provided that eight years must elapse, before we should require the dues of the Government to be paid exclusively in specie. This was the true policy, and he Mr. B. would continue to pursue it. He could not, therefore, but express his regret, that the Senator from South Carolina was now in favor of requiring the revenue of the Government to be collected immediately and exclusively in gold and silver. Mr. B. could not go with him in this policy.

On the whole, he should vote for the first part of the resolution, because he thought the discrimination ought now to cease in the medium of payment required for public lands, and for the customs: and he would vote against the second part of the resolution, because it made the reception of bank notes mandatory, and not as heretofore permissive; because in practice, except in one particular, it would prove to be the same with the existing laws; and because, in that particular, which was to receive the notes of banks which continued to issue notes of a less denomination than five dollars, he was wholly opposed to the policy of the Sennator's resolution.

MR. CLAY'S RESOLUTION.

SPEECH OF MR. BENTON,

OF MISSOURI,

In Senate, Friday, May 26, 1838—On Mr. CLAY's resolution to rescind the Treasury Order, and to make bank notes receivable and disbursable by the Federal Government.

Mr. BENTON said the resolution before the Senate contained three propositions, namely: 1. To rescind the Treasury Order of July 11, 1836; 2. To make the notes of all specie paying banks receivable in all payments to the Federal Treasury; 3. To make the same notes a conditional tender in all payments from the Federal Treasury. He was opposed to each branch of this resolution, and would give his reasons for his opposition to their passage with the brevity which the occasion required, and with such force and precision as he might be able to command.

The Treasury Order was the first point to be discussed; and the first inquiry on that point was the question, What was the Treasury Order? The answer to this question is, that the Treasury Order of July 11, 1836, is nothing but a continuation of the twenty-fourth and twenty-fifth articles of the by-laws of the Bank of the United States of January 3, 1817. Those by-laws excluded the notes of all the State banks from all payments to the United States on account of the public lands, and the Treasury Order did precisely the same thing, and no more. This is a copy of those by-laws:

"ARTICLE XXIV. The offices of discount and deposite shall receive in payment of the revenue of the United States the notes of such State banks as redeem their engagements with specie, provided they are the notes of banks located in the city or place where the office receiving them is established; and, also, the notes of such other banks as a special deposite on behalf of the Government as the Secretary of the Treasury may require.

"ARTICLE XXV. The offices of discount and deposite shall at least once every week, settle with the State banks for their notes, received in payment of the revenue, or for the engagement of individuals to the bank, so as to prevent the balances due to the office from swelling to an inconvenient amount."

These two articles constitute the Treasury Order, for they operate a complete exclusion of the State bank notes from all revenue payments, both lands and customs. Under these by-laws no notes could be received on account of the United States from any State bank unless the Bank of the United States had a branch in the same place where it was situated. This limitation cut off nearly all the local banks. To the few which were not cut off, a serious injury was done by the nominal exception in their favor; for it caused their notes to be taken out of circulation, and to be presented to them for redemption at least once in every week. These by-laws were enacted in January, 1817, and the Bank of the United States acted upon them until the removal of the deposites in October, 1833. During all that time, with the exception of a few years, when the Bank of the United States was in a state of paralysis, and did no business, the notes of the State banks were excluded from the land offices, and not a word of complaint was heard against it. Neither politicians, nor local banks, nor purchasers of public lands, uttered a word of complaint. They were all satisfied; and such of them as wished a recharter of the National Bank were not only satisfied with this exclusion, but were in favor of continuing it; for a recharter of the Bank was a continuation of the by-laws which excluded State bank notes from all revenue payments.

Upon the removal of the deposites the door of the Federal Treasury was opened to the reception of local banks; they were received for lands and customs; and whatever notes the deposite banks would agree to credit as cash were received as cash. This rule was a wide and a loose one; and besides being wide and loose, it delegated to the deposite banks the high function of deciding what should, and what should not, be the currency of the Federal Government. This high function was left to the discretion or the caprice, to the ignorance or the knowledge, and to the selfish and interested arrangements of the banks; and the consequence was a laxity and uncertainty in the reception of notes which, while perpetually changing the list of receivable notes, to the annoyance and oppression of the people, and to the profit of brokers and money dealers, was always operating in the same way upon the Treasury; that is to say, filling the Treasury with notes as cash which could not be cashed when the Government wanted the cash. So great was this evil that a Senator, Mr. EWING of Ohio, complained of it in the Senate in the spring of 1836—a few months before the Treasury Order was issued—and proposed to apply some remedy to the mischiefs of these fluctuations. Notes continued to be received; the public lands were rapidly changing for bank credits; and the President interfered to protect the national domain and the Treasury, by doing what the by-laws of the Bank of the United States had done from January, 1817, up to the time of the removal of the deposites. He interdicted the reception of bank notes for lands; and this interdiction had no other effect upon the currencies of the local banks than to place them precisely where they had been under the by-laws of the National Bank.

An outcry was immediately raised against President Jackson for issuing that order; and that outcry originated with the Bank of the United States and its particular friends. They treated as an indignity, and as an injury, to the local banks, the very exclusion of their paper which that bank had itself practised; and from that day to this they have been the leaders in the clamor against the Treasury Order. This is glaring and gross inconsistency. They condemn in the President of the United States what they applaud in the president of the Bank of the United States! They approve the exclusion of local notes by virtue of corporation by-laws, and they condemn it when done by the constitutional Executive of the country! Nay, more. These very persons, while opposing the Treasury Order with one hand, were supporting it with the other; while demanding its repeal, they were also demanding its re-enactment; while crying Down with it, they were also crying Up with it; they were blowing hot and cold with the same breath, and presented a fine illustration of that contradictory position in which the operator looks one way and rows the other. They are for a National Bank, and they are against the Treasury Order; they want a bank established, and they want the order rescinded; as if the very first act of the Bank would not be to re-enact the 24th and 25th articles of the by-laws, and thereby to do what the Treasury Order does—excluding these notes again, as they were before the time of the removal of the deposites! To all the friends and advocates of a National Bank then, the objection of inconsistency, gross, glaring, inexplicable inconsistency, attaches! Their objections can be of no weight—their complaints are of no force—their sorrow is of no avail—their grief is a cloud without rain, until they can deny the fact, or explain the difference to the banks and to the people between an exclusion of State bank notes by a corporation by-law, and a Treasury Order. They must deny or explain, before they are entitled to the credit of believing what they say, or intending what they propose. They must deny or explain; and they can do neither. They must show they have faith in their own works, before they can ask any body else to believe in them; and as they cannot do this, they must be set aside in the discussion, and left out of the debate. They must be left out, so far as replies to them would apply. Reply to them is useless, so long as they remain in their contradictory and inexplicable position.

But there is another class of objectors to this Treasury Order who are entitled to replies—the class which is opposed to a National Bank, and consequently free from inconsistency, and free from the appearance of being for and against the same measure in the same breath. This class are entitled to replies, and they shall have them with the freedom and fullness which truth and confidence inspires. I say to that class, then, that they are totally mistaken! mistaken in every particular, and at every point! Mistaken in their opinion of the interest of the settlers in the new States—mistaken in their opinion of the interest of the new States—mistaken in their opinion that it is an indignity to the new States—mistaken in their opinion of the interest of the public Treasury—mistaken in their opinion of the interest of the banks—mistaken in their opinion of the wishes of the Western people—and utterly mistaken in their opinion that there is no more evil to be apprehended from receiving bank notes for lands than for receiving them for custom-house duties. The whole a budget of blunders—the whole a chapter of mistakes; and so I will demonstrate to them now, and so will time prove to them in a few short years.

And first, as to the interest of the settlers in the new States. To all such settlers, whether now in these new States, or to go there hereafter, the Treasury Order—that order which requires hard money from all persons for public lands—is the most equitable and beneficent that ever emanated from the Federal Government. In the first place, it is a pre-emption law, in substance and in effect, though not in name. It protects the settlers, and the purchasers for cultivation, from the competition of bank facility speculators and paper money capitalists. These characters, as long as paper money is receivable for public land, have undue advantages over the settlers and cultivators. They come with bundles and bales of paper, borrowed at the banks, and outbid the settlers at the public sales; and they sweep the townships at private entry, when there are no public sales. While farmers are waiting to get in a condition to purchase some quarter sections near him, either to extend his farm, or to procure future homes for his children, along comes a bank facility character, with his quires and reams of paper money, and sweeps a township of all its vacant land at once. So it has been heretofore; so it will be again. The Treasury Order of July 11, 1836, protected the settlers and cultivators from the competition and monopolies of these characters from the day it issued to the present moment, and so it would continue to do if it remained in force. We all profess—all who come from the new States profess—to be in favor of a pre-emption law; and yet here is an Executive regulation operating as a pre-emption law, and conferring the essential advantages of such a law; and yet many of the new State Representatives and Senators are for repealing it, and repealing it before the pre emption bill is passed which was sent from this chamber to the House of Representatives so many months ago. We have no pre-emption law now, nor any thing as a substitute for it but this Treasury Order; yet we repeal the order, and run the risk of subjecting all the settlers to the competition of paper money bidders and bank note manufacturers. Even if our pre-emption bill was passed, it would only protect settlers up to the close of the last year, while the Treasury Order would protect all up to the present time, and in all time to come. Regarding the order, then, as a species of pre-emption law, operating permanently, uniformly, and equally in favor of all settlers against competition and interference from speculators and paper money capitalists, I cannot consent to aid in rescinding it.

In the second place, the Treasury Order is a complete protection to the people from the impositions and losses resulting from the fluctuations and changes in what is called "land office money" as long as bank notes are received. All the notes of all the banks in the Union cannot be received. That is impossible, without surrendering the public lands at once to pillage, and the public Treasury to disgrace and bankruptcy. All the notes of 900 banks cannot be received; there must be selections and limitations; and in making these selections and limitations, there is a dangerous latitude allowed to those who make the selections; bad banks may be selected and better ones rejected, and perpetual changes will be inevitable. What is land office money in one place is not land office money in another place; what is receivable to-day may not be receivable to-morrow; and the industrious, hard-working cultivator and settler is the victim of all these uncertainties and variations. The farmer is the sufferer; he who, remote from the seat of power, and occupied with his meritorious labors, learns nothing of these changes until after they are made; and, after obtaining at a premium one supply of land office money, has to change it for another, paying another premium; at the same time giving as good, or better notes, than those which he received. To such a degree had this evil grown, when local notes were receivable, that the abuse had ripened into a trade; and at most of the land offices brokers were stationed to prey upon the farmer when he came in, by accommodating him with land office money—giving him notes no better than those he brought, and receiving five or ten per cent. premium. Against this abuse there was no protection; for the land office money was always changing with the changing credit of the banks, the change of orders, and the sense of duty in some, the caprice of others, and the interested views of more, among those to whom the power of selection and rejection was confided. To save themselves from these impositions, many farmers supplied themselves with hard money, even when notes were receivable; and many will continue to do it. It is an illusion and a dream to suppose that the agricultural community are benefitted by paper money payments for lands. They have to give the premium for land office paper money, as well as for hard money, if the paper they have in hand is not equivalent to specie. If it is not equivalent, the Government ought not to receive it. If it is equivalent, it can be exchanged for specie without loss. The whole benefit of receiving paper for lands goes to speculators. The evils of it fall upon the farmers and the Government; and to the farmers one of the great evils is the perpetual changes in the list of receivable paper. From such changes, the uniform and simple rule of hard money payments is the only safe and practicable relief. That farmers cannot obtain the hard money in sufficient quantities to buy the lands is an opinion disproved by the experience of the last year. The Treasury Order was then in full force; and, besides that, the banks had suspended specie payments. Yet the hard money received for the lands exceeded seven millions of dollars, being the largest sales ever made, except in the years of wild speculation.

A third injury to the settler and cultivator from the use of paper money in the land sales, is in the fact, that the sales are for ready money to them, and on credit to their bank facility competitors. The act of 1820 abolishes credit; and this abolition is complete upon the farmer; he has to earn his money before he pays it. But the speculator, instead of earning the money, borrows it of a bank and so gets the land upon credit. It is to him a credit sale; the only difference is, that the banks give the credit instead of the Government. To the parties concerned, it is the same thing as if the old credit system was still in force in behalf of speculators, and not in force in behalf of farmers. And thus the settlers and cultivators are put to the disadvantage of competing with those who are purchasing on credit, while they themselves are purchasing for ready money.

For these reasons, being a few out of many that might be offered, I consider the recision of the Treasury Order as decidedly injurious to the interests of the settlers and cultivators; and being always on their side against speculators and monopolizers, I should adhere to the order on their account, even if there were no other reasons for doing so.

The next mistaken opinion, as I conceive it to be, is in the supposed injurious effects of this order upon the general interests of the new States. It is alleged by gentlemen to be injurious to those States; but they do not explain wherein, and it is impossible to discover how it is so. On the contrary, I can easily see how this order operates largely and most beneficially in their favor. It causes the emigrants to carry gold and silver into the country, and it is almost the only way to get it into the interior. Hard money does not grow in the new States; it is an exotic production, chiefly coming from foreign countries; and New York and New Orleans are the two principal points of its importation. The new States are entitled to a share of the precious metals; they cannot carry on their business without specie. In the revival of the currency of the Constitution, and in its increase in six years from twenty millions to one hundred millions of dollars, they are entitled to their proportion of these advantages; but how to obtain it is the question. The gold and silver arrive at the sea ports; the mints also are at the sea ports, except the local gold mints of Georgia and North Carolina. The great importations, and the great coinage, are both at the sea ports; and now how is the diffusion of these importations and of this coinage to be effected, so as to give to the interior and frontier States their fair proportion of the precious metals? Merchants will not carry it there. Their operations are the reverse; they carry it off. Banks will not take it there; on the contrary, they collect it, sell it, or ship it. How, then, are the remote new States and frontier States to be supplied? The answer is, by emigrants and by Government payments. This is the answer, and such has been the effect under the Treasury Order. It has caused much specie to flow to the interior, but not a tythe of what our specie policy has caused to be imported from foreign countries; it has restored a part, but only a small part, of the many times ten millions of dollars which the Bank of the United States collected and took from the West; it has caused a part of that specie to go to the interior of our own country, which, otherwise, would have been shipped off last summer. In fine, it is easy to see that the Treasury Order is beneficial to the new and interior and frontier States, both in causing emigrants to carry specie there, and in enabling the Government to expend specie there; and it is impossible to discover or to explain how it should be injurious to those States. The opinion is unfounded, and what renders it almost ludicrous is the complaint on the other side—the complaint to the contrary—the complaint of the old States, that it injured them by drawing off their specie. This complaint has been made with as much gravity as the other, but without justice or reason; for surely the new States are entitled to their proportions of the importations of specie and the coinages of the mint. They are entitled to their proportions of these supplies, and the Treasury Order helped them to a little, but by no means to the full measure of their proportion.

Indignity to the new States is the next opinion in which I hold these gentlemen to be mistaken. They assume it to be a great indignity to the new States to reject paper money at the land offices in those States, while such money is received at the custom-houses in the Atlantic States; and they call upon the new States to resent this imputed indignity. Now, sir, where was all this patriotic wrath during the whole time that this same exclusion was effected under the by-laws of the United States Bank? and where will it be if another National Bank is chartered? The local notes were excluded during the main part of the existence of the National Bank; yet these sensitive gentlemen, so alive to the honor of the new States, never once brought forward their patriotic indignation against the act of that Bank. They will assuredly be excluded again if another National Bank shall be established; yet the gentlemen most clamorous now on account of this indignity, are in favor of a National Bank; and consequently in favor of receiving indignity from that institution. If gentlemen really want a subject of indignity in point of discrimination in collection of the revenue, let them look to the discrimination between credits at the custom-house, and ready money payments at the lands. The merchants have long credits on the duties; the farmers have none on the lands. The merchant is allowed time to sell his foreign goods, and to raise the money for the duties out of the sales before he is required to pay the Government; the farmer is allowed no time to raise the money out of the land. He pays in advance. The old law which allowed him to pay by instalments, and five years to complete his payment, and by which he could always raise a part of the money out of the land, has been repealed, and all credit denied. The cultivator of the soil is denied credit, although the United States retained a lien on the land; the merchant has a credit, incurs no lien, and gives nothing but ordinary bonds and securities. This is a real case of discrimination to the disparagement of the people of the West, and worthy to occupy the feelings of Western gentlemen. It was made in 1820, when the credit system for lands was abolished. The inequality has often been complained of on this floor; bills have been brought in to correct it, and to make the duties payable in ready money as well as the lands. I have supported such bills always; but have not been fortunate enough to obtain much aid from those who are now so indignant at a discrimination which does not concern men, but corporations; which, instead of being injurious, is in the highest degree beneficial to the West. As a mere Western man, I would prefer that the revenue should be paid in paper at the East, and in gold and silver at the West; it would occasion the precious metals to flow to us, and the paper to fly to them; but as a citizen of the Union, and as a member of the National Legislature, I would have the hard money payments established in a reasonable time for every branch of the revenue. I am for the act of 1789—that act which required the public dues to be paid "in gold and silver coin only."

In its effects upon the public Treasury, I hold the recision of the order to be eminently disastrous. It must lead to another accumulation of unavailable funds. What has been experienced heretofore must be experienced again. The scenes of 1817–18, and of 1835–36, must be witnessed again. It is to no purpose that bank notes are received as cash; they are not cash; and when cash is wanted for them by the Treasury, that truth is always ascertained. They were received as cash; they have to be paid out as cash. It is all a quasi business. We have now in the Treasury masses of notes received for lands in 1817–18–19; we have also in the late deposite banks some four or five millions of notes received in 1835–36. They were all received as cash; yet cash cannot be had for them. After paying out millions of their depreciated notes at a former period, and again during the last year, to the immense loss of credit and popularity in the Government, there still remains many millions which cannot at present be used at all. All this must be gone over again if the land offices are opened to the deluge of paper money. Gentlemen say the Treasury Order has done its office; that it has put an end to speculation in the public lands, and has reduced the sales from twenty-five to seven millions per annum. Granted: The Treasury Order has done all this; and in doing it, has rendered an immense service. But, restore the circumstances of 1835–36; open the land offices again to the reception of paper money; and the Treasury Order will have to perform all its work over again. It will have to do its office a second time; and that after great mischiefs have first been suffered before Congress can be brought to act.

Mistaken in so many points, there is no one in which gentlemen are more mistaken than in supposing the interests of the Western banks to be injuriously affected by this order. And here we have a fine contradiction between the opinions of those who oppose the order. One division of them opposes it because it is too favorable to the Western banks; because it causes them to be filled up with gold and silver; and because the injury is not to them, but to the banks of the Atlantic cities. This is the doctrine of Mr. Biddle's letter to Mr. Adams; and is, of course, the doctrines held by the Atlantic division of the Treasury Order assailants. This objection is popular in the East; it goes well in the Atlantic States; but it will not do at all in the West. It can have no place there. Therefore a reversal of the objection becomes necessary. It must be opposed in the West upon a contrary reason, and because it is injurious to Western banks, and will deprive them of their specie, and destroy them if they attempt to resume specie payments. Such is the contradiction between the two wings of the line which assail this order. Sir, the objection is equally unfounded in both particulars. The Atlantic banks have their ample supplies of specie in the vast importations of gold now arriving in New York; the Western banks will be strengthened by the continuance of the Treasury Order; for it will increase, instead of diminishing, their specie basis.

The receivability of their notes for lands, instead of aiding, will end in crippling and injuring the Western banks. They can force many notes into circulation by the credit of such receivability; but what is to become of those notes? They are taken out of circulation to be put into the land offices. Every person going to a land office will hunt for those notes; he will gather up by exchange, purchase, loan, and in every manner that he can obtain them. He will pay them to the Receiver, and masses of them will accumulate in the office. They then belong to the Government, and must be disposed of in some way; either paid out to public creditors, or sent to the bank and cashed, or transferred to some other quarter of the Union. If paid out to public creditors, to the military, or to the Indians, they fall in masses into the hands of suttlers and Indian traders, who quickly present them to the bank from which they issued, for specie or its equivalent; if not paid out by the Government, the disbursing officer must present them for redemption; and, if the receipts at the land offices exceed the disbursements of the Government in that quarter, the excess must be transferred to some other quarter; and in that event, nothing but specie, or its equivalent, will be transferrable. Thus, act as the Government may, the notes thus stimulated into circulation eventually come back upon the bank; and when they come back, they must be paid in something else besides land office credit. The theory of banking is, that for each bank note which goes out, there shall be something put into the bank to redeem it: the experience of all banking is, that no forced or stimulated issues can be kept afloat. Excessive issues will return; and the notes put out on the credit of the public lands, will return immediately. Often they go straight to the land offices, and return straight back. No bank can rely upon such a circulation; every one will be deceived that attempts to rely upon it. A general receivability of the notes of a bank all over the Union will make the fortune of a bank; but a limited local receivability is disadvantageous and dangerous. Sir, this is not merely theory; it is experience also. All this experiment has been tried. When the Bank of the United States fell into a paralysis in 1818–19, and could do no business, the notes of the Western banks were made receivable for public lands. This privilege was sought by the banks with avidity; and, when obtained, the bank considered itself on the high road to honor and to fortune. Yet what was their fate? Disastrous in the extreme! Every such bank—I believe every one without exception—was wound up in a few years; some with great loss to the Government, some without loss to the Government, but with death to themselves. The history of that period should not be forgotten. It should be well remembered, not only by Congress, but by the banks themselves, and by the Secretary of the Treasury. It contains proof that banks cannot live upon Government credit, and that Secretaries of the Treasury cannot so act in the reception or rejection of bank paper as to escape the most cruel and harassing persecutions. No Secretary ever was, or ever can be, more faithful, honorable, disinterested, and able than Mr. Crawford; yet the House of Representatives teemed for years with charges and accusations against him. All that he did, and all that he omitted to do, in the reception or rejection of bank paper at the land offices, was equally a matter of attack; and, although he issued from the contest as pure gold from the fire, yet it was at the cost of health, and quiet, and peace. His fate should be a warning to every Secretary that has to tread the same path; and, I now announce, in my place here, beforehand, that a succession of attacks, commencing with the first order that he issues, and to be continued until after the next Presidential election, awaits the present Secretary of the Treasury! Do what he may, and omit what he may, his commissions and omissions will all bring the same fruit to him. Attack! attack! attack! will be the portion which he will have to receive until November, 1840. He will be pushed at with a long sword—long enough to go through his body, and pierce a gentleman beyond him.

Another opinion of gentlemen is, that this order is odious in the new States. This is their assertion; but where is the evidence of it? The order has been in force nearly two years. It was made a subject of party attack the moment it issued. It has been a subject of party attack ever since. In Congress and out of Congress, party spirit has constantly assailed it; but with what effect? I know of but one legislative memorial against it, and that one comes from Indiana, where the Opposition is in the majority. Except that memorial, I know of nothing from the people or their local representatives on this subject. No petition has come in; and, so far as my knowledge extends, no letter has been received, calling for the recision of this order. The people of the West have manifested no opposition to the order; and it is a gratuitous assumption to aver their discontent. I do not undertake to say that all are for it; on the contrary, I know the Opposition party to be against it, as they are against every measure of the Republican Administration; some persons interested in banks are against it, because they wish to make the national domain a fund to bank upon; the speculators are all against it, because it puts an end to their speculations. These classes are against the order, but the body of the people are for it. They know it to be salutary and beneficent in its operation. They know it to have been attacked because it was too favorable to the West—because it transferred gold and silver from the East to the West—because it filled the Western banks with specie—because it made specie the common currency of the people in the West. They know the order to have been attacked on these grounds; and they know that while it in reality caused specie to flow to the West, it caused no more to flow there, and, in fact, not as much to flow there, as the people of the interior are entitled to receive out of the foreign importations and from the coinages of our own mints. The sea port towns are not entitled to the whole importations of specie and to the whole coinages of the mint; the interior of the country is entitled to a share; and the effect of this order was to give them a share, but by no means a full share. Gentlemen, then, are mistaken in averring this order to be odious in the new States. Great efforts have been made by politicians to render it odious; a political clamor has been kept up against it; but the fact that not one petition, no legislative memorial, except from an Opposition State, no letters even, have been received against it, is conclusive evidence that there is no foundation for the assertion that is here made.

Finally, gentlemen suppose there is no reason for excluding notes from the land office, which do not apply with equal force to the customs. This is a mistake. There is a great difference in the evils of the receivability at the two places; and, while I adhere to the act of 1789, and of 1800, which made gold and silver the only currency of the Federal treasury, and shall never consider the Treasury safe until those acts are re-established and enforced, yet I can see manifest reasons for excluding paper money from the land offices which do not apply to the customs. In one case, there is a limit upon the amount which can be received; in the other case, there is no limit. In one there is danger of exciting a spirit of speculation; in the other there is none. In one you may lose the whole national domain, the land itself as well as the paper received for it; in the other you can lose nothing but the paper received. These are clear propositions which have but to be seen in order to be felt and understood. There is no limit to the amount of paper money which may be paid at the land offices, except in the quantity of the land, and the capacity of the banks to manufacture and to lend paper. At the custom houses there is a limit. The quantity of goods imported, and the rate of duty upon these goods, impose a limitation upon the receivable amount of that branch of the revenue. No more can be paid than the duties amount to; but in the case of the lands, the sales can go on as long as land can be found, and paper can be manufactured. Thus, in our great fluctuations in the revenue, the excesses and deficiencies have chiefly occurred in the land office receipts. In the great surplusses of revenue which accrued in Mr. Monroe's time, the land sales were seen to rise and fall, in less than three years, from two millions up to twenty-eight millions, and back to about one million. In the surplus season which has just passed, we have seen the land sales again rise from four millions to fifteen; from fifteen to twenty-five, and from twenty-five fall back to seven. The paper money buys the land, but it does not buy the goods. If the paper of our 900 banks could be carried to Europe, and be paid, by force of law, to merchants, and manufacturers for foreign goods, then the cases would be parallel: there would be no limit on the importations, and none on the duties, and as great fluctuations would occur in the custom house revenue as in land revenue. A thousand millions might be imported one year, and nothing the next year. As often as the right has been given by law to go and take the public lands for paper money, just so often have the sales become excessive; and so it will be again, and for ever. So it has been, and so it will be. Nothing but hard money payments can impose the proper and regular limit upon the sales which the safety of the Treasury and the welfare of the settlers require. Open the land offices to paper money, and the Treasury becomes a balloon, now distended and rising above the clouds, then collapsed, plunging to the earth, and dragged along the ground. I have mentioned this evil to gentlemen: they could not deny it to be true, nor excuse it; but they said it could be prevented by stopping the sales of the lands. Stopping the sales! as if the new States would submit, or ought to submit, to such a stoppage! Error upon error, and blunder upon blunder, would be the history of such a stoppage. The first step is wrong; the second one worse; and the only true course is to begin right, and sell lands for hard money only. This is the simple and easy remedy for all the evils; it limits the sales to the amount required for cultivation; it gives to the Treasury a uniform and regular supply; it prevents speculation; it operates as a pre-emption law in favor of settlers; it saves the land from being plundered from the Government in exchange for worthless or depreciated paper; and it helps to diffuse that gold and silver over the country, and among the people, which would otherwise lie in masses at the import cities.

The resolution of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] consists of three parts; the first to rescind the Treasury Order; the second to compel the universal reception of local bank notes in payment of dues to the General Government; the third to compel the Government to pay out the same notes to all that will receive them.

I have discussed the first of these propositions, and have presented myself prominently in opposition to it; not in the expectation of preventing its adoption, for I know its passage to be certain, but to show my own opinions, and to disclose in advance some view of the evil consequences to result from rescinding the Treasury Order. That order will be rescinded. Every body knows it will be rescinded. A bill has gone from this chamber to the House of Representatives with a clause to that effect; a clause inserted by a vote almost general. The whole current is for the rescision; but I never swim with the current when I see it flowing upon rocks and plunging into a gulf. That order will be rescinded; so far as this chamber is concerned, it is already rescinded; and there is no use in doing the work over again, except to gain the high honor of killing the dead. It is condemned; but it is a wise and patriotic order, honorable to the sagacity and courage of the President that issued it, and one that its few friends will never be ashamed of. It had my approbation in the beginning; it has it now; and the experience of a few years will evince the wisdom of its conception and the improvidence of its rescision.

The two other branches of the resolution are yet to be discussed; and in that discussion I shall consider the two as one; for the second is only a corollary of the first, and needs no enactment to give it effect if the first shall be adopted. Pass the one, and the other follows of itself. Compel the Government to receive all its debts and dues in the paper of nine hundred banks, and it will have nothing else but the paper of these banks to pay out. It must pay out that paper, or nothing; and the public creditors must take that paper, or nothing. The Government will have nothing else to offer, and there will be no occasion to effect by legislation what would already be effected by necessity. I perceive gentlemen are disposed to shrink back from the conditional tender which the third clause of this resolution prescribes. They shrink from making paper money a forced tender; for it would amount to a forced tender, under the operation of this resolution, in all payments from the General Government. The author of the resolution [Mr. CLAY] discovers a disposition to relinquish it; but it is nothing to relinquish the disbursing clause if the receiving one is retained. One includes the other. What is received, must be disbursed; and gentlemen had as well go the whole, and vote the disbursing clause if they vote the receiving one. I can see no difference between the two votes; the one implies the other. The only effect of adopting the receiving clause, and rejecting the disbursing one, would be to impose upon the Executive Department the necessity of paying out paper money when Congress itself shrunk from the responsibility of voting it.

Here, then, is a proposition to compel the General Government to receive all the notes of all the banks in the United States, chartered and unchartered, created and to be created, in the payment of all the debts and dues to the United States, and in exchange for all the public lands which are held in trust for the public benefit. Upon what petition, and with what object, is this extraordinary proposition presented—a proposition which goes the whole length of repealing the Constitution of the United States, and converting her hard money Treasury into a paper money balloon? Upon what petition is this proposition founded? Has any State, any public meeting, any bank directory, asked it? Not one! Tho whole originates with a solitary member of the Senate, unsupported by a voice in the Union for the unheard of favor which he proposes to confer upon 900 banks. Doubtless it will be very agreeable to these banks to have their paper made a national currency! Doubtless it will be very profitable to them to have their paper made a legal tender at all the land offices, custom houses, post offices, and Federal court clerks' and marshals' offices throughout the Union; but certain it is that no one of them has had the face to ask it! They must feel infinite gratitude for the boon, if obtained for them; but they have not been able to commit the impropriety of asking for it! Reduced to its essence, and it is a proposal to the Senate to violate the Constitution, ruin the finances, and plunder the public creditors; and these are things which no bank in the United States has thought proper to ask at our hands. The whole comes forward as the solitary proposition of an individual Senator, and bottomed upon the single assumption that it is necessary to enable the banks to resume specie payments. To enable the banks to resume! Strange that none of them found out that secret! and that all the solvent commercial banks in the United States have resumed, or have put themselves under pledges to resume before the first day of January next. The honest and solvent part of the banks have resumed, or have bound themselves to do it; and that without hoping any thing from the aid, or fearing any thing from the hostility, of the General Government. They have resumed, are resuming, and will resume, and no action of ours can prevent them from doing it, much less is any action from us required as a condition precedent to enable them to do it. The hundred banks of New York have resumed; the whole without exception, and all without difficulty. In all quarters of the Union the solvent commercial banks have followed the New York lead, either actually resumed, or declared their determination to do so. To offer these banks aid, under these circumstances, is to perform that service which is called post bellum, auxilium, that is to say, aid after the war. It is doing what Dr. Johnson ridiculed the Earl of Chesterfield for having done—patronised his dictionary after the book happened to need no patron—after withholding patronage, when the book did need it. No, sir, no! The honest and solvent banks have resumed without asking for Government aid, and without inventing flimsy pretexts to screen themselves, or to inculpate others. The New York banks, and those which have followed their lead, have acted openly and candidly; they have no need for aid, or for pretexts. If the miscalled Bank of the United States, and her subalterns, require aid to enable them to resume, let them say so, and tell what they ask. If they need a pretext to cover a retreat from the non-resumption position in which they have placed themselves, let their file leader invent that pretext. Let Mr. Biddle invent it. An invented pretext will answer all their purposes perfectly well; and if they will neither ask aid in plain terms, nor back out from a false position upon simulated pretexts, let them stand as they are.

Let them lie behind their cotton bags until they force the people to choose a bank attorney for President. Let them lie there! lie till doomsday! I thank them for their folly in getting there; and with my good pleasure, they may lie there until they get up of themselves, or die. The New York flag, and those which rally under it, will be enough for the country; the Philadelphia flag, and its non-resumption crew, may stick it out as long as they can, or as long as they dare, behind the defences of their cotton bags, and under the battery of public contempt, popular indignation, and judicial prosecution.

The first objection to this proposition is its gross and utter unconstitutionality. It is a plain, open, palpable, violent infraction of the Constitution. That instrument recognises gold and silver coin only as the currency of the Federal Treasury; and all attempts to make paper money a legal tender to the Government is a clear violation of that instrument. It is to no purpose to quote the practice of the Government, and to say that paper money has always been received in payments to the Federal Treasury The answer to that reference is, that such receipt was always voluntary on the part of the Government, and never compulsory; that the Government always had a right to reject it; and the holders of the paper never had a right to tender it. But now this is to be reversed. The receipt of these notes is to be made compulsory, not voluntary. The right to tender it to the Government is to be vested in every individual, and in every bank; and the right to reject it is to be denied to the Government. This constitutes a difference between the past practice of the Government and the present proposed enactment, too obvious to be overlooked, and too essential to permit one to be justified by the other.

The order of General Hamilton, of 1790, permiting bank notes to be received in payment of the revenue, contrary, as I believe, to the act of 1789, was wholly intended to be for the convenience of the Treasury, and was, besides, declared by him to be a temporary measure. He merely directed the notes to be received as the actual representatives of the dollars they promised to pay; he merely took them as so many little wallets, or bags, containing the number of dollars borne on their face. This was General Hamilton's order. The joint resolution of 1816 was of the same character—permissive to the Government, not obligatory upon it. Under this order of General Hamilton, and under this resolution, the practice of the Government has obtained; and nothing in that practice can be pleaded in justification of this compulsory reception of paper money at the Federal Treasury, now for the first time proposed to be made compulsory, since the foundation of our Government.

Convinced of the liability of the resolution to the objection of unconstitutionality, the Senator from Kentucky who has moved it, [Mr. CLAY,] has come forward in advance to remove that obstacle from the path of his favorite measure. He has given us an argument on the point; and the substance of it is, that the Government has a right to receive its taxes and dues in any thing that it pleases. Sir, this argument has neither originality nor force. It was used forty-five years ago by General Hamilton; but has never been used since until on the present occasion. General Hamilton used it once, and but once, the enormity of the proposition striking every mind, and shocking every sense. The proposition is bottomed upon the idea that we have no Constitution; that the will of the Legislature is sovereign; and that it may order taxes to be collected in what it pleases. This may do in Russia, but it will not do in the United States; it will not do where such a Constitution as ours exists. By our Constitution Congress may lay taxes; but for what purposes? to pay the debts of the Government. Now, can the Government pay its debts with any thing but money? and is there any money but gold and silver? Can the Government pay its debts—pay its army and navy—its civil officers, contractors and laborers—can it pay them in cotton or tobacco, in lead or in furs, or in the notes of nine hnndred banks, or of any one bank? Certainly it cannot make such payment. I speak of the legal right to make such payment—the right to tender it, and to plead tender and refusal in the discharge of the debt, if not accepted? It has no right to do these things; but when the Government has nothing else to tender—when the creditor has no choice—when it is that or nothing, then the creditor is under a duress, and must take what he can get. He must take the cotton or tobacco, the lead or the furs, the bank notes or the shin-plasters, be it what it may, that the Government offers. He is in no condition to coerce the Government, and must submit to receive what it tenders to him. But this is "might," not "right;" it is power, not justice. Heretofore it has sometimes been the misfortune and the humiliation of the Government to tender depreciated paper; under this resolution, if adopted, such tender will become the regular and permanent practice of the Government.

From the unconstitutionality of this proposition, I proceed to its consequences, than which nothing could be more disastrous to every interest, to the public Treasury, to the banks themselves, and to the country generally.

To the public Treasury it would be fatal. The paper of 900 banks to become a legal tender to the Government at every land office, post office, and custom-house in the United States, would sweep off the lands, the duties, and the postages in double quick time. The lands would all be sold, the duties would all be paid, the postages would all be met; and what would the Government receive? a pyramid of paper, composed of bank issues from all quarters of the Union, subject to every degree of depreciation, and destined to constitute a frightful mass of that humiliating stuff known in the vocabulary of our finances by the name of "unavailable funds." Under this resolution, the customs in New York, and in every sea-port town, might be paid in the notes of any bank in the remote West, which could obtain the reputation of a specie payer, by paying specie for a week, or a month; the lands, in like manner, might be paid for in the notes of similar banks in the extreme east, north, or south. The postages in New Orleans might be paid in notes from Vermont. All that would be wanting would be a broker's report, a newspaper paragraph, a bank note table, or an affidavit, showing that the bank was paying specie when last heard from. This would be sufficient; it would constitute the bank a sound specie-paying institution, within the words of the resolution; and the right of the holder of her notes would be complete to tender them to the Government in discharge of every debt or due, in every quarter of the Union. The loss of the whole national domain, the payment of the revenues in depreciated paper, and the bankruptcy of the Treasury, would be inevitable. Two years might suffice for the accomplishment of this disastrous result; and certainly the mover of the resolution cannot but look to it himself. He says the local banks must fail again, if there is no National Bank to keep them in order; he admits there is no chance for a National Bank—that it is in vain even for him to introduce a bill for one. He therefore admits the ruin of the finances as the consequence of the adoption of this second branch of his resolution. He admits it fully; and this admission is in full accordance with his ancient and well settled opinions. As far back as the year 1816, that Senator, in a speech to his constituents in Kentucky, in justification of his vote for the Bank of the United States, gave as a reason for it that the State banks "could not be depended upon"—that the General Government could not DEPEND UPON them; and, therefore, a National Bank must be created to supply a currency and to keep the public moneys. Experience has confirmed the truth of this opinion, so far as the State banks are concerned. Since the time it was uttered, the State banks have twice proved that they cannot be depended upon by the General Government. They proved it in 1819, and again in 1837. They had proved it before, in time of war; they have twice proved it since, in time of peace. The banks are more numerous now than they were then—more closely engaged in politics now than then—more addicted to hazardous schemes of trading and railroad and canal making now than then—as much addicted to small notes as ever, and, therefore, more dangerous now than then. Right as the Senator from Kentucky was, in 1816, in his opinion that the State banks could not be depended upon by the General Government, he is still more so in his opinion that these banks must fail again. Big with inherent dangers, they are beset by new and extraordinary perils. An enemy lies in wait for them! one that foretells their destruction, is able to destroy them, and which looks for its own success in their ruin. The report of the committee of the New York banks expressly refers to "acts of deliberate hostility" from a neighboring institution as a danger which the resuming banks might have to dread. The reference was plain to the miscalled Bank of the United States as the source of this danger. Since that time an insolent and daring threat has issued from Philadelphia, bearing the marks of its Bank paternity, openly threatening the resuming banks of New York with destruction. This is the threat: "Let the banks of the Empire State come up from their Elba, and enjoy their hundred days of resumption; a Waterloo awaits them, and a St. Helena is prepared for them." Here is a direct menace, and coming from a source which is able to make good what it threatens. Without hostile attacks, the resuming banks have a perilous process to go through. The business of resumption is always critical. It is a case of impaired credit, and a slight circumstance may excite a panic which may be fatal to the whole. The public having seen them stop payment, can readily believe in the mortality of their nature, and that another stoppage is as easy as the former. On the slightest alarm—on the stoppage of a few inconsiderable banks, or on the noise of a groundless rumor—a general panic may break out. Sauve qui peut—save himself who can—becomes the cry with the public; and almost every bank may be run down. So it was in England after the long suspension there from 1797 to 1823; so it was in the United States after the suspension from 1814 to 1817; in each country a second stoppage ensued in two years after resumption; and these second stoppages are like relapses to an individual after a spell of sickness; the relapse is more easily brought on than the original disease, and is far more dangerous. The banks in England suspended in 1797—they broke in 1825; in the United States it was a suspension during the war, and a breaking in 1819–20. So it may be again with us. There is imminent danger to the resuming banks, without the pressure of premeditated hostility; but, with that hostility, their prostration is almost certain. The Bank of the United States can crush hundreds on any day that it pleases. It can send out its agents into every State of the Union, with sealed orders to be opened on a given day, like captains sent into different seas; and can break hundreds of local banks within the same hour, and over an extent of thousands of miles. It can do this with perfect ease—the more easily with resurrection notes—and thus excite a universal panic, crush the resuming banks, and then charge the whole upon the Government. This is what it can do; this is what it has threatened; and stupid is the bank, and doomed to destruction, that does not look out for the danger, and fortify against it. In addition to all these dangers, the Senator from Kentucky, the author of the resolution himself, tells you that these banks must fail again! he tells you they will fail! and in the very same moment he presses the compulsory reception of all the notes of all these banks upon the Federal Treasury! What is this but a proposition to ruin the finances—to bankrupt the Treasury—to disgrace the Administration—to demonstrate the incapacity of the State banks to serve as the fiscal agents of the Government, and to gain a new argument for the creation of a National Bank, and the elevation of the Bank party to power? This is the clear inference from the proposition; and viewing it in this light, I feel it to be my duty to expose, and to repel it, as a proposition to inflict mischief and disgrace upon the country.

Unconstitutional as this proposition is upon its face—ruinous as it must be in its consequences—it comes before us without the excuse, apology, or palliation of a single extenuating circumstance. No necessity for it can be pleaded, or pretended. So far as it is safe, or desirable to receive bank notes, they can be received, and they are now received, under the permissive operation of the joint resolution of 1816. The Secretary of the Treasury is now acting under that resolution; and no bank, no State, no public body, has asked him to go further than he has gone. Politicians alone have taken up this matter, and have proposed, for the first time since the foundation of the Government—for the first time in 48 years—to compel the Government to receive paper money for its dues. The pretext is, to aid the banks in resuming! This, indeed, is a marvellous pretty conception! Aid the banks to resume! Why, sir, we cannot prevent them from resuming. Every solvent, commercial bank in the United States either has resumed, or has declared its determination to do so in the course of the year. The insolvent, and the political banks, which did not mean to resume, will have to follow the New York example, or die! Mr. Biddle's Bank must follow the New York lead, or die! The good banks are with the country; the rest we defy. The political banks may resume or not, as they please, or as they dare. If they do not, they die! Public opinion, and the laws of the land, will exterminate them. If the president of the miscalled Bank of the United States has made a mistake in recommending indefinite non-resumption, and in proposing to establish a confederation of broken banks, and has found out his mistake, and wants a pretext for retreating, let him invent one. There is no difficulty in the case. Any thing that the Government does, or does not—any thing that has happened, will happen, or can happen—will answer the purpose. Let the president of the Bank of the United States give out a tune: incontinently it will be sung by every bank man in the United States; and no matter how ridiculous the ditty may be, it will be celebrated as superhuman music.

Sir, the honest commercial banks have resumed, or mean to resume. They have resumed, not upon the fictitious and delusive credit of legislative enactments, but upon the solid basis of gold and silver. The hundred millions of specie which we have accumulated in the country, has done the business. To that hundred millions the country is indebted for this early, easy, proud and glorious resumption! and here let us do justice to the men of this day—to the policy of General Jackson—and to the success of the experiments—to which we are indebted for these one hundred millions. Let us contrast the events and effects of the stoppages in 1814, and in 1819, with the events and effects of the stoppage in 1837, and let us see the differences between them, and the causes of that difference. The stoppage of 1814 compelled the Government to use depreciated bank notes during the remainder of the war, and up to the year 1817. Treasury notes, even bearing a large interest, were depreciated ten, twenty, thirty per cent. Bank notes were at an equal depreciation. The losses to the Government from depreciated paper in loans alone, during the war, were computed by a committee of the House of Representatives at eighty millions of dollars. Individuals suffered in the same proportion, and every transaction of life bore the impress of the general calamity. Specie was not to be had. There was, nationally speaking, none in the country. The specie standard was gone; the measure of values was lost; a fluctuating paper money, ruinously depreciated, was the medium of all exchanges. To extricate itself from this deplorable condition, the expedient of a National Bank was resorted to—that measure of so much humiliation, and of so much misfortune, to the Republican party. For the moment it seemed to give relief, and to restore national prosperity; but treacherous and delusive was the seeming boon. The banks resumed—relapsed—and every evil of the previous suspension returned upon the country with increased and aggravated force. I have apt authority for saying that the seven years of most disastrous fortune which ever this country experienced, were those which immediately ensued the establishment of this second United States Bank, and which covered the period of its own paralysis, and the general breaking of the local banks. I have authority for this, and I read it from a speech delivered in the Senate in the year 1832.

"Eight years ago it was my painful duty to present to the other house of Congress an unexaggerated picture of the general distress pervading the whole land. We must all yet remember some of its frightful features. We all know that the people were then oppressed and borne down by an enormous load of debt; that ruinous sales and sacrifices were every where made of real estate; that stop laws, and relief laws, and paper money were adopted to save the people from impending destruction; that a deficit in the public revenue existed, which compelled Government to seize upon, and direct from its legitimate object, the appropriation to the sinking fund, to redeem the national debt; and that our commerce and navigation were threatened with a complete paralysis. In short, sir, if I were to select any term of seven years since the adoption of the present Constitution, which exhibited a scene of the most wide-spread desolation and dismay, it would be exactly that term of seven years which immediately preceded the establishment of the tariff of 1824."

Such is the picture, drawn by a hand [Mr. CLAY] which makes it authority in this case, of the desolation of the country during the period of bank stoppage, from 1817 to 1824. The Bank of the United States was then in full life, and was no shield or support to the country in all this calamity; nor did it aid the country in recovering from it. The same speech informs us that the tariff was then the grand panacea for all the calamities of the country! and that the act of 1824 for the protection of American industry lifted the people from the abyss of ruin in which they were plunged, and, in return for their seven years of unparalleled calamity, gave them a jubilee of seven years of unprecedented prosperity. This is the statement of our revived prosperity from the same hand:

"If the term of seven years were to be selected of the greatest prosperity which this people have ever enjoyed since the establishment of their present Constitution, it would be exactly that period of seven years which immediately followed the passage of the tariff act of 1824."

Such was the language a few years ago. Then tariff was every thing, bank nothing. The want of a tariff for seven years, then, ruined the country; the presence of it for seven years restored prosperity. Now bank is every thing, and tariff is nothing. The loss of the National Bank has sunk us into woe and poverty; its presence is to re-establish national prosperity. And thus we play off, on this grave theatre of legislation, these juggling representations to deceive the people, as if they had neither memory to recollect the past, nor judgment to understand the present, nor eyes to see the players shifting their parts with the shifting of the changing scenes.

But to return to the point, the contrast between the effects and events of former bank stoppages, and the effects and events of the present one. The effects of the former were to sink the price of labor and of property to the lowest point, to fill the States with stop laws, relief laws, property laws, and tender laws; to ruin nearly all debtors, and to make property change hands at fatal rates; to compel the Federal Government to witness the heavy depreciation of its Treasury notes, to receive its revenues in depreciated paper, and, finally, to submit to the establishment of a National Bank as the means of getting it out of its deplorable condition—that bank, the establishment of which was followed by the seven years of the greatest calamity which ever afflicted the country, and from which calamity we then had to seek relief from the tariff, and not from more banks. How different the events of the present time! The banks stopped in May, 1837; they resume in May, 1838. Their paper depreciated but little; property, except in a few places, was but slightly affected; the price of produce continued good; people paid their debts without sacrifices; Treasury notes, in defiance of political and moneyed combinations to depress them, kept at or near par; in many places above it; the Government was never brought to receive its revenues in depreciated paper; and finally, all good banks are resuming in the brief space of a year, and no National Bank has been created. Such is the contrast between the two periods; and now, sir, what is all this owing to? what is the cause of this great difference in two similar periods of bank stoppages? It is owing to our gold bill of 1834, by which we corrected the erroneous standard of gold, and which is now giving us an avalanche of that metal; it is owing to our silver bill of the same year, by which we repealed the disastrous act of 1819, against the circulation of foreign silver, and which is now spreading the Mexican dollars all over the country; it is owing to our movements against small notes under twenty dollars; to our branch mints, and the increased activity of the mother mint; to our determination to revive the currency of the Constitution, and to our determination not to fall back upon the local paper currencies of the States for a national currency. It was owing to these measures that we have passed through this bank stoppage in a style so different from what has been done heretofore. It is owing to our "experiments" on the currency—to our "humbug" of a gold and silver currency—to our "tampering" with the monetary system—it is owing to these that we have had this signal success in this last stoppage, and are now victorious over all the prophets of wo, and over all the architects of mischief. These experiments, this humbugging, and this tampering, has increased our specie in six years from twenty millions to one hundred millions; and it is these one hundred millions of gold and silver which has sustained the country and the Government under the shock of the stoppage, has enabled the honest solvent banks to resume, and will leave the insolvent and political banks without excuse or justification for not resuming. Our experiments—I love the word, and am sorry that gentlemen of the Opposition have ceased to repeat it—have brought an avalanche of gold and silver into the country; it is saturating us with the precious metals, it has relieved and sustained the country; and now when these experiments have been successful—have triumphed over all opposition—gentlemen cease their ridicule, and go to work with their paper money resolutions to force the Government to use paper, and thereby to drive off the gold and silver which our policy has brought into the country, destroy the specie basis of the banks, give us an exclusive paper currency again, and produce a new expansion and a new explosion. Gentlemen cease their idle ridicule, and now go to work to make laws to defeat us; and defeat us they will, if they pass their laws. We despise their ridicule; but we cannot despise laws. Ridicule was harmless; but laws will be potent. Ridicule could not prevent gold and silver from coming to the country; but paper money laws will expel it. We yesterday voted an appropriation for the Southern Exploring expedition; and now mark me; remember what I say: Pass this resolution to compel the Government to receive paper money, and before that expedition returns, a new expansion of the currency, and a new explosion of the banks, will take place; and when they take place, they will be charged upon the folly and wickedness of the present Administration.

Justice to the men of this day requires these things to be stated. They have avoided the errors of 1811. They have avoided the pit into which they saw their predecessors fall. Those who prevented the renewal of the bank charter in 1811, did nothing else but prevent its renewal; they provided no substitute for the notes of the bank; did nothing to restore the currency of the Constitution; nothing to revive the gold currency; nothing to increase the specie of the country. They fell back upon the exclusive use of local bank notes, without even doing any thing to strengthen the local banks, by discarding their paper under twenty dollars. They fell back upon the local banks; and the consequence was, the total prostration, the utter helplessness, the deplorable inability of the Government to take care of itself, or to relieve and restore the country, when the banks failed. Those who prevented the recharter of the second Bank of the United States had seen all this; and they determined to avoid such error and calamity. They sat out to revive the national gold currency, to increase the silver currency, and to reform and strengthen the banking system. They sat out to do these things; and they have done them. Against a powerful combined political and moneyed confederation, they have succeeded; and the 100,000,000 of gold and silver now in the country attests the greatness of their victory, and ensures the prosperity of the country against the machinations of the wicked and the factious.

It is due to General Jackson and his friends to state and to proclaim these successful results of their policy. The country now feels these results in the early, easy, victorious resumption of specie payments, without the aid of a National Bank; it feels them in the revival of business and confidence, and in the restoration of the general prosperity, which the combined enemy can no longer keep off, nor longer attribute to flimsy pretexts and absurd causes. This is our condition—victorious over all the ills and evils of the day; and being victorious, here come in two propositions—the paper money resolution, and the project for a fifty million bank—to claim the merit of effecting what is already accomplished, and to end in expelling our one hundred millions of specie from the country, producing a new expansion and explosion, and involving the Federal Government again in the fate of the local banks. That these banks are to fail again is declared by the Senator who moves this resolution; yet he undertakes to make their paper—the paper of banks doomed to fail, as he declares—the currency of the Federal Government; to be received in, and paid out by it. And here another contradiction, of the highest order of absurdity, is presented to us. The author of the resolution, and of the project for a fifty million bank, claims the establishment of the bank upon the great ground of regulating the currency. This is his great ground; and now how is this regulation to be effected? Simply, and plainly, by two operations: 1. To exclude local bank notes from revenue payments; 2. To hold the local banks to weekly settlements, at least, for all their notes received. These are the means by which the regulation of the currency is to be effected by the great National Bank; yet the author of this resolution, and the advocate of this bank, for this purpose, denies to the Government the right of regulating the currency in the same way! He denies it the right of excluding bank notes from revenue payments; he is for compelling it to receive all the notes of all the banks in the Union; and he is for denying the Government the right to have settlements with the banks for their notes, and compelling them to pay out these notes in all disbursements from the Treasury. Such is the contradiction which is presented! a contradiction which exhibits the mover of this proposition as denying to the constitutional Government of his country the powers and privileges which he grants to a moneyed corporation; and then calling for the erection of the corporation to exercise the precise powers and privileges which he denies to the Government!

Sir, I conclude with a remark upon this project for a fifty million bank. It cannot be established now, nor until the Democracy of the Union shall have fought their battles of Chæronea and Pharsalia. The Democracy must first be vanquished and subdued; then the fifty million bank charter may be established; and all I ask is, that the institution of King, Lords and Commons, may be put into the same charter, and established at the same time, in order to spare the country from the scenes that would have to be passed through in order to establish King, Lords and Commons, by corrupting all the great fountains and sources of Liberty—THE PRESS—THE ELECTIONS—THE PUBLIC SCHOOLS—and THE LEGISLATIVE HALLS.

INDIAN HOSTILITIES.

SPEECH OF MR. BENTON, OF MISSOURI.

In Senate, Friday, June 8, 1838—On the act from the House of Representatives, on its third reading, making appropriations for preventing and suppressing Indian hostilities for the year 1838, and for arrearages for the year 1837.

The VICE PRESIDENT having announced the third reading of the act, and put the question, shall this act pass?

Mr. BENTON rose, and said, that so far as the passage of the act was concerned, there was no necessity for him to say a word. The vote of the previous day had shown that the act would pass unanimously, although violently opposed. The gentlemen who had spoken against it would all vote for it; and it was to answer things said in their speeches, and not to gain votes, that he now felt himself called upon to speak.

A Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SOUTHARD] has brought forward an accusation which must affect the character of the late and present Administrations at home, and the character of the country abroad; and which, justice to these Administrations, and to the country, requires to be met and answered upon the spot. That Senator has expressly charged that a fraud was committed upon the Florida Indians in the treaty negotiated with them for their removal to the West; that the war which has ensued was the consequence of this fraud; and that our Government was responsible to the moral sense of the community, and of the world, for all the blood that has been shed, and for all the money that has been expended, in the prosecution of this war. This is a heavy accusation. At home, it attaches to the party in power, and is calculated to make them odious; abroad, it attaches to the country, and is calculated to blacken the national character. It is an accusation, without the shadow of a foundation! and, both, as one of party in power, and as an American citizen, I feel myself impelled by an imperious sense of duty to my friends, and to my country, to expose its incorrectness at once, and to vindicate the Government, and the country, from an imputation as unfounded as it is odious.

The Senator from New Jersey first located this imputed fraud in the Payne's Landing treaty, negotiated by General Gadsden, in Florida, in the year 1832; and, after being tendered an issue on the fairness and generosity of that treaty by the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. CLAY,] he transferred the charge to the Fort Gibson treaty, made in Arkansas, in the year 1833, by Messrs. Stokes, Ellsworth, and Schermerhorn. This was a considerable change of locality, but no change in the accusation itself; the two treaties being but one, and the last being a literal performance of a stipulation contained in the first. These are the facts; and, after stating the case, I will prove it as stated. This is the statement: The Seminole Indians in Florida being an emigrant band of the Creeks, and finding game exhausted, subsistence difficult, and white settlements approaching, concluded to follow the mother tribe, the Creeks, to the West of the Mississippi, and to reunite with them. This was conditionally agreed to be done at the Payne's Landing treaty; and in that treaty it was stipulated that a deputation of Seminole chiefs, under the sanction of the Government of the United States, should proceed to the Creek country beyond the Mississippi—there to ascertain first whether a suitable country could be obtained for them there; and, secondly, whether the Creeks would receive them back as a part of their confederacy: and if the deputation should be satisfied on these two points, then the conditional obligation to remove, contained in the Payne's landing treaty, to become binding and obligatory upon the Seminole tribe. The deputation went; the two points were solved in the affirmative; the obligation to remove became absolute on the part of the Indians; and the Government of the United States commenced preparations for effecting their easy, gradual, and comfortable removal. The entire emigration was to be completed in three years, one-third going annually, commencing in the year 1833, and to be finished in the years 1834, and 1835. The deputation sent to the west of the Mississippi, completed their agreement with the Creeks on the 28th of March, 1833; they returned home immediately, and one third of the tribe was to remove that year. Every thing was got ready on the part of the United States, both to transport the Indians to their new homes, and to subsist them for a year after their arrival there. But, instead of removing, the Indians began to invent excuses, and to interpose delays, and to pass off the time without commencing the emigration. The year 1833, in which one-third of the tribe were to remove, passed off without any removal; the year 1834, in which another third was to go, was passed off in the same manner; the year 1835, in which the emigration was to have been completed, passed away, and the emigration was not begun. On the contrary, on the last days of the last month of that year, while the United States was still peaceably urging the removal, an accumulation of treacherous and horrible assassinations and massacres were committed. The United States Agent, General Thompson, Lieutenant Smith, of the artillery, and five others, were assassinated in sight of Fort King; two expresses were murdered; and Major Dade's command was massacred.

In their excuses and pretexts for not removing, the Indians never thought of the reasons which have been supplied to them on this floor. They never thought of alleging fraud. Their pretexts were frivolous; as that it was a long distance, and that bad Indians lived in that country, and that the old treaty of Fort Moultrie allowed them twenty years to live in Florida. Their real motive was the desire of blood and pillage on the part of many Indians, and still more on the part of the five hundred runaway negroes mixed up among them; and who believed that they could carry on their system of robbery and murder with impunity, and that the swamps of the country would forever protect them against the pursuit of the whites.

This, Mr. President, is the plain and brief narrative of the causes which led to the Seminole war; it is the brief historical view of the case; and if I was speaking under ordinary circumstances, and in reply to incidental remarks, I should content myself with this narrative, and let the question go to the country upon the strength and credit of this statement. But I do not speak under ordinary circumstances; I am not replying to incidental and casual remarks. I speak in answer to a formal accusation, preferred on this floor; I speak to defend the late and present Administrations from an odious charge; and, in defending them, to vindicate the character of our country from the accusation of the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. SOUTHARD,] and to show that fraud has not been committed upon these Indians, and that the guilt of a war, founded in fraud, is not justly imputable to them. To do this, it is necessary to prove statements, as well as to make them; and to that proof I shall now proceed.

I draw my proofs from two authentic sources—from the treaties themselves, and from the evidence furnished by the Secretary at War in 1836, Gen. Cass, in answer to a call from the House of Representatives for information upon the causes of the Seminole war.

I draw from these two sources, and will begin with the treaties. I read from the Payne's Landing treaty, concluded May 9, 1832.

"The Seminole Indians, regarding with just respect the solicitude manifested by the President of the United States for the improvement of their condition, by recommending a removal to a country more suitable to their habits and wants than the one they at present occupy in the Territory of Florida, are willing that their confidential chiefs, Jumper, Fustilustihadjo, Charley Emarthla, Coi hadjo, Holati Emarthla, Yaha hadjo, and Sam Jones, accompanied by their agent, Major Phagan, and their faithful interpreter, Abraham, should be sent at the expense of the United States as early as convenient, to examine the country assigned to the Creeks west of the Mississippi river; and if they should be satisfied with the character of that country, and of the favorable disposition of the Creeks to reunite with the Seminoles as one people, the articles of the compact and agreement, herein stipulated at Payne's Landing, on the Ochlawaha river, this 9th day of May, 1832, between James Gadsden, in behalf of the Government of the United States, and the undersigned chiefs and head men, for and in behalf of the Seminole Indians, shall be binding on the respective parties.

"ARTICLE I. The Seminole Indians relinquish to the United States all claim to the land they at present occupy in the Territory of Florida, and agree to emigrate to the country assigned to the Creeks, west of the Mississippi; it being understood that an additional extent of territory, proportioned to their numbers, will be added to the Creek country, and that the Seminoles will be received as a constituent part of the Creek nation, and be readmitted to all the privileges as a member of the same."

This is the preamble, and the first article of the treaty. The second, third and fourth articles stipulate for the amounts which the United States are to pay, and the aid they are to render the Indians in removing. The seventh article stipulates for the removal of the tribe in three years, commencing in 1833, and to be completed in 1835, provided the delegation to the West should be satisfied upon the two conditions expressed in the preamble to the treaty. It is signed by fifteen chiefs, the leaders of the nation, and comprehending the seven which were to form the delegation to the West.

We will now follow this delegation to the West, and see what was the result of their negotiations in that quarter.

The Seminoles had stipulated that the agent, Major Phagan, and their own interpreter, the negro Abraham, should accompany them; and this was done. It so happened, also, that an extraordinary commission of three members, sent out by the United States to adjust Indian difficulties generally, was then beyond the Mississippi; and these commissioners were directed to join in the negotiations on the part of the United States, and to give the sanction of our guarantee to the agreements made between the Seminoles and the Creeks for the reunion of the former to the parent tribe. This was done. Our commissioners, Messrs. Stokes, Ellsworth, and Schermerhorn, became party to a treaty with the Creek Indians for the reunion of the Seminoles, made at Fort Gibson the 14th of February, 1833. The treaty contained this article:

"ARTICLE IV. It is understood and agreed that the Seminole Indians of Florida, whose removal to this country is provided for by their treaty with the United States, dated May 9, 1832, shall also have a permanent and comfortable home on the lands hereby set apart as the country of the Creek nation; and they, the Seminoles, will hereafter be considered as a constituent part of the said nation, but are to be located on some part of the Creek country by themselves, which location shall be selected for them by the commissioners who have seen these articles of agreement."

This agreement with the Creeks settled one of the conditions on which the removal of the Seminoles was to depend. We will now see how the other condition was disposed of.

In a treaty made at the same Fort Gibson, on the 28th of March, 1833, between the same three commissioners on the part of the United States, and the seven delegated Seminole chiefs, after reciting the two conditions precedent contained in the Payne's Landing treaty, and reciting, also, the convention with the Creeks on the 14th of February preceding, it is thus stipulated:

"Now, therefore, the commissioners aforesaid, by virtue of the power and authority vested in them by the treaty made with the Creek Indians on the 14th of February, 1833, as above stated, hereby designate and assign to the Seminole tribe of Indians, for their separate future residence forever, a tract of country lying between the Canadian river and the south fork thereof, and extending west to where a line running north and south between the main Canadian and north branch will strike the forks of Little river; provided said west line does not extend more than twenty-five miles west from the mouth of said Little river. And the undersigned Seminole chiefs, delegated as aforesaid, on behalf of the nation, HEREBY DECLARE THEMSELVES WELL SATISFIED WITH THE LOCATION PROVIDED FOR THEM BY THE COMMISSIONERS, and agree that their nation shall commence the removal to their new home as soon as the Government will make the arrangements for their emigration satisfactory the Seminole nation."

This treaty is signed by the delegation, and by the commissioners of the United States, and witnessed, among others, by the same Major Phagan, agent, and Abraham, interpreter, whose presence was stipulated for at Payne's Landing.

Thus the two conditions on which the removal depended, were complied with; they were both established in the affirmative. The Creeks, under the solemn sanction and guarantee of the United States, agree to receive back the Seminoles as a part of their confederacy, and agree that they shall live adjoining them on lands designated for their residence The delegation declare themselves well satisfied with the country assigned them, and agree that the removal should commence as soon as the United States could make the necessary arrangements for the removal of the people.

This brings down the proof to the conclusion of all questions beyond the Mississippi; it brings it down to the conclusion of the treaty at Fort Gibson—that treaty in which the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SOUTHARD] has located the charge of fraud, after withdrawing the same charge from the Payne's Landing treaty. It brings us to the end of the negotiations at the point selected for the charge; and now how stands the accusation? How stands the charge of fraud? Is there a shadow, an atom, a speck, of foundation on which to rest it? No, sir: Nothing—Nothing—Nothing! Every thing was done that was stipulated for; done by the persons who were to do it; and done in the exact manner agreed upon. In fact, the nature of the things to be done west of the Mississippi was such as not to admit of fraud. Two things were to be done, one to be seen with the eyes, and the other to be heard with the ears. The deputation was to see their new country, and say whether they liked it. This was a question to their own senses—to their own eyes—and was not susceptible of fraud. They were to hear whether the Creeks would receive them back as a part of their confederacy; this was a question to their own ears, and was also unsusceptible of fraud. Their own eyes could not deceive them in looking at land; their own ears could not deceive them in listening to their own language from the Creeks. No, sir: there was no physical capacity, or moral means, for the perpetration of fraud; and none has ever been pretended by the Indians from that day to this. The Indians themselves have never thought of such a thing. There is no assumption of a deceived party among them. It is not a deceived party that is at war—a party deceived by the delegation which went to the West—but that very delegation itself, with the exception of Charley Emarthla, are the hostile leaders at home! This is reducing the accusation to an absurdity. It is making the delegation the dupes of their own eyes and of their own ears, and then going to war with the United States, because their own eyes deceived them in looking at land on the Canadian river, and their own ears deceived them in listening to their own language from the Creeks; and then charging these frauds upon the United States. All this is absurd; and it is due to these absent savages to say that they never committed any such absurdity—that they never placed their objection to remove upon any plea of deception practised upon them beyond the Mississippi, but on frivolous pretexts invented long after the return of the delegation; which pretexts covered the real grounds growing out of the influence of runaway slaves, and some evilly disposed chiefs, and that thirst for blood and plunder, in which they expected a long course of enjoyment and impunity in their swamps, believed to be impenetrable to the whites.

Thus, sir, it is clearly and fully proved that there was no fraud practised upon these Indians; that they themselves never pretended such a thing; and that the accusation is wholly a charge of recent origin sprung up among ourselves. Having shown that there was no fraud, this might be sufficient for the occasion, but having been forced into the inquiry, it may be as well to complete it by showing what were the causes of this war. To understand these causes, it is necessary to recur to dates, to see the extreme moderation with which the United States acted, the long time which they tolerated the delays of the Indians, and the treachery and murder with which their indulgence and forbearance was requited. The emigration was to commence in 1833, and be completed in the years 1834 and 1835. The last days of the last month of this last year had arrived, and the emigration had not yet commenced. Wholly intent on their peaceable removal, the Administration had despatched a disbursing agent, Lieutenant Harris of the army, to take charge of the expenditures for the subsistence of these people. He arrived at Fort King on the afternoon of the 28th of December, 1835; and as he entered the fort, he became almost an eye witness of a horrid scene which was the subject of his first despatch to his Government. He describes it in these words:

"I regret that it becomes my first duty after my arrival here to be the narrator of a story which it will be, I am sure, as painful for you to hear as it is for me, who was almost an eye witness to the bloody deed, to relate to you. Our excellent Superintendent, General Wiley Thompson, has been most cruelly murdered by a party of the hostile Indians, and with him Lieutenant Constant Smith, of the 2d regiment of Artillery, Erastus Rogers, the suttler to the post, with his two clerks, a Mr. Kitzler, and a boy called Robert. This occurred on the afternoon of the 28th instant, (December,) between three and four o'clock. On the day of the massacre, Lieutenant Smith had dined with the General, and after dinner invited him to take a short stroll with him. They had not proceeded more than three hundred yards beyond the agency office, when they were fired upon by a party of Indians, who rose from ambush in the hammock, within sight of the fort, and on which the suttler's house borders. The reports of the rifles fired, the war whoop twice repeated, and after a brief space, several other volleys more remote, and in the quarter of Mr Rogers's house, were heard, and the smoke of the firing seen from the fort. Mr. Rogers and his clerks were surprised at dinner. Three escaped: the rest murdered.

"The bodies of General Thompson, Lieutenant Smith, and Mr. Kitzler, were soon found and brought in. Those of the others were not found until this morning. That of General Thompson was perforated with fourteen bullets. Mr. Rogers had received seventeen. All were scalped, except the boy.

"The cowardly murderers are supposed to be a party of Micasookees, 40 or 50 strong, under the traitor Powell, whose shrill, peculiar war whoop, was recognised by our interpreters, and the one or two friendly Indians we have in the fort, and who knew it well.

"Two expresses (soldiers) were despatched upon fresh horses on the evening of this horrid tragedy, with tidings of it to General Clinch; but not hearing from him or them, we conclude they were cut off. We are also exceedingly anxious for the fate of the two companies (under Major Dade) which had been ordered up from Fort Brooke, and of whom we learn nothing."

Sir, this is the first letter of the disbursing agent, specially detached to furnish the supplies to the emigrating Indians. He arrives in the midst of treachery and murder; and his first letter is to announce to the Government the assassination of their agent, an officer of artillery, and five citizens; the assassination of two expresses, for they were both waylaid and murdered; and the massacre of one hundred and twelve men and officers under Major Dade. All this took place at once; and this was the beginning of the war. Up to that moment the Government of the United States were wholly employed in preparing the Indians for removal, recommending them to go, and using no force or violence upon them. This is the way the war was brought on; this is the way it began; and was there ever a case in which a Government was so loudly called upon to avenge the dead, to protect the living, and to cause itself to be respected by punishing the contemners of its power? The murder of the agent was a double offence, a peculiar outrage to the Government whose representative he was, and a violation even of the national law of savages. Agents are seldom murdered even by savages; and bound as every Government is to protect all its citizens, it is doubly bound to protect its agents and representatives abroad. Here, then, is a Government agent, and a military officer, five citizens, two expresses, and a detachment of one hundred and twelve men, in all one hundred and twenty-one persons, treacherously and inhumanly massacred in one day! and because General Jackson's administration did not submit to this horrid outrage, he is charged with the guilt of a war founded in fraud upon innocent and unoffending Indians! Such is the spirit of opposition to our own Government! such the love of Indians and contempt of whites! and such the mawkish sentimentality of the day in which we live—a sentimentality which goes moping and sorrowing about in behalf of imaginary wrongs to Indians and negroes, while the whites themselves are the subject of murder, robbery and defamation.

The prime mover in all this mischief, and the leading agent in the most atrocious scene of it, was a half blood Indian of little note before this time, and of no consequence in the councils of his tribe; for his name is not to be seen in the treaty either of Payne's Landing or Fort Gibson. We call him Powell; by his tribe he was called Osceola. He lead the attack in the massacre of the agent, and of those who were killed with him, in the afternoon of the 28th of December. The disbursing agent, whose letter has been read, in his account of that massacre, applies the epithet traitor to the name of this Powell. Well might he apply that epithet to that assassin; for he had just been fed and caressed by the very person whom he waylaid and murdered. He had come into the agency shortly before that time with seventy of his followers, professed his satisfaction with the treaty, his readiness to remove, and received subsistence and supplies for himself and all his party. The most friendly relations seemed to be established; and the doomed and deceived agent, in giving his account of it to the Government, says: "The result was that we closed with the utmost good feeling; and I have never seen Powell and the other chiefs so cheerful and in so fine a humor, at the close of a discussion upon the subject of removal."

This is Powell, for whom all our sympathies are so pathetically invoked! a treacherous assassin, not only of our people, but of his own—for he it was who waylaid, and shot in the back, in the most cowardly manner, the brave chief Charley Emarthla, whom he dared not face, and whom he thus assassinated because he refused to join him and his runaway negroes in murdering the white people. The collector of Indian curiosities and portraits, Mr. Catlin, may be permitted to manufacture a hero out of this assassin, and to make a poetical scene of his imprisonment on Sullivan's island; but it will not do for an American Senator to take the same liberties with historical truth and our national character. Powell ought to have been hung for the assassination of General Thompson; and the only fault of our officers is, that they did not hang him the moment they caught him. The fate of Arbuthnot and Ambrister was due to him a thousand times over.

I have now answered the accusation of the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. SOUTHARD.] I have shown the origin of this war. I have shown that it originated in no fraud, no injustice, no violence, on the part of this Government, but in the thirst for blood and rapine on the part of these Indians, and in their confident belief that their swamps would be their protection against the pursuit of the whites; and that, emerging from these fastnesses to commit robbery and murder, and retiring to them to enjoy the fruits of their marauding expeditions, they had before them a long perspective of impunity in the enjoyment of their favorite occupation. This I have shown to be the cause of the war; and having vindicated the Administration and the country from the injustice of the imputation cast upon them, I proceed to answer some things said by a Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. PRESTON,] which tended to disparage the troops generally which have been employed in Florida; to disparage a particular general officer, and also to accuse that general officer of a particular and specified offence. That Senator has decried our troops in Florida for the general inefficiency of their operations; he has decried General Jesup for the general imbecility of his operations, and he has charged this General with the violation of a flag, and the commission of a perfidious act, in detaining and imprisoning the Indian Powell, who came into his camp. I think there is great error and great injustice in all these imputations, and that it is right for some Senator on this floor to answer them. My position, as chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, would seem to assign that duty to me; and it may be the reason why others who have spoken have omitted all reply on these points. Be that as it may, I feel impelled to say something in behalf of those who are absent, and cannot speak for themselves—those who must always feel the wound of unmerited censure; and must feel it more keenly when the blow that inflicts the wound falls from the elevated theatre of the American Senate. So far as the army, generally, is concerned in this censure, I might leave them where they have been placed by the Senator from South Carolina, and others on that side of the House, if I could limit myself to acting a political part here. The army, as a body, is no friend of the political party to which I belong. Individuals among them are friendly to the Administration; but, as a body, they go for the Opposition, and would terminate our political existence, and put our opponents in our place, at the first general election that intervenes. As a politician, then, I might abandon them to the care of their political friends; but, as an American, as a Senator, and as having had some connection with the military profession, I feel myself called upon to dissent from the opinion which has been expressed, and to give my reasons for believing that the army has not suffered, or ought not to suffer, by the events in Florida. True, our officers and soldiers have not performed the same feats there which they performed in Canada, and elsewhere. But why? Certainly because they have not got the same, or an equivalent, theatre to act upon, nor an enemy to cope with over whom brilliant victories can be obtained. The peninsula of Florida, where this war rages, is sprinkled all over with swamps, hammocks, and lagoons, believed for three hundred years to be impervious to the white man's tread. The theatre of war is of great extent, stretching over six parallels of latitude; all of it in the sultry region below thirty-one degrees of north latitude. The extremity of this peninsula approaches the tropic of capricorn; and at this moment, while we speak here, the soldier under arms at midday there will cast no shadow: a vertical sun darts its fiery rays direct upon the crown of his head. Suffocating heat oppresses the frame; annoying insects sting the body; burning sands, a spongy morass, and the sharp cutting saw grass, receive the feet and legs; disease follows the summer's exertion; and a dense foliage covers the foe. Eight months in the year military exertions are impossible; during four months only can any thing be done. The Indians well understand this; and, during these four months, either give, or receive an attack as they please, or endeavor to consume the season in wiley parleys. The possibility of splendid military exploits does not exist in such a country, and against such a foe: but there is room there, and ample room there, for the exhibition of the highest qualities of the soldier. There is room there for patience, and for fortitude, under every variety of suffering, and under every form of privation. There is room there for courage and discipline to exhibit itself against perils and trials which subject courage and discipline to the severest tests. And has there been any failure of patience, fortitude, courage, discipline, and subordination in all this war? Where is the instance in which the men have revolted against their officers, or in which the officer has deserted his men? Where is the instance of a flight in battle? Where the instance of orders disobeyed, ranks broken, or confusion of corps? On the contrary, we have constantly seen the steadiness, and the discipline, of the parade maintained under every danger, and in the presence of massacre itself. Officers and men have fought it out where they were told to fight; they have been killed in the tracks in which they were told to stand. None of those pitiable scenes of which all our Indian wars have shown some—those harrowing scenes in which the helpless prisoner, or the hapless fugitive, is massacred without pity, and without resistance; none of these have been seen. Many have perished; but it was the death of the combatant in arms, and not of the captive or the fugitive. In no one of our savage wars have our troops so stood together, and conquered together, and died together, as they have done in this one; and this standing together is the test of the soldier's character. Steadiness, subordination, courage, discipline; these are the test of the soldier; and in no instance have our troops, or any troops, ever evinced the possession of these qualities in a higher degree than during the campaigns in Florida. While, then, brilliant victories may not have been seen, and in fact were impossible, yet the highest qualities of good soldiership have been eminently displayed throughout this war. Courage and discipline have shown themselves, throughout all its stages, in their noblest forms.

From the general imputation of inefficiency in our operations in Florida, the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. PRESTON] comes to a particular commander, and charges inefficiency specifically upon him. This commander is General Jesup. The Senator from South Carolina has been lavish, and even profuse, in his denunciation of that General, and has gone so far as to talk about military courts of inquiry. Leaving the General open to all such inquiry, and thoroughly convinced that the Senator from South Carolina has no idea of moving such inquiry, and intends to rest the effect of his denunciation upon its delivery here, I shall proceed to answer him here—giving speech for speech on this floor, and leaving the General himself to reply when it comes to that threatened inquiry, which I undertake to affirm will never be moved.

General Jesup is charged with imbecility and inefficiency; the continuance of the war is imputed to his incapacity; and he is held up here, on the floor of the Senate, to public reprehension for these imputed delinquencies. This is the accusation; and now let us see with how much truth and justice it is made. Happily for General Jesup, this happens to be a case in which we have data to go upon, and in which there are authentic materials for comparing the operations of himself with those of other Generals—his predecessors in the same field—with whose success the Senator from South Carolina is entirely satisfied. Dates and figures furnish this data and these materials; and after refreshing the memory of the Senate with a few dates, I will proceed to the answers which the facts of the case supply. The first date is, as to the time of the commencement of this war; the second, as to the time that General Jesup assumed the command; the third, as to the time when he was relieved from the command. On the first point, it will be recollected that the war broke out upon the assassination of General Thompson, the agent; Lieut. Smith, who was with him; the suttler and his clerks; the murder of the two expresses; and the massacre of Major Dade's command; events which came together in point of time, and compelled an immediate resort to war by the United States. These assassinations, these murders, and this massacre, took place on the 28th day of December, 1835. The commencement of the war then dates from that day. The next point is, the time of General Jesup's appointment to the command. This occurred in December, 1836. The third point is, the date of General Jesup's relief from the command, and this took place in May, of the present year, 1838. The war has then continued, counting to the present time, two years and a half; and of that period, General Jesup has had command something less than one year and a half. Other Generals had command for a year before he was appointed in that quarter. Now, how much had those other Generals done? All put together, how much had they done? And I ask this question not to disparage their meritorious exertions, but to obtain data for the vindication of the officer now assailed. The Senator from South Carolina is satisfied with the operations of the previous commanders; now let him see how the operations of the officer whom he assails will compare with the operations of those who are honored with his approbation.

The Senate will recollect that, early in the present session, a Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAVIS] made a very detailed call upon the Secretary at War, for information upon all the events of the Florida war; and that an answer, fully commensurate with the call, was duly returned. That answer was printed by the order of the Senate, and constitutes No. 226 of our Executive documents. One of the inquiries contained in the call was, as to the number of the killed, wounded, and prisoners by our arms during this war? To that call I find this response in the answer of the Secretary:

"From the commencement of Indian hostilities in Florida, in December, 1835, inclusive of November, 1836, it is seen that the number of Indians reported to have been killed, is 131; the number of Indians, women, children, and negroes taken prisoners within the same period, 15."

This statement, it will be perceived, comes down to the exact period at which General Jesup took the command, namely, December, 1836; the totality of the killed to that day was 131; the totality of the prisoners 15; making an aggregate of 146. Now we will see the result of General Jesup's operations. These amount to two thousand two hundred prisoners! and the killed may amount to seventy or eighty. Such are the comparative results. In prisoners, 2,200 against 15; in killed, about half as many under General Jesup as under his predecessors. Putting the totals of killed and prisoners together, and it will be 2,270 against 146; a difference of fifteen to one in favor of General Jesup!

Sir, I disparage nobody. I make no exhibit of comparative results to undervalue the operations of the previous commanders in Florida. I know the difficulty of miliary operations there, and the ease of criticism here. I never assailed those previous commanders; on the contrary, often pointed out the nature of the theatre on which they operated as a cause for the miscarriage of expeditions, and for the want of brilliant and decisive results. Now for the first time I refer to the point, and, not to disparage others, but to vindicate the officer assailed His vindication is found in the comparison of results between himself and his predecessors, and in the approbation of the Senator from South Carolina of the results under the predecessors of General Jesup. Satisfied with them, he must be satisfied with him; for the difference is as fifteen to one in favor of the decried General.

Besides the general denunciation for inefficiency, which the Senator from South Carolina has lavished upon General Jesup, and which denunciation has so completely received its answer in this comparative statement; besides this general denunciation, the Senator from South Carolina brought forward a specific accusation against the honor of the same officer—an accusation of perfidy, and of a violation of flag of truce, in the seizure and detention of the Indian Powell, who had come into his camp. On the part of General Jesup, I repel this accusation, and declare his whole conduct in relation to Powell to have been justifiable, under the laws of civilized or savage warfare; that it was expedient in point of policy; and that if any blame could attach to the General, it would be for the contrary of that with which he is blamed; it would be for an excess of forbearance and indulgence.

The justification of the General for the seizure and detention of this half-breed Indian, is the first point; and that rests upon several and distinct grounds, either of which fully justifies the act.

1. This Powell had broken his parole; and therefore, was liable to be seized and detained.

The facts were these: In the month of May, 1837, this Powell, with his followers, went into Fort Mellon, under the cover of a white flag, and there surrendered to Lieutenant Colonel Harney. He declared himself done with the war, and ready to emigrate to the west of the Mississippi, and solicited subsistence and transportation for himself and his people for that purpose. Lieutenant Colonel Harney received him, supplied him with provisions, and, relying upon his word and apparent sincerity, instead of sending him under guard, took his parole to go to Tampa Bay, the place at which he preferred to embark, to take shipping there for the West. Supplied with every thing, Powell and his people left Fort Mellon, under the pledge to go to Tampa Bay. He never went there! but returned to the hostiles; and it was afterwards ascertained that he never had any idea of going West, but merely wished to live well for a while at the expense of the whites, examine their strength and position, and return to his work of blood and pillage. After this, he had the audacity to approach General Jesup's camp in October of the same year, with another piece of white cloth over his head, thinking, after his successful treacheries to the agent, General Thompson, and Lieutenant Colonel Harney, that there was no end to his tricks upon white people. General Jesup ordered him to be seized and carried a prisoner to Sullivan's Island, where he was treated with the greatest humanity, and allowed every possible indulgence and gratification. This is one of the reasons in justification of General Jesup's conduct to that Indian, and it is sufficient of itself; but there are others, and they shall be stated.

2. Powell had violated an order in coming in, with a view to return to the hostiles; and, therefore, was liable to be detained.

The facts were these: Many Indians, at different times, had come in under the pretext of a determination to emigrate; and after receiving supplies, and viewing the strength and position of the troops, returned again to the hostiles, and carried on the war with renewed vigor. This had been done repeatedly. It was making a mockery of the white flag, and subjecting our officers to ridicule as well as to danger. General Jesup resolved to put an end to these treacherous and dangerous visits, by which spies and enemies obtained access to the bosom of his camp. He made known to the chief, Coi Hadjo, his determination to that effect. In August, 1837, he declared peremptorily to this chief, for the information of all the Indians, that none were to come in, except to remain, and to emigrate; that no one coming into his camp again should be allowed to go out of it, but should be considered as having surrendered with a view to emigrate under the treaty, and should be detained for that purpose. In October, Powell came in, in violation of that order, and was detained in compliance with it. This is a second reason for the justification of General Jesup, and is of itself sufficient to justify him; but there is more justification yet, and I will state it.

3. Powell had broken a truce, and, therefore, was liable to be detained whenever he could be taken.

The facts were these: The hostile chiefs entered into an agreement for a truce at Fort King, in August, 1837, and agreed: 1. Not to commit any act of hostility upon the whites; 2. Not to go east of the St. Johns river, or north of Fort Mellon. This truce was broken by the Indians in both points. A citizen was killed by them, and they passed both to the east of the St. Johns and far north of Fort Mellon. As violators of this truce, General Jesup had a right to detain any of the hostiles which came into his hands, and Powell was one of these.

Here, sir, are three grounds of justification, either of them sufficient to justify the conduct of General Jesup towards Powell. The first of the three reasons applies personally and exclusively to that half breed; the other two apply to all the hostile Indians, and justify the seizure and detention of others, who have been sent to the West.

So much for justification; now for the expediency of having detained this Indian Powell. I hold it was expedient to exercise the right of detaining him, and prove this expediency by reasons both a priori and a posteriori. His previous treachery and crimes, and his well known disposition for further treachery and crimes, made it right for the officers of the United States to avail themselves of the first justifiable occasion to put an end to his depredations by confining his person until the war was over, This is a reason a priori. The reason a posteriori is, that it has turned out right; it has operated well upon the mass of the Indians, between eighteen and nineteen hundred of which, negroes inclusive, have since surrendered to Gen. Jesup. This, sir, is a fact which contains an argument which overturns all that can be said on this floor against the detention of Powell. The Indians themselves do not view that act as perfidious or dishonorable, or the violation of a flag, or even the act of an enemy. They do not condemn General Jesup on account of it, but no doubt respect him the more for refusing to be made the dupe of a treacherous artifice. A bit of white linen, stripped, perhaps from the body of a murdered child, or its murdered mother, was no longer to cover the insidious visits of spies and enemies. A firm and manly course was taken, and the effect was good upon the minds of the Indians. The number since surrendered is proof of its effect upon their minds; and this proof should put to blush the lamentations which are here set up for Powell, and the censure thrown upon General Jesup.

No, sir, no. General Jesup has been guilty of no perfidy, no fraud, no violation of flags. He has done nothing to stain his own character, or to dishonor the flag of the United States. If he has erred, it has been on the side of humanity, generosity, and forbearance to the Indians. If he has erred, as some suppose, in losing time to parley with the Indians, that error has been on the side of humanity, and of confidence in them. But has he erred? Has his policy been erroneous? Has the country been a loser by his policy? To all these questions, let results give the answer. Let the twenty-two hundred Indians, abstracted from the hostile ranks by his measures, be put in contrast with the two hundred, or less, killed and taken by his predecessors. Let these results be compared; and let this comparison answer the question whether, in point of fact, there has been any error, even a mistake of judgment, in his mode of conducting the war.

The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. PRESTON] complains of the length of time which General Jesup has consumed without bringing the war to a close. Here, again, the chapter of comparisons must be resorted to in order to obtain the answer which justice requires. How long, I pray you, was General Jesup in command? from December, 1836, to May, 1838; nominally he was near a year and a half in command; in reality not one year, for the summer months admit of no military operations in that peninsula. His predecessors commanded from December, 1836, to December, 1836; a term wanting but a few months of as long a period as the command of General Jesup lasted. Sir, there is nothing in the length of time which this general commanded, to furnish matter for disadvantageous comparisons to him; but the contrary. He reduced the hostiles about one-half in a year and a half; they reduced them about the one-twentieth in a year. The whole number was about 5,000; General Jesup diminished their numbers, during his command, 2,200; the other generals had reduced them about 150. At the rate he proceeded, the work would be finished in about three years; at the rate they proceeded, in about twenty years. Yet he is to be censured here for the length of time consumed without bringing the war to a close. He, and he alone, is selected for censure. Sir, I dislike these comparisons; it is a disagreeable task for me to make them; but I am driven to it, and mean no disparagement to others. The violence with which General Jesup is assailed here—the comparisons to which he has been subjected in order to degrade him—leave me no alternative but to abandon a meritorious officer to unmerited censure, or to defend him in the same manner in which he has been assailed.

The Senator from South Carolina speaks of the large force which was committed to General Jesup, and the little that was effected with that force. Is the Senator aware of the extent of the country over which his operations extended? that it extended from 31 to 25 degrees of north latitude? that it began in the Okefenokee swamp in Georgia, and stretched to the Everglades in Florida? that it was near five hundred miles in length in a straight line, and the whole sprinkled over with swamps, one of which alone was equal in length to the distance between Washington City and Philadelphia? But it was not extent of country alone, with its fastnesses, its climate, and its wily foe, that had to be contended with; a new element of opposition was encountered by General Jesup, in the poisonous information which was conveyed to the Indians' minds, which encouraged them to hold out, and of which he had not even knowledge for a long time. This was the quantity of false information which was conveyed to the Indians, to stimulate and encourage their resistance. General Jesup took command just after the Presidential election of 1836. The Indians were informed of this change of Presidents, and were taught to believe that the white people had broke General Jackson—that was the phrase—had broke General Jackson for making war upon them. They were also informed that General Jesup was carrying on the war without the leave of Congress; that Congress would give no more money to raise soldiers to fight them; and that he dared not come home to Congress. Yes, he dared not come home to Congress! These poor Indians seem to have been informed of intended movements against the General in Congress, and to have relied upon them both to stop supplies and to punish the General. Moreover, they were told, that, if they surrendered to emigrate, they would receive the worst treatment on the way; that, if a child cried, it would be thrown overboard; if a chief gave offence, he would be put in irons. Who the immediate informants of all these fine stories were, cannot be exactly ascertained. They doubtless originated with that mass of fanatics, devoured by a morbid sensibility for negroes and Indians, which are now Don Quixotting over the land, and filling the public ear with so many sympathetic tales of their own fabrication. The Cherokees who went among the Seminoles are reported to have encouraged them to remain in the country, though to cease fighting.

These false and poisonous reports, sent among the Indians, greatly increased the difficulties of General Jesup. They encouraged them to hold out, and poisoned their minds against him personally. Under all these disadvantages, it is wonderful that he did so much; especially that he succeeded so well in gaining their confidence, and inducing so large a number of them to come in. The hostiles were computed at five thousand souls at the commencement of the war; near one-half of them have been withdrawn from the war by the measures of General Jesup. The negroes, whose influence was so great among the Indians, and whose ferocity was so implacable against the whites, have nearly all surrendered. They were computed at 4 or 500 at the breaking out of the war; not 40 now remain; and thus this most insidious, dangerous, and ferocious part of the enemy—that portion to which, and to Powell, we are indebted for the war—are now reduced to nothing, and their weight no longer to be dreaded or felt. I repeat: General Jesup has withdrawn nearly one-half of the whole number of Indians from the hostile ranks; let any other commander do as much, and the peninsula is cleared of all its enemies.

The essential policy of General Jesup has been to induce the Indians to come in—to surrender—and to emigrate under the treaty. This has been his main, but not his exclusive, policy; military operations have been combined with it; many skirmishes and actions have been fought since he had command; and it is remarkable that this General, who has been so much assailed on this floor, is the only commander-in-chief in Florida who has been wounded in battle at the head of his command. His person marked with the scars of wounds received in Canada during the late war with Great Britain, has also been struck by a bullet, in the face, in the peninsula of Florida; yet these wounds—the services in the late war with Great Britain—the removal of upwards of 16,000 Creek Indians from Alabama and Georgia to the West, during the summer of 1836—and more than twenty-five years of honorable employment in the public service—all these combined, and an unsullied private character into the bargain, have not been able to protect the feelings of this officer from laceration on this floor. Have not been sufficient to protect his feelings! for, as to his character that is untouched. The base accusation—the vague denunciation—the offensive epithets employed here, may lacerate feelings, but they do not reach character; and as to the military inquiry, which the Senator from South Carolina speaks of, I undertake to say that no such inquiry will ever take place. Congress, or either branch of Congress, can order an inquiry if it pleases; but before it orders an inquiry, a probable cause has to be shown for it; and that probable cause never has been, and never will be, shown in General Jesup's case.

The expenses of this war is another head of attack pressed into this debate, and directed more against the Administration than against the Commanding General. It is said to have cost twenty millions of dollars; but that is an error—an error of near one half. An actual return of all expenses up to February last, amounts to nine and a half millions; the rest of the twenty millions go to the suppression of hostilities in other places, and with other Indians, principally in Georgia and Alabama, and with the Cherokees and Creeks. Sir, this charge of expense seems to be a standing head with the Opposition at present. Every speech gives us a dish of it; and the expenditures under General Jackson and Mr. Van Buren are constantly put in contrast with those of previous Administrations. Granted that these expenditures are larger—that they are greatly increased; yet what are they increased for? Are they increased for the personal expenses of the officers of the Government, or for great national objects? The increase is for great objects; such as the extinction of Indian titles in the States east of the Mississippi—the removal of whole nations of Indians to the west of the Mississippi—their subsistence for a year after they arrive there—actual wars with some tribes—the fear of it with others, and the consequent continual calls for militia and volunteers to preserve peace—large expenditures for the permanent defences of the country, both by land and water, with a pension list forever increasing; and other heads of expenditure which are for future national benefit, and not for present individual enjoyment. Stripped of all these heads of expenditure, and the expenses of the present Administration have nothing to fear from a comparison with other periods. Stated in the gross, as is usually done, and many ignorant people are deceived and imposed upon, and believe that there has been a great waste of public money; pursued into the detail, and these expenditures will be found to have been made for great national objects—objects which no man would have undone, to get back the money, even if it was possible to get back the money by undoing the objects. No one, for example, would be willing to bring back the Creeks, the Cherokees, the Choctaws, and Chickasaws into Alabama, Mississippi, Georgia, Tennessee and North Carolina, even if the tens of millions which it has cost to remove them could be got back by that means; and so of the other expenditures; yet these eternal croakers about expense are blaming the Government for these expenditures.

Sir, I have gone over the answers which I proposed to make to the accusations of the Senators from New Jersey and South Carolina. I have shown them to be totally mistaken in all their assumptions and imputations. I have shown that there was no fraud upon the Indians in the treaty at Fort Gibson—that the identical chiefs who made that treaty have since been the hostile chiefs—that the assassination and massacre of an agent, two Government expresses, an artillery officer, five citizens, and the 112 men of Major Dade's command, caused the war—that our troops are not subject to censure for inefficiency—that General Jesup has been wrongfully denounced upon this floor—and that even the expense of the Florida war, resting as it does in figures and in documents, has been vastly overstated to produce effect upon the public mind. All these things I have shown; and I conclude with saying that cost, and time, and loss of men, are all out of the question; that, for outrages so wanton and so horrible as those which occasioned this war, the national honor requires the most ample amends, and the national safety requires a future guarantee in prosecuting this war to a successful close, and completely clearing the peninsula of Florida of all the Indians that are upon it.

SUPPRESSION OF INDIAN HOSTILITIES.

SPEECH OF MR. TURNEY,
OF TENNESSEE,

In the House of Representatives, May 31, and June 1, 1838—In Committee of the Whole, on the bill to suppress Indian hostilities.

Mr. TURNEY addressed the committee as follows:

Mr. Chairman: Personally, I entertain for my colleague [Mr. BELL] good feelings; but differing from him in politics, and having heard him repeatedly denounce on this floor the party, its principles, and its motives, of which I am a humble member, and having read, with astonishment, a speech delivered by him in the city of Hartford, State of Connecticut, in which he denounced both the men and measures which he had heretofore professed to support with zeal and devotion, and being the only member from my State of the party to which I belong who is in a situation and in the habit of participating in debates, it would, under these circumstances, be criminal in me longer to remain silent. I shall, therefore, proceed to discuss the bill under consideration, and shall speak of men and measures as truth may authorize or duty demand.

My colleague, in his introductory remarks, complains that one portion of the members of this House (meaning, I suppose, the friends of the Administration) are, or were, prepared to vote on this measure without discussion; that they had not examined the subject; had formed no opinions of their own, but were voting on the confidence which they had in the Executive who recommended it; and that this party was unwilling to afford the Opposition time to examine the subject, and to form opinions to enable them to act understandingly. Sir, I deny the truth of this assertion. I do not know by what rule my colleague acted while he was in the ranks of the Administration. He may have acted then as he now charges others with doing—of giving to the Executive recommendations his support, without any opinion of their correctness, merely because they had been recommended. This is not the course which the friends of the Administration are pursuing. They, sir, so far as I have any knowledge, have examined the different subjects of legislation for themselves, and act upon their own judgments and opinions of their respective merits. But my colleague [Mr. BELL] complains of this party for attempting to hurry this measure through, without giving to the Opposition time and opportunity of examining the subject, and forming their opinions on the merits of the measure. The Opposition have had the same time and opportunity for preparation, that the friends of the Administration have had to qualify themselves to act understandingly on the subject; but this was not, in fact, the true cause of complaint. They are not only prepared to vote, but were prepared to rise in their places, and make long speeches for the purpose of informing others how to act. Sir, the truth is, and it is useless to attempt to disguise it, that the Opposition desired and were determined to consume the public time by making long speeches, not on the merits of the bill, but to abuse the present and late Administrations for party purposes and political effect.

Mr. Chairman, my colleague complains of the discretionary power conferred on the President of the United States by the Indian treaties, and charges the late President not only with a great dereliction of duty, but with usurpation of power in the discharge of his duties in the execution of them. He charges, for party and political purposes, that he had appointed unworthy agents, who were not qualified to discharge the duties confided to them, and who had used their appointments for the purpose of speculating on the Indians, and that these were the causes which led to and produced the Creek and Florida wars. These charges will be noticed in their order; but before proceeding to do so, I will bestow a few moments to the consideration of the remedy which my colleague, as chairmain of the Committee on Indian Affairs, had proposed on the 1st July, 1836. Here Mr. T. read from the journal:

"Mr. BELL, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported the following:

"Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs have power to sit in the recess of Congress, for the purpose of completing the investigation directed by the resolution of this House of the 15th of January last, and that any two or more of them, under the direction of the committee, be authorized to take testimony in relation to the same."

It is the duty of the President of the United States, under the Constitution and laws, to see that these treaties were faithfully executed; and to show that the President had, in the discharge of this duty promptly and efficiently, on the first intimation he had of frauds having been perpetrated on the Indians, I will read to the House the remarks of the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. GRANTLAND] which were made when this resolution was undergoing consideration and discussion in this House.

"Mr. GRANTLAND said that the Georgia delegation concurred fully in all that had been said by the gentleman from Alabama, as to the disposition evinced by the President and the Secretary of War to have a strict investigation of the frauds alleged to have been committed in certifying contracts for Creek Indian lands. At the suggestion, and on the recommendation, of the Georgia delegation, two additional commissioners, gentlemen of high character, were appointed several months ago to aid Colonel Hogan in bringing that investigation to a speedy close. While that investigation was in progress, it was arrested by the commencement of Indian hostility."

From these remarks, sir, it appears that the President had, upon the advice and recommendation of the Georgia delegation, some months previous to that time, appointed two gentlemen of high character for integrity and patriotism, of undoubted capacity and qualifications, to act as commissioners, in addition to those who had been previously appointed to investigate the alleged frauds. What more could he have done? If this was done, and none pretend to deny it, I would like to be informed of the necessity or utility of this House sending a committee of politicians to the State of Alabama to investigate Indian frauds. Was it to be expected that a committee, coming, as they did, from the different States in the Union, and who were unacquainted both with the Indians and the people of the South, where, and by whom it was alleged these frauds had been committed, could be better, or half so well qualified, to discharge this duty as gentlemen raised in the vicinity, and who were well and intimately acquainted not only with the whites and Indians, by and between whom the contracts and dealings had taken place, and those frauds had been perpetrated, but who had a knowledge of the nature and character of these dealings, and the persons by whom the facts could be proven? For the purpose of showing to the committee the opinions entertained, at least by a portion of the members of this House, when this resolution was reported by the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, I will read an extract from the speech then delivered by an honorable gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. BOON] who is now a member of this House

"Mr. BOON said that he had entire confidence in the President, and he had no doubt but what every exertion would be made by the President to probe this matter to the bottom; and if fraud shall be found to exist, have the guilty punished. Sir, said Mr. B. I am one of those who never feared responsibility on my part; and as one of the representatives of the people I am willing to bear my share of responsibility in voting against the appointment of a committee on the part of this House, to travel through the country to electioneer from now until the next annual meeting of Congress, at eight dollars per day, and eight dollars for every twenty miles' travel. Mr. Speaker, I will not detain the House at this late period of the session, but I felt myself called upon to say thus much by way of offset to some of the many charges that have been made against the Administration and its friends."

From a full view of this subject, I have come to the conclusion that the case supposed by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BOON] was the real object of the committee. For I cannot for a moment believe that the House desired to send a committee of some eight or nine members to the State of Alabama, at an expense to the Government of eight dollars per day, and the like sum for every twenty miles each travelled in his tour during the recess of Congress, in going to and returning from the place where these investigations were progressing under the commissioners appointed by the President. Was it designed that this committee should superintend and overlook the movements and conduct of the commissioners? or was not the secret object the one which was suggested by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. BOON]?

I will now notice the charge made by my colleague [Mr. BELL] against the late President of the United States, of appointing, for party and political purposes, unworthy agents. Is this charge true? Who was the unworthy agent, and what party or political object was to be effected by his appointment? On this subject, my colleague is as silent as the grave. He will not afford to the friends of the late President an opportunity of disproving this charge. But upon whom does the labor rest? Who makes the charge? Who holds the affirmative? My colleague makes it. He charges misconduct and corruptions on the late President in certain official acts; which, if true, are susceptible of positive, and direct proof; but, if untrue, cannot be negatived by proof. Where then is the evidence to justify this grave charge? None has been afforded. Does it exist in his imagination, or has it any foundation in fact? Let us for a few moments investigate it. My colleague is the last member on this floor who should make such a charge. He ought to recollect that he now is, and has been, at the head of the Committee on Indian Affairs for many years, and during almost the entire Administration of General Jackson, and as such, it was his particular and especial duty to investigate and report to the Houses every thing connected with the execution of the treaties, or touching the interest of this nation or the interest of the Indians in any way connected with the treaties, or our relations to the Indians. But no such report has been made; and if this charge was known to be true, he was himself guilty of a much greater dereliction of duty for not bringing the subject properly before the House in some tangible form. But, again: my colleague was examined as a witness before a celebrated select committee of this House, and he was particularly interrogated as to any frauds in the Executive Departments; and if this charge was true, why did he not disclose it when called on, and sworn to tell the whole truth? Sir, the fact of his failing to disclose it, is evidence conclusive that the charge has no foundation, or that he failed to tell the whole truth, as he was sworn to do. From these facts, and others which I could name, I am well satisfied that this charge has no foundation in truth. But my colleague inquires, with an air of triumph, how it is that one Indian could personate another? I will tell him how I suppose it was done. A certifying agent was appointed by the President, and sent there for the purpose of certifying to the Government the sales of Indian reservations made to the whites. This agent was furnished, I suppose, with a list of reservations. He, in fact, did not, nor could it be expected that he should, personally know all the Indians who were entitled to reservations under the treaty, an Indian would present himself to the agent, claiming to be entitled to a reservation, assuming the name of another. He bringing another with him to identify himself as the reservee, the agent never having seen him before, takes it for granted that he is the reservee. The sale is made, the deed signed and certified, and they retire; and others come in throughout the day, so that it is impossible for the agent to be able to recognise and identify the Indians afterwards. And as to the frauds in paying the money in the presence of the agent, and taking it back after they have left his office, this was a species of fraud that the agent could not, nor was it expected that he would, prevent. He had protected the Indian, so far as to see that he received a full and fair price for his land, and that the money was in fact paid to him; and there his duty and power were at an end, after which the Indian could do as he pleased with the money.

I next propose to consider the amendment offered by my colleague. This amendment proposes, first, to divert two millions of the sum in the bill from the objects therein specified, and to place it in the power of the President to use it in negotiating a new treaty with the Indians. If this amendment be adopted, it will be in effect to open the present treaty, and to authorize the making a new one. To this I am decidedly opposed. In my opinion, the best policy to be adopted to induce the Indians to remove in peace to their new homes, would be to adopt an amendment to this bill, providing that all extraordinary expenses in the execution of this treaty, produced by either their hostile movements, or obstinate refusal to execute it according to its letter and spirit, should be deducted from the five millions six hundred thousand dollars agreed to be given them for their lands. This would make it their interest to remove in peace. I am opposed to the policy of paying them for their friendship. I am willing, on all occasions, to act justly and liberally towards them; but at the same time, I would let them know that they were expected to act in good faith, and to comply with their stipulations with the Government. For what purpose was it proposed to give them this two millions, in addition to the five millions six hundred thousand dollars, given in the treaty? Is it offered simply as a bribe to remove in peace? And if so, what assurance have you that they will do so after they receive the two millions more than you now have? None. This amendment, therefore, cannot be productive of any possible advantage; and for one, I would never consent to tax the laboring white man, to raise money to give to the lazy, thieving, and murderous savage. Congress has no power to do so. In view of the Constitution, Congress has no power to levy and collect taxes but for the purpose of raising a revenue to meet the legitimate wants of the Government. Any other construction would be conferring on Congress unlimited powers of taxation.

Again, sir: my colleague says that Tennessee held back and would have permitted the Indians to have remained there unmolested forever. In this I think he is much mistaken. As early as 1829, a bill was introduced by Mr. CARTER in the Tennessee Legislature, extending the laws of that State over that portion of the Cherokee nation which was within the limits of the State.

[Here Mr. TURNEY was interrupted by Mr. CARTER, who said that he introduced the bill referred to by Mr. TURNEY; but after he had done so, he examined the Cherokee treaties, and came to the conclusion that the Legislature had no power to enact the law. That he was by no means certain, but was impressed with the belief that Mr. T. then entertained the opinion that the Legislature had no power to extend the laws over the Cherokee territory.]

Mr. TURNEY resumed. The gentleman is grossly mistaken in relation to my opinions; on the contrary, I have expressed my opinion in favor of the power of the State, as early as 1826 or 1827. The reason why the bill introduced by Mr. CARTER was not passed into a law, was, that Gen. Jackson had, but a short time previously, been elected President of the United States, and it was believed, by his friends in the Legislature, to be impolitic for Tennessee to take the lead on that subject, thereby seeming to dictate to the President the course of policy he ought to pursue on this important subject, but that it would be more more modest and respectful for the State to await the action of other States equally interested, and accordingly the bill was never acted on. But at the next session of the Legislature, which was in 1831, and which was four or five years before this treaty was made, the Legislature of Tennessee did extend her laws over that portion of the Indian nation lying within her chartered limits. Knowing as I do the anxious desire of the great mass of the people of the State to acquire the immediate possession of this country, I would be recreant to my constituents were I not to insist upon the prompt execution of the treaty, by the immediate removal of the Indians west of the Mississippi river.

Mr. Chairman, my colleague has told us that this Indian policy involves issues of vital importance. Sir, if he had said that the opposition to this policy involved issues of vital importance to this Government, and to the stability of the Union, I would agree with him. This opposition to the late and present Administrations, of removing the Indians west of the Mississippi river, and of executing in good faith the treaties which have been fairly and bona fide entered into with them, by which at least two prices had been paid for their land, has something more in it than a mere desire to do justice to the Indians. Yes, sir, this opposition, when well understood, will be found to be nothing more nor less than a branch of Abolitionism in disguise, which I will prove by documentary evidence, if the committee will give me their attention for a short time. Your table is crowded with petitions praying a rescision of the Cherokee treaty. From what quarter of the Union do these petitions emanate? Do they come from the States where the Indians are situated, and from citizens who are acquainted with their wants and conditions? No, sir: they come not only from the Abolition States, but are printed by Abolition presses; are signed and sent here by Abolitionists themselves. These are the men, women and children who are praying in behalf of the Indians for the rescinding of the treaty. I will now read from a pamphlet which has been laid on our tables, the title of which is, "The Sixth Annual Report of the Board of Managers of the Massachusetts Anti-Slavery Society." Speaking of the Indians, the author says:

"It may be safely affirmed that the war now waging by this nation against the Indians, has an aggravation of guilt on our part scarcely equalled by any tribe or nation in any age or clime since the first murderer slew his brother Abel. The recital of their wrongs and sufferings which they are now experiencing, and have been called to endure within the last five years, (a recital not from their own lips, but by those who are engaged in their expulsion or extermination,) is soul harrowing. The primary object of the South, through the instrumentality of the General Government, is doubly atrocious: first, to get forcible possession of their lands; and next, upon those lands to establish slavery, with all woes and horrors."

I read this for the purpose of showing that the removal of the Indians west of the Mississippi river was opposed by the same set of people who, under the false and pretended garb of religion, were straining every nerve for the nefarious purpose of exciting the slaves of the South to insurrection and bloodshed. Why all this apparent sympathy in behalf of the Indians? Is it because they murder the women and children on our Southern frontier? Or is it because they think that they would be important allies to the slaves in the event of their rebellion against the whites? Or is it because they desire to reward the Cherokees for their treachery in Florida, when they went there under the pretence of friendship, and for the laudable purpose of advising the Seminoles to peace, but secretly advised them to fight on; and told them if they would not surrender until the close of the then campaign, that the war would be over, as Congress would not make another appropriation for its prosecution? These questions I will leave for my colleague and others, who advocate the cause of the Indians against their own Government, to answer. But sir, there is something more in this damning heresy than is seen at the first blush. It is not only the Northern fanatics that we have to combat with, but I will charge here, in my place, that this was a mere party question. The Federal party, or at least the Northern portion of them, have united themselves to, and are now making common cause with, the Abolitionists. In truth, and in fact, Abolition forms one of the main and leading principles in the political creed of the Federal party. I will prove it. At an early period of the present session, we were excessively annoyed with the numerous petitions which were introduced on this subject, and the inflammatory and highly exciting debate which was commenced; to suppress which, and to prevent any further legislative action on the subject, an honorable gentleman from Virginia, not now a member of this House, [Mr. PATTON,] offered a resolution, the object and provisions of which were well understood by this House and by the country. On the passage of the resolution, there was not a member opposed to the late and present Administrations from a free State who voted for it. Was this the work of party, or was it fanaticism? If it was not the effect of party spirit and party discipline, it was strange that this fanatical enthusiasm should be confined alone to a set of gentlemen who entertained certain political opinions. Why did it not infuse itself among the Democrats from the same States? But this is not all. This irritating and exciting question was before the Legislature of the State of New York, and in that body the two great parties of this nation were divided, and the newspapers inform us that it was strictly a party vote in both houses; the opponents of the present Administration voting in favor of Abolition, and the friends of the Administration against it. In the House, where the Opposition had the majority, the resolutions passed; in the Senate, where the Administration had the majority, they were rejected. This has very much the appearance of party spirit and party action, for the purpose of effecting party objects and purposes. I could refer the House to the resolutions passed by the Legislatures of other States, of similar import; but it is unnecessary. I will, however, read to the committee another authority; it is one, I presume, my colleague will not object to.

[Mr. T. here read an extract from a speech delivered by Mr. BELL to his constituents, in Nashville, on the 23d May, 1835. In speaking of parties, Mr. BELL said:

"A proscribed and disregarded minority, respectable for its numbers, its talents, and even for the virtues of many of its members—for virtue is never the exclusive attribute of any one party—such a minority is always tempted, in resentment of its real or imaginary wrongs, in redress of its violated privileges as American citizens, in being deprived of all actual participation in the Government of the country—compelled to obey laws, and to be the subjects of a policy, prescribed and directed exclusively by their opponents. Such a minority, I repeat, is constantly tempted to seize upon every vexed and irritating question, to make common cause with the spirit of fanaticism itself, in an effort to right, or, at all events, to avenge, their injuries. This is the danger of our system. It is still party."

Has my colleague, to use his own language, seized "upon this vexed and irritating question," and made common cause with the Abolitionists, for the purpose of revenge? And is this the course which his party has adopted, and are now pursuing, for the purpose of turning their adversaries out, and placing themselves in power? If so, the people ought to know it. Yes, sir, this is an attempt on the part of the Federal party to unite, by these means, the entire Church in the free States, hoping, by such influences, to gain the ascendancy, and place themselves in power. If they should be able to accomplish this object, what will be the condition of this happy Republic? A union not only of Bank and Government, but also a union of Church and Government. Whenever the Church shall unite upon any common object, and shall acquire strength and influence enough to control the Presidential elections, and shall enter into the political party strifes of the times, then, I say, the liberties of the people are greatly endangered. They may free the slaves, but this will not be all; for the Church will enter your legislative halls, dictate the policy of the Government, and give shape and substance to your laws.

My colleague, in his Hartford speech, pronounced the war in Florida an inglorious war. I will not do him the injustice to suppose that he meant by this language to say that our armies were disgraced by any cowardly conduct. How, then, is this war inglorious? Has this Government demanded any thing more of the Indians than it is entitled to by the provisions of a treaty fairly made, and upon a full and adequate consideration? Did he not, himself, vote for the appropriations to carry this treaty into execution? He certainly did. And has he not, from time to time, voted for the appropriations to carry on this war? Yes, sir. Then I would inquire what new light has since burst on his vision to prove the war was inglorious? The Abolitionist would say that the war was inglorious, because the South desired to settle these lands with a slaveholding population, and thereby to give strength and importance to the slaveholding interest of the Union; but this is a reason which my colleague [Mr. BELL] dare not give. He must find one more congenial to Southern feelings. I leave it for him to do so. Again: my colleague, in this same Hartford speech, said:

"I will refer to a few prominent measures of our present and late Administrations. First, I shall notice to you that by the pernicious course which has been pursued, the Congress of the Union, that safeguard and bulwark of our liberties as formed by our Constitution, has been, both in substance and in effect, abrogated and repealed. The Constitution has been constantly, habitually, trampled on and violated by the Executive, and a passive, timid, time-serving majority obtained in both Houses. The Senate, which was originally constituted as a check upon the Executive, has ceased to be so any longer; the State Legislatures, bought over and led by a party to make such nominations as were required of them, have sent instruments who are obedient to the mandates of the President, and not only of the President, but to the heads of his party."

This is a grave charge; the Executive should have been impeached. It remains, therefore, to inquire whether it be true; and if true, why was not the charge made at a proper time, and in a proper manner? In what, I would inquire, was the Constitution trampled on and violated? He does not condescend to tell us; and unless he will inform us in what particular, when, and in what manner, the Constitution was violated, it will not be possible to answer and refute the charge. But who were, I ask, "this passive, timid, and time-serving majority in both Houses of Congress?" What part did my colleague act? Did he stand up and manfully defend the Constitution as the great palladium of American liberty, against the lawless encroachments of the President and his degraded adherents? Or, did he give, in his own language, "his passive, timid, and time-serving aid," assistance, and support, to the Executive in his violation of that sacred instrument? He, sir, as I will show you before I have done, was a devoted leader of that "passive, timid, and time-serving" majority which he denounces with so much bitterness in his Hartford speech. But, sir, to pursue this celebrated speech a little farther. My colleague said:

"General Jackson professed economy. How did he practise it? From an expenditure of $13,000,000 he raised the expenses of the Government to thirty millions! Did not Jackson say that patronage ought to be limited? Yes. But still he doubled the Executive patronage in ten years! Did not Jackson manifest a desire to exercise a questionable authority, while he expressed his opinion on the danger of giving to the Executive too much power?"

Who raised the expenditures of this Government from thirteen to thirty millions? Was this the work of General Jackson? or, was it the acts of Congress? By the Constitution, no money can be drawn from the Treasury of the United States except by appropriations made by law. For what was this money expended. Was it, as my colleague alleges, for corrupt and profligate purposes? If so, then I would inquire who voted these profligate appropriations? My colleague, in his Nashville speech, says that in every instance "he gave to the Administration of General Jackson a devoted and zealous support." Then, sir, it was my colleague who voted these corrupt and profligate appropriations. He, by voting these appropriations, increased the expenditures from thirteen to thirty millions; and, by "his devoted and zealous support," trampled on and violated the Constitution, and increased the Executive patronage; and he was a devoted and zealous leader of this "passive, timid, and time-serving majority," who "gave in every instance his devoted and zealous support" to all the measures which he now alleges "trampled on and violated the Constitution," which doubled the Executive patronage, and increased the expenditures of the Government from thirteen to thirty millions. This, Mr. Chairman, is like the conduct of a man who had been associated with a lawless banditti in the perpetration of crimes, and becoming apprehensive that they would be detected, treacherously turns States' evidence against his companions, discloses the whole of their crimes, and expose the infamy of his own conduct. I will again read you from my colleague's speech:

"Did he (General Jackson) not even grasp in his own hands all the powers of the Executive for many years? Did he not complain of the corrupt system of appointing members of Congress to official station? And still he appointed ten for every one appointed by his predecessors; he would mention no names but he would freely appeal to his colleagues in Congress from Kentucky and Connecticut, if he has not done so day after day, and month after month, for seven years; and he could point at members who were known to give their votes for the promised reward. Were not the observations and predictions of those who warred against the system, fulfilled by the nomination to office of the profligate and the venal, as soon as the session had terminated.

Here, sir, he makes the charge explicitly, that Gen. Jackson, for the last seven years of his administration, was in the constant habit of bribing, with appointments to office, members of Congress to vote for his corrupt measures, and that he could point to members who were known to give their votes for the promised reward. What was the duty of my colleague to himself, his country, and to his constituents, who had confided to him the high honor and important duty of guarding the Constitution, of preserving the integrity and purity of the Government, and of promoting the best interests and prosperity of the people? Could he, consistently with his duty in the discharge of the high and important trust confided to him, not only studiously conceal from the public and from his immediate constituents, who had thus confided in him, such base and infamous conduct on the part of the Executive for seven long years; but to be in the daily habit of not only denying those charges of corruption, but of supporting and sustaining the Executive in their perpetration, by his votes, his contenance, and by his speeches, in and out of Congress? Is there then the slightest foundation in fact for this foul charge? Can it, I again inquire, be possible that my colleague would, for seven long years, carefully conceal from the public and from his immediate constituents, to whom he was under high obligations, not only to represent them faithfully and truly, but of rendering to them an honest and faithful account, not only of his own course, but of the official conduct of their other public servants as might be interesting and important to them, could he, under such circumstances, and consistently with his duty and honor, suppress and conceal such base and corrupt conduct? If he did so conceal such corruptions, his conduct in concealing was as infamous and corrupt as that with which he charges the late President. But, sir, what proof does he offer to sustain this charge? Not a word. True, he refers to his colleagues from Kentucky and Connecticut; but which of them, and what they would state, he leaves to conjecture. I will, Mr. Chairman, before I take my seat, prove to you that not only this, but the whole catalogue of his charges, are utterly unfounded in fact, and have not the semblance of truth to sustain them.

I will again read you my colleague's own language to his constituents in 1835, from this same Nashville speech. My colleague, speaking of General Jackson, said:

"A man towards whom I have never yet failed in showing a proper respect, and whose Administration I have faithfully supported, and in every instance, with that degree of zeal which could consistently and reasonably be expected from me."

Again, my colleague in his speech says that:

"Opposition to the Administration of General Jackson, is the course which the worst enemies of Judge White desire his friends to adopt; they are so anxious upon this point, that they appear determined to put Judge White and his friendsin opposition, whether they will or not. But, gentlemen, the friends of Judge White will adhere to Gen. Jackson and his Administration from consistency, and a respect for their own characters; and because they will be supporting their own principles."

Now, sir, I have fulfilled my promise, by showing you that my colleague, who has denounced the Administration of Gen. Jackson, and the conduct of that party in Congress which supported and sustained his measures, as being one scene of corruption and violation of the Constitution from the beginning to the end, was a leader of that party, and gave his zealous support to all those measures which he now denounces as being corrupt and in violation of the Constitution. He tells his constituents that he will adhere to General Jackson and his Administration, because, in so doing, he will be supporting his own principles. What principles does he mean? Does he mean those principles which, in his Hartford speech, he denounced as being in violation of the Constitution, of doubling Executive patronage, and corruptly increasing the expenditures of the Government? These are the principles which he, when addressing his constituents, claimed for his own. Was my colleague candid when he expressed those sentiments to his constituents? Was he sincere in his professions to them? And if so, I would inquire what new ray of light has burst upon his vision, to convince him all at once that his own political course for years has been not only in violation of the Constitution, but one of supporting frauds and corruptions of the deepest dye? Why these contradictory sentiments at the two places? Was it the effect of climate, atmosphere, or the political sentiments of the audience to which they were expressed? In Tennessee he was addressing a Democratic audience; at Hartford, a high-toned Federal audience. By the Nashville speech I can prove General Jackson to be one of the most devoted, pure, and wise, patriots that ever lived; by the one at Hartford, the most corrupt and vile demagogue that ever disgraced any nation. I could, sir, were it necessary, successfully defend the conduct and character of Gen. Jackson against the foul charges which my colleague has imputed to him; and, were I called on to do so, I would need no other evidence than his own. I would use his Nashville speech to his immediate constituents, which disproves all these charges. I would next use his evidence, given on oath, before a celebrated select committee of the House, when and where he was, after being first sworn to tell the whole truth, minutely interrogated as to his knowledge of Executive frauds, corruptions, or usurpations, and in answer thereto fully acquitted not only the Executive himself, but all of the Heads of Departments, of any such charge or imputation. If, then, these foul charges had the least foundation in fact, my colleague did not, as he was bound to do by the solemnity of his oath, tell the whole truth. But, sir, the conduct and character of General Jackson needs no defence; his great public services, both in the field and in the cabinet, constitute the brightest page in the history of his country. He, sir, who is now in the evening of his days, who has one foot in the grave, and the other on the threshold, has served his country in various stations, from that of a private in the Revolutionary war to that of Major General in the late war, and Chief Magistrate of this nation, and against whose public or official acts, his vilest enemies cannot point to the first act of corruption, or of intentional error, needs no defence from me.

Mr. Chairman, I do not object to my colleague's leaving his old Democratic party and friends, and going over to the Opposition. Let him go. If he has changed his opinions, and is now satisfied that the course of policy which he has heretofore pursued is destructive of the best interests and prosperity of the country, I would say he has done right. But, sir, I complain of his assigning reasons for his change of party and principles which have no foundation in fact. It is the charging of his former party and political friends with corruptions, and designing to undermine and subvert this Government, that I complain. I would inquire, was my colleague honest in his principles and course when he acted with this party? If so, he should have charity to believe that the party are still governed by the same honest motives which then governed him. One thing is certain, and that is, the reasons he assigns for his sudden political summerset are not the true reasons for his change. Men act from motive. The motive which produced this sudden and unaccountable conversion of his apparent devotion to both men and principles to bitter hatred, is a question for him and the country to determine. Was it produced by the power and influence of the United States Bank? Did he receive accommodations from this institution to such an extent as to produce this, or was it a thirst for office and self-aggrandisement that caused him to alienate and abandon his former party and friends, and to throw himself into the arms and embraces of his former political adversaries? These are questions which I leave the gentleman and the country to determine.

TO THE PUBLISHERS OF THE GLOBE.

GENTLEMEN: I herewith send you for publication the speech which I delivered in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, on the Indian appropriation bill. I desire, also, that you will publish the subjoined correspondence, which it is intended shall accompany the speech. When the charge was made on the floor, that my remarks on that occasion were concocted or prompted at the instance of others, I promptly pronounced the charge to be "false—basely false." This I did from my own knowledge of the fact that the charge was "false." I took an early occasion after the occurrence in the House, as an act of justice, to address a note to the gentlemen who, I supposed, were alluded to. My note and their answers are herewith enclosed. I had another reason for addressing them. Not intending that the responsibility which I might have incurred by the course of my remarks, should be divided or shifted upon the shoulders of others, it was my object to show the gratuitous character of the charge, and where the responsibility rested. It is a fixed rule of my life to think and to act for myself, and always to be responsible for what I say or do; and I take this occasion to say, that the remarks which I made upon that occasion were deliberately prompted by my own views of propriety, uttered and applied as I intended, upon a full knowledge of the responsibility which I incurred in doing so; a responsibility which then, as now, and at all times and upon all occasions, I am ready to meet.

I am, gentlemen, very respectfully, yours, &c.
H. L. TURNEY.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
June 2d, 1838.

SIR: I must request of you to state whether the speech I delivered in the House of Representatives, when in Committee of the Whole on the bill to suppress Indian hostilities, on the 31st of May and 1st of this month, was concocted or prepared by you, or by your procurement, counsel, or advice; and whether you knew the course of argument I would pursue, or what I intended to say, on that occasion, as has been charged in debate on the floor of the House, in reply to my speech.

Very respectfully, yours, etc.
HOP. L. TURNEY.

HON. FELIX GRUNDY.

A copy of the above was also sent to Mr. POLK.

WASHINGTON CITY, June 2, 1838.

SIR: In reply to your note of this day, I have to say that your speech on the bill to suppress Indian hostilities, was not concocted or prepared by me, in whole or in part, nor was it prepared by my procurement, counsel, or advice, nor did I know what course of arguments you intended to pursue, or what you intended to say. So far from it, I did not even know you intended to make a speech, until I was told you were on the floor. I was then busily engaged, and did not go to hear you, which I should have done, had I been at leisure at the time. For the last five or six weeks, we have lived at some distance from each other; we have had no intercourse, except casual meetings on the streets and in the Capitol. You have at no time had any suggestions from me, respecting matter to be used by you in a speech or in debate.

Yours, with respect,
FELIX GRUNDY.

Hon. H. L. TURNEY.

WASHINGTON CITY, June 2, 1838.

DEAR SIR: In answer to your letter of this date, I state, that your speech made in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, on the Indian appropriation bill, was not "concocted or prepared" by me, and was made by you without my procurement, counsel, or advice. I did not know that you intended to speak on that occasion, until the day you obtained the floor, and after you had made an unsuccessful attempt to do so, and much less did I know what you intended to say. If by the charge to which you refer, I was meant to be embraced, as one of those at whose instance you acted, I have to say that the charge is without foundation in fact. This I would have promptly said in Committee of the Whole, had it not been manifestly improper for the Speaker of the House to engage in debates of a partizan or personal character, which might hazard the violation of the order and decorum of the House, which he of all others is bound to preserve and maintain. I cannot so far forget my duty to the public and to the House itself, while acting as its presiding officer, as to permit myself voluntarily to be engaged in personal altercation on the floor with any of its members.

I am, very respectfully,
Your obedient servant,
JAMES K. POLK.

Hon. H. L. TURNEY.

SUPPRESSION OF INDIAN HOSTILITIES.

SPEECH OF MR. TOWNS, OF GEORGIA,

In the House of Representatives, May 23d, 1838—In Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, the subject under consideration being the bill making appropriations for preventing and suppressing Indian hostilities.

Mr. TOWNS proceeded as follows:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: From what has just passed between the honorable member from Virginia [Mr. WISE] and from New York [Mr. FILLMORE] I should feel encouraged at the prospect that the venue will be changed from Georgia to New York, and that hereafter the latter will come in for her portion of whatever infamy there may be in Indian treaties. Sir, I shall not object to this. In order to impart interest to the old and stale story of Indian wrongs and Indian frauds, I doubt not the contemplated change will be wise and prudent; my State, sir, has long borne in comparative silence the torrent of calumny that has poured in from the North and East upon her people and her institutions. She has looked on with feelings of regret and indignation at the repeated efforts made here and elsewhere to disparage her in the estimation of her sister States. But, Mr. Chairman, she has never yet felt, because she had never cause to feel, remorse for the past, or alarm for the future. Honest in her principles, just in her pretensions, humane in her policy, she could but rely with confidence in the judgment of a virtuous, and impartial public. From ignorance, fanaticism, or malice, she had nothing to hope, nor had she any thing to fear. Her course has been onward; and if she has not stooped to meet all the foul charges that have been levelled at her institutions, it was because her own self-respect and love of justice would not permit her to mingle in an inglorious and unworthy contest.

Mr. Chairman, allow me to ask what is the immediate object of the bill now before the committee? To furnish means of prosecuting the Florida war, and to prevent an Indian war with the Cherokees. To this bill amendments have been offered by the honorable gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] and others, proposing important changes in our present relation with the Cherokee people. To each and all of these amendments I am opposed. I can see in them nothing to authorize my support, but much to require my opposition. In the original bill are provided the efficient means of enforcing your own laws, preserving peace and harmony on the frontier of Georgia, and enabling this Government, without the shedding of blood, to administer justice with humanity to those people, whose welfare and happiness have engaged so much of the time of this Government and the nation. I would have been glad that a subject of so much importance could have received the calm consideration of this committee, free from all the irritating topics that have been drawn into the discussion. But, sir, since it is otherwise, I feel myself called upon, by every consideration of duty, to answer some of the arguments introduced in this debate.

It was said by the honorable member from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] "that he presumed the treaty of New Echota would not be executed; as he could perceive in the late communication of the President on this subject much to encourage the hope that, in the end, justice would be done the Cherokees." Sir, it is seldom we hear the voice of the honorable member in support of any measure of the President; and, for one, I regret that he should have selected this late message as deserving of praise above all others. For myself, I can say that no recommendation has ever more astonished me, or excited in my bosom feelings of deeper regret—a recommendation as unnecessary as it is mischievous in its tendencies, creating hopes on the part of the Indians that never can be realized, and holding out encouragement to those who have for years arrayed themselves against the rights of Georgia. Sir, had the Chief Magistrate of this Union desired to conciliate the dissatisfied Cherokees, that work should have commenced long since. It is now too late. We have advanced too far in the execution of the treaty now to look back and review the ground we have passed. Our course is onward—we neither can stop nor recede. If we pause, the man knows but little of the Indian character who does not perceive that each moment of delay adds to the chances of bloodshed and massacre. If you recede, you violate the supreme law of the land; you do manifest and flagrant injustice to the conceded rights of four States of this Union; and, with the strong arm of power, wrest from the citizens of Georgia the possession of their own lands. Sir, is this to be endured? Can any portion of this House so far deceive themselves as to suppose, come what may, that the people of Georgia will submit to an invasion of their rights through the legislation of Congress? No, sir: it never can be.

The President, in his communication of yesterday, exhibits an ardent desire that this unhappy controversy should be settled. I will do the Chief Magistrate the justice to say that, in my opinion, he was actuated by the kindest and most humane motives; but, for one, warmly attached as I have been to the principles of his Administration, I will neither pay homage to his wisdom, nor compliments to his sagacity, for thus thrusting upon the House and the nation, at this late hour, a communication that can do no good, and may yet do much mischief.

The honorable gentleman [Mr. WISE] says "that he will repeat to-day what he said yesterday: that, as a State rights man, he would compel the State of Georgia to respect the laws and treaties of the United States." Sir, what is the attitude of Georgia in relation to this treaty? Has Georgia proposed to violate the treaty or any law of the United States? Does she now stand in defiance of the treaty and the laws? No, sir; on the contrary, she is urging this Government to execute its own laws. Sir, the treaty of New Echota, of December, 1835, approved by the President, ratified by the Senate, and now the law of the land she wishes executed. This, the supreme law of the land, vesting rights of the most sacred and delicate character to four States of this Union, Georgia demands should be faithfully executed; and for this Georgia is to be denounced, and branded with the doctrine of Nullification. Sir, is it maintaining and enforcing the laws of the United States that constitute the doctrine which the honorable gentleman from Virginia so much dislikes? It this be Nullification, then, sir, should I expect the honorable member to rank first among the list of champions of that doctrine. But the honorable gentleman and myself entertain very different notions of the principles of the political creed to which he has alluded, and which he charges the State of Georgia of having repeatedly practiced, without incurring the displeasure of the Federal Government, while the same doctrines met with such pointed rebuke in a sister State. Sir, this would be a most unprofitable discussion, and I will not now be drawn into a review of it, further than to place my own State right before this House and the nation. Georgia never has nullified a constitutional law of Congress. She has never yet had occasion to place herself in her highest sovereign attitude; but whenever that necessity shall arise, which God avert! she will not be backward in choosing between oppression on the one hand, and resistance on the other. Conscious of asking nothing but her just and constitutional rights, she will never be found wanting in asserting and maintaining, with all the means at her command, her honor and her liberty. Sir, in the mixed and perplexing questions that have so long harrassed her, the policy of Georgia has been to avoid the issue of Nullification, and the very case of Tassells, so confidently relied on, went off on a point not involving the powers of this Government. This man met his fate for a violation of the penal laws of Georgia, making wilful murder punishable with death. I repeat, in no case has Georgia stood in bold defiance of the Constitution of the United States, or of laws passed in pursuance thereof. But, sir, if it would be any satisfaction to this committee, I think I can safely say that not only Georgia, but the whole South, will be united in asserting their rights, under the Constitution, whether they be stigmatised by the name of Nullifiers or any other. They will not, they dare not, stop to bandy words and names, when all they hold sacred and dear is about to be wrested from them, under false notions of philanthropy and religion. No, sir; no matter what the menace, though it be to "castigate" a State into submission, we will still be found asserting and maintaining our rights.

[Mr. WISE was then understood to explain as follows: That he had made use of that remark in reply to what was regarded as a threat, from more than one member from Georgia, who declared that unless this treaty was carried into effect, Georgia would take her own rights into her own hands; and it was in reply to that threat he had used the term he had.]

I am aware, Mr. Chairman, continued Mr. T. of the language used by my colleagues, and that their remarks had elicited a reply from the honorable gentleman. But, sir, I must insist that those remarks did not authorize the application of a term so offensive to the State of Georgia; a term which must excite in the bosom of every true Georgian, feelings of the deepest emotion. When, sir, was it ever before said of one of the States of this Union, that she was to be "castigated into submission?" Never, sir: no, never. It is a term that you may apply to the slave or the serf; but when applied to Georgia it falls harmless and disregarded. Georgia has heard, without quailing, threats from that Government which the honorable gentleman is so ready to aid. She never halted, and now the gentleman must excuse her, if she and her sons are equally indifferent whether menaces come from him or the Government. If the one was impotent, why should we feel alarm at the other? But, Mr. Chairman, if the honorable gentleman should harbor the thought that there is a want of moral courage in the citizens of Georgia, or any portion of them, no one knows better than himself the mode of satisfying his curiosity. Offensive words are the common weapons of weakness and rashness, and I should think no one understood better than the honorable member that their use in debate would never alarm a truly brave man, nor infuse spirit in the bosom of a coward.

Mr. Chairman, the honorable member takes the broad ground that there is, in point of fact, no treaty. That the instrument entered into in December, 1835, at New Echota, between certain Cherokee chiefs and the commissioner on the part of the United States, approved by the President, and ratified by the Senate, according to all the forms of the Constitution, is nevertheless no treaty, because it was made by persons on the part of the Cherokees not authorized to treat, and because undue and improper influences were brought to bear on the Cherokees, which makes the whole negotiation fraudulent and void.

Sir, I have heard the honorable gentleman repeatedly discuss this subject; and he has never let an opportunity pass, in which he has failed to denounce Schermerhorn and Curry as faithless public agents; as destitute of all the moral and honorable feelings that give dignity to man, and inspire confidence in human actions. How far the gentleman has made good his charges, is a very different question. With the character of either or both of these individuals, I have nothing to do, further than relates to their official conduct in the negotiation of the treaty of New Echota; and I feel the most perfect assurance that their conduct throughout this whole negotiation will not receive from the public scrutiny that measure of reproach and censure that honorable gentlemen, under the excitement of debate, are disposed to bestow upon it. But, Mr. Chairman, it is not my purpose to be drawn off into the investigation of the character of Schermerhorn and Curry. I have higher objects to accomplish. It is to vindicate your national honor, and the supremacy of your laws. And here, sir, let me ask the honorable member, [Mr. WISE,] by virtue of what power under the Constitution, does he now propose to go behind the treaty to exhibit facts, either as relates to the negotiation, or as to the competence of those that did negotiate, going to show that this treaty is null and void? Sir, I undertake to affirm that, under the question now presented to the committee by the bill on your table, it never was before gravely insisted that the House of Representatives was competent to annul a treaty solemnly made, and having received all the sanctions prescribed under the Constitution.

[Mr. WISE explained, in substance, as we understood, as follows: He said he could tell the gentleman from Georgia, that the doctrine for which he contended was not new to him, [Mr. W.] if to the gentleman from Georgia. Upon the celebrated discussion that arose upon Jay's treaty, the Democratic party of that day settled the doctrine, which has been acquiesced in by all parties from that time to this, that it was competent for this House, when a treaty was made requiring appropriations by Congress for its execution, for the House of Representatives to look behind the ratification of the treaty, and to examine the facts connected with its formation, in order to enable the House to determine whether the money required to execute the treaty should, or should not, be supplied.]

Mr. TOWNS continued. Mr. Chairman, the honorable gentleman has not relieved himself, for the very case he has cited is strong authority against him. Sir, let us recur to facts. How stands the question before us? Not only has a treaty been made with the Cherokees, approved by the President, ratified by the Senate, but, during the same session of Congress, the five million six hundred thousand dollars stipulated therein to be paid the Indians for the cession of their territory, were actually appropriated by Congress, after strong opposition to the bill by the honorable member himself. Then, sir, this treaty, in all its forms, in all its possible bearings, according to the very doctrine of Jay's treaty, has received its last and final sanction, and is irrevocably the supreme law of this land. Now, how is it that the honorable member proposes to rip up this treaty, scatter it to the winds, and thereby to deprive four States and their citizens of their vested rights? A bill is sent to us embracing two objects: first, an appropriation of money for the Florida war; and secondly, to maintain an armed force in the Cherokee country, not for the purpose of waging war on the Cherokees, but to prevent war; not to spill blood, but to prevent the spilling of blood; and the gentleman seizes this opportunity to discuss the treaty, to open negotiations for a new one, under the doctrine settled in Jay's treaty, that the House of Representatives had the power of withholding appropriations for money stipulated by treaties, and thereby assuming the responsibility of all the consequences of war that might ensue. Sir, it is impossible for the honorable gentleman to find one inch of ground on which to stand, either under the Constitution, or his own doctrines as insisted upon under Jay's treaty. Suppose you reject this bill, does it touch the treaty? Is there one dollar proposed to be appropriated by the present bill called for by the provisions of the treaty? No, sir, not one cent. Is there one dollar yet to be appropriated to execute the provisions of the treaty? No, sir, not a farthing. All the treaty itself stipulated for has been done nearly two years ago, and the appropriations now asked for are founded upon that elevated principle of humanity that would expend millions to prevent the shedding of human blood, sooner than hundreds to punish the guilty offender. Yet, sir, an object which must meet with the approbation of all sides of this House, and receive the sanction of every man in whose bosom can be traced one spark of pure humanity, is likely to be converted by the course of intemperate debate into endless mischief; for if this treaty should be disturbed—if its execution should be unnecessarily postponed under the sanction of Congress—it will be an assumption of power no where authorized by the Constitution; subversive of the vested rights of the States and the people; and abrogating all the powers of one of the co-ordinate branches of this Government. Yes, sir, this branch of Congress, by its assumption to set aside this treaty, would not only nullify, in the most odious and offensive form of which my imagination can conceive of that doctrine, not only the treaty making power, the Judiciary, the private vested rights of individuals and States, but her own act appropriating money to execute this treaty. We should then stand, not as one branch of a co-ordinate department of this Government, with prescribed powers and duties, but with powers greater, and far more dangerous, if danger there be, than in all the departments of Government combined. I hope, sir, that such is not the object of any.

Mr. Chairman, having shown that this treaty cannot be touched, I will not decline an examination into its history, with the full persuasion that I shall be able to show, at least, that it stands upon the same footing of all other treaties with Indian tribes. The only ground upon which a candid difference of opinion can arise in the mind of any one as to the validity of the treaty, provided it was now an open question, which I utterly deny, is the charge that a treaty was made by a minority of the nation. There is some conflicting testimony on the question as to the exact number in attendance at the time the treaty was concluded; from three to five hundred, as shown by some of the witnesses, and by others a less number; none, however, reducing the number below seventy. I believe it will also be conceded that the wealth and intelligence was decidedly in favor of the treaty.

Mr. Chairman, it is well known that, for several years past, a strong and influential party of the Cherokees have been decidedly in favor of ceding their lands to the Government, while, on the other hand, they have been met by a strong party opposed to a cession. John Ross headed the latter; John Ridge may be considered as the leader of the former. Ae far back as 19th June, 1834, a treaty was concluded in this city, between John H. Eaton, in behalf of the United States, and Andrew Ross, John West, T. J. Pack, and James Starr, on the part of the Cherokees. This treaty, by one of its provisions, enabled the John Ross party to defeat it. John Ross next appears in Washington, and proposes to treat with the Government, asking some twenty millions in cash. This proposition could not be entertained by the Government; for it was evidently made in bad faith, with no expectation that the Government could treat upon such a basis. The following letter was thereafter addressed to the Secretary of War:

WASHINGTON CITY, Feb. 27, 1835.

SIR: Having been informed by Wm. H. Underwood, esq. and others, that the President considers the terms of our proposition to be too extravagant, we beg leave to remind him that he has often remarked that he would grant us as liberal terms as the Senate, or the friends of the Indians, would be willing to allow. We would therefore respectfully ask that our propositions be submitted to the Senate by the President, in order that the sense of that honorable body be had on them.

We have the honor to be, sir,
Your obedient humble servants,
(Signed) JOHN ROSS,
R. TAYLOR,
DANIEL McCOY,
SAMUEL GUNTER,
WILLIAM RODGERS.

To the Hon. LEWIS CASS, Secretary of War.

Well, sir, on the next day the same individuals addressed the Secretary of War another letter which is most explicit. It is worthy of remark, as we pass on, that John Ross at this early day considered the Senate as the friends of the Indians. He uses the term Senate and friends as synonymous. But to the next letter of the Ross party.

WASHINGTON, February 28, 1835.

"SIR: Having submitted a proposition for a final adjustment of our differences with the Government of the United States, and understanding that the President deems it extravagant, we must beg that the subject be referred to the Senate for its sense on the question. The President having often told us that he was disposed to treat us with liberal justice, and that he would go as far as the Senate would allow him in regard to money matters. We therefore trust he will adopt this course. Being extremely desirous that this unhappy controversey may be speedily adjusted, and deeply sensible of our dependant condition, and confiding in the liberal justice of the United States Government, we are prepared, so far as we are concerned, to abide the award of the sense of the American Senate upon our proposition, and to recommend the same for the final determination of our nation.

We have the honor to be, sir,
Very respectfully.
Your ob't humble serv'ts,
(Signed,) JOHN ROSS,
R. TAYLOR,
DANIEL McCOY,
SAMUEL McCOY,
WM. ROGERS.

To the Hon. LEWIS CASS,
Secretary of War.

On the 3d of March, 1835, the following letter was witten by John Ross:

"DEAR SIR. The delegation have thought proper that a communication should accompany the documents which I have placed in your hands the other day, containing propositions which they made to the President, and that the same be laid before the Senate; and I take the liberty to inclose the same to you.

Very respectfully,
Your obedient humble nervant,
JOHN ROSS.

To the Hon. TH. FRELINGHUYSEN.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it is manifest that every document, which John Ross believed would advance his cause, was submitted to the Senate. The delegation of which he was the head and soul, addressed a memorial setting forth in the strongest terms the claims of the Cherokees upon the liberal justice of the nation. The Senate was selected by Ross, because of the known feelings of that body, and he regarded, and so spoke of it, as the friend of the Indians. Can any man then doubt but that the utmost liberality and justice were done them in the award of the Senate? And can or will any gentleman on this floor contend that Ross and his party, so far as they were concerned, were not bound by the award of the Senate, and also bound as men of honor and truth to recommend to the nation the adoption of the Senate's award? Sir, if it should appear that this man Ross and his party, after the award of the Senate was made, wholly disregarded the solemn obligation they were under to observe it themselves, and instead of recommending it, as they were bound to do to their people—used their influence to prevent its approval, every one who respects and fair dealing, must hold in abhorance the duplicity and perfidy of John Ross and his associates, whosoever they may be. Sir, let us look to the facts.

Mr. Secretary Cass in his communication of 6th March, 1835, to Ross, Taylor, and others, says:

"In your letter 28th February ultimo. you stated your readiness to accept for yourselves, and recommend to the Cherokee people to accept such a sum for their claims east of the Mississippi river, as the Senate might deem just. The Senate have, by a resolution, stated as their opinion, that a "sum not exceeding five millions should be paid to the Cherokee Indians for all their lands and possessions east of the Mississippi river." The President wishes now, as he has always done heretofore, to treat with you in the spirit of candor as well as liberality. He has therefore directed me to communicate to you at once the resolution of the Senate, and to state his willingness to enter into a negotiation with you for the cession of all your claims east of the Mississippi, upon condition that the whole amount of consideration to be given shall not exceed the above mentioned sum. This you were informed should be done, and the pledge will be redeemed with fidelity."

This is the language on the part of this Government to John Ross and his party. The sum of five millions far exceeded any previous offer made by the Goverment, and was more than the Cherokee country was worth at public sale; yet, as Ross and his party had pledged themselves to be content with a price fixed by the Senate, the President consented to the award, though the price was extravagant, and we find that he instantly proposed to Ross and his party to enter into a negotiation for a treaty on the basis of that award. Now, sir, was this proposition met by those men? By prevarication, by a call on the Secretary of War to furnish him, Ross, with all the papers and communications submitted to the Senate, declaring that it was due to himself and his people, that he should know on what precise ground the Senate acted. He wished to know whether it was intended to pay for removal and subsistence, and to enlarge the tract of country for the Cherokees; "they say it is utterly impossible for them to proceed further until they understand," &c.

Now here was the first indication on the part of Ross and his party that they did not intend to abide by the Senate's award. It is contained in a letter to the Secretary of War, dated 6th March, 1835. Did not John Ross know the contents of the papers that had been submitted to the Senate? Had he not himself, through the Hon. Mr. Frelinghuysen, communicated all documents and memorials that he desired? Was it not notorious that a majority of the Senate were more inclined to John Ross than to the President? Did not Ross know full well the motives that influenced the Senate? Yet he seeks to open a negotiation with the Secretary of War for explanation, before he could proceed to hear specific propositions for a treaty. The Secretary of War, under date of 7th March, 1835, sends the following answer to Ross and his party:

"GENTTLEMEN: I have just received your letter of this date. The sum of five millions, which is offered for your claims east of the Mississippi, will, as I have already informed you, be in full of your entire cession. The application will be as you desire, a just regard being had to individual rights. Nothing more will be paid for removal, or for any other purpose or object whatever. In giving you the full value of your property the United States comply with all the demands of justice on them."

The Secretary of War further informs John Ross in the same letter, that he would "give him any information he would desire if he would come to the office for that purpose," and that he would enter into "a candid examination of the whole affair, with a desire to adjust it in a manner satisfactory to the Indians, and just on the part of the United States." But that letter would close the intercourse in writing between them. Now, sir, what was the course of John Ross and his friends upon this occasion? Did they call at the office of the Secretary of War to obtain any real or pretended information, as preliminary to a settlement of the question? No. They did call, however, and from a letter addressed to the Secretary of War, dated 9th March, 1835, they set forth the substance of their interview, from which every one will discover that they had varied the proposition, and were not disposed to be bound by their own express agreement. In that letter they say:

"That we, as the duly authorized delegation of the Cherokee nation, are prepared, in good faith, to redeem any promises which we have made to the Department, so far as recommending to our nation the expediency of closing our unhappy difficulties by a treaty with the United States."

Was this the extent of Ross's promise that induced the President to submit the whole project to the Senate? Certainly not. Ross and his party said in their letter on that subject, "that we are prepared, so far as we are concerned, to abide the award of the American Senate upon our proposition, and to recommend the same for the final determination of our nation." This was the promise, the engagement, that induced the Executive to refer the point in dispute to the Senate. It was referred; and when the response is had, John Ross and his friends seek to avoid it, by saying that they are ready to redeem their promise to the Department "by recommending to the nation the expediency of closing our difficulties by a treaty with the United States." He here changes the entire character of his obligation. He does not feel himself bound by the Senate's award, but will redeem his promise by recommending—what?—that "our difficulties be closed by a treaty" with the United States, without adhering to the basis as established by the Senate's recommendation.

But this is not all. Ross and his friends, in the same letter, say: "And to enable us to do so more successfully and satisfactorily before the Cherokee people, we proposed that the whole matter should be referred to our nation and there, in general council, to deliberate and determine on the subject." Was there ever exhibited a more palpable evasion—a more deliberate and settled purpose to violate any promise made by any man, than is here exhibited? He now seeks to refer the whole subject to his nation, in order, doubtless, that himself and his associate delegates might release themselves from an unconditional obligation on their part to abide the Senate's decision.

But, Mr. Chairman, there are other portions of the same letter which unfold the secret that, from first to last, has operated on John Ross. It is a desire to get into his own custody and management the whole sum of money that this Government may or has paid for the Cherokee cession. Sir, I firmly believe, if a treaty had been proposed by which the consideration for the cession was to have been paid to Ross and his party, that we never should have heard one word of complaint from him, or his friends. Here lies the great secret after all; not that John Ross is a patriot, and is waging war against this treaty to save his people and his nation from ruin, but, sir, it is because the treaty, as it is made, has placed it beyond his power to pocket the money, and convert it to his own and the use of his friends. It is, sir, because, by the treaty, the five millions and six hundred thousand dollars agreed to be paid by this Government to the Cherokee people for their lands, are applied mostly to specific objects, and the balance per capita. This was a death-blow to all his hopes—to all his ambition; and, sooner than let the last opportunity pass through his hands to plunder his people, under the sacred name of patriotism, he will put all upon the hazard of the die, even to the extermination of his race. And, yet, sir, strange to tell, this man, Ross, has won for himself a reputation in portions of this country, and can command the support of the first talents in the nation, upon the ground that all he has done, and is now doing, is for the good of his people.

But, Mr. Chairman, to give something more than my assertions for the opinions I here expressed, I will again advert to further remarks of Ross and the others in the same letter. They say:

"In your letter of the 7th instant, closing all further intercourse in writing between us, you distinctly informed us that the application of the five millions which is offered for our lands east of the Mississippi river will be such as we desire—a just regard being had to individual rights. Well, then, if the nation will consent to treat and accept of the sum offered, let its own wishes in regard to the application be consulted and adopted—a just regard being had to individual rights. And on the part of the delegation here, we again repeat that we are prepared to comply, in good faith, with any promise we have made to the Department on the subject: Provided, you do the same on your part, and will not throw any obstacles in our way."

Such, sir, is the language of that communication addressed to the Secretary of War in March, 1835; after all efforts to get them to treat had failed in this city.

Now, Mr. Chairman, is there an unprejudiced man here or elsewhere that can affect to misunderstand John Ross in thus violating his pledges? He had got from the Senate their utmost limit they would go. He was bound to accept it for himself and his colleagues, at least. This he evades; and, finally, when the correspondence was closed, he and his friends refusing to treat, they then use the insolent language to this Government that they will comply, in good faith, with their promise, "provided" the Government will throw no obstacle in their way, and the money be applied as they may desire. Sir, the English of all this is: we will make a treaty if you will let us have our own way. We will return to our people, and, instead of taking the responsibility of cheating them here, where, if we do so, we may be detected, we will return to our nation, call our people together, and make them cheat themselves.

If, Mr. Chairman, there is still any doubt on the mind of any gentleman as to the motives of John Ross, subsequent events, as they occurred in the Cherokee nation during the summer and fall of 1835, will remove them. It is well known to this House and the country that the President appointed two Commissioners (Mr. Schermerhorn and Governor Carroll) on the part of this Government to repair to the Cherokee country to conclude the treaty with the Cherokee people. The correspondence that took place between the Commissioners and Ross, fully sustains the charge that his object was to prevent a treaty in the nation, by submitting the question directly and fairly to the sense of the Cherokee people; but, by various pretexts, he prevented the United States Commissioners from all opportunity of presenting their projet, until he had succeeded in preparing their minds against a treaty; but, at the same time, had secured to himself, and the delegation associated with him, unlimited power over the question of the treaty, which power, under the grant, was made irrevocable.

This was a part of the master policy of this Cherokee diplomatist; and it was not until he had secured himself in this treaty-making power, even beyond the reach of his own people, making himself, and the delegation appointed to act with him, whom every body knows to be his creatures, greater than the Cherokee nation, and beyond its control and reach, that he ever would recognise Mr. Schermerhorn as the Government agent. It is a matter of curious inquiry to see with what remarkable address this man Ross—at times so plausible, his motives and designs so admirably veiled, that the most scrutinizing eye would pass them undetected—carried on his schemes to their final consummation. Sir, he was an overmatch for the balance of his nation, and has baffled for years the public agents and the humane policy of this Government. But in his march, adroit and skilful as it was, he has left traces that enable us to identify the spirit, the motive, and the object. As far back as the 7th of July, 1835, Mr. Schermerhorn addressed John Ross, from which I make the following extract:

"I hope this, however, will not prevent you from convening your principal men at such time and place as you think best, to give me an opportunity of an interview with them, for the purpose mentioned in our personal interview."

This letter was followed by another from Mr. Schermerhorn on the 9th July, of the most conciliatory character. On the 10th July, Governor Carroll and Schermerhorn addressed Mr. Ross, informing him that they much regretted to learn he had prevented the census from being taken of the Cherokees east. This letter was answered by John Ross on the 12th, denying his interference. On the 24th July, John Ross addressed a letter to Mr. Schermerhorn, declining to meet him and Governor Carroll one week from the 29th of that month, for the purpose of holding a conference on the subject of their mission. Ross assigns as reasons, the trouble and inconvenience of the measure, and other causes, none of which can be considered valid. On the 29th of July, Governor Carroll and Schermerhorn addressed Ross, calling upon him distinctly to state if he intended to comply with his engagements to submit the question of the treaty to the Cherokees. They further say that "they are altogether ignorant of the course pursued by you and your principal men after leaving the council ground last week, and the speeches you made them, and the advice that was given not to meet the Commissioners here at this time." It will be remembered that this letter bears date at the time and place the United States Commissioners expected to meet John Ross, and all the Cherokees, on the subject of the treaty. They did not meet them, however; and Ross, in reply to the above letter, under date 30th July, urged the same reasons he had done in a former letter. Here, then, it was made manifest that Ross had certain objects to accomplish with his people, before he would suffer them to meet in council. Nearly one month had elapsed, and no advance was yet made by Ross to convene his people, and had actually refused himself to meet them at the time and place appointed. This negotiation was suspended from July to 14th October, 1835, when Mr. Schermerhorn addressed "the chiefs, head-men, and warriors of the Cherokee Indians, in general council convened, at Red Clay Council Ground," apprising them of his attendance, and readiness and desire of opening the negociation for a treaty on the five million basis recommended by the Senate. On the 15th October, the Committee and Council adopted the following resolution:

Resolved, That they see no reason for departing from the customary forms of the nation in communications of this nature, and therefore they return the letter of Mr Schermerhorn to the principal chief, with the desire that he will (together with the Executive Council) answer the aforesaid letter in such manner as they may think advisable, and that the Committee of Council will act upon the result.

Well, sir, the principal chief, John Ross, with Lowrey, Waters, and Lewis Ross, straightway answer the letter. John Ross had now gained all he wished. He was invested with plenary power, and they, in their letter, express a wish to hear the proposition, but remind Mr. Schermerhorn that the Senate's basis had been rejected, and "how unnecessary it will be again to ask the sentiments of the people upon the treaty you have already proposed, and to which they have altogether objected. If, however, (it goes on to say,) you are fully authorized to offer any new terms, they shall be faithfully and promptly attended to." This last letter was, on the 17th October, answered by Mr. Schermerhorn, in another addressed to "The chiefs, headmen, and warriors," reminding them of their interest, the obligations that Ross and his party were under to submit the matter to a council of the nation, and to recommend its adoption to his people. On the 22d of the same month, while the council was yet in session, John Ross addresses "The Committee and Council," in which he distinctly recommends to appoint a delegation, with powers to treat with the United States at Washington, if, as he believed was the fact, it should turn out that there was no person authorized to treat with them on the ground. On the 24th of October, the Council of Red Clay, of 1,076 individuals,

"Resolved, That a delegation, consisting of John Ross, principal chief, Richard Taylor, Lewis Ross, James Brown, James Daniel, Thomas Foreman, Richard Fields, Sleeping Rabbit, Joseph Vann, John Burge, Ooternawa, Elijah Hicks, John Huss, John F. Baldridge, Peter of Aquohee, Jesse Busheyhead, John Ridge, Elias Boudinot, and Charles Vann, be endowed with full powers to enter into an arrangement with the General Government of the United States, for the final adjustment of the existing difficulties of the Cherokee nation, upon such bases and terms as may be deemed by them best fitted to secure the peace and future security of the Cherokee people."

In the last resolution adopted at the same time, they resolve:

"And that we forbid any negotiation through any other persons, and will not hold ourselves bound by the proceedings of any (other) delegation," &c.

Mr. Chairman, it is under this authority that Ross and his party now allege that the treaty is null, because not made by the competent persons. By whom was the treaty of New Echota made? By John Ridge, Elias Boudinot, members of this very committee, and eighteen others, influential men, of known character among the chiefs. Why was it made in Cherokee? Because Ross and his friends would not conclude a treaty at Washington in the preceding March, alleging that he must take the sense of their people; that it must be submitted to them. Well, sir, he was then distinctly notified that he need never again return to Washington to effect a treaty; that if there should ever be a treaty concluded it must be done in the nation. Ross was again and again reminded of this by Schermerhorn. Nevertheless, we see him, after having himself and friends invested with power; not by a majority of the nation, for the documents show that the Senate basis of five millions was rejected in open council by only 1076, and that the same number ratified and confirmed the delegation of Ross and others, and protested at the same time against any other delegation disposing of their land; did succeed first in rejecting the five millions by less than one sixth of the whole nation, and by less than one sixth of the whole nation caused himself and friends to be invested with power to treat then and through all time. A minority is competent, it seems, to authorize Ross and his party to sell their country, but a majority is required to make the sale of Ridge, Boudinot, and others binding. Yes, sir, the treaty of New Echota is now denounced as a foul blot on our national character, conceived in fraud, consummated by a minority, and therefore a nullity, which the honesty of the nation should repudiate, and all honest men decry. Yet, sir, those who hold this language, whose delicate sensibility is so aroused at the very name of this treaty of New Echota, are prepared to enter into a treaty with Ross and his party, who themselves represent a minority of less than one sixth. And, sir, I ask if a treaty was now made, or had been made, by Ross and his party, would it not have been liable to the very same objections now urged to this treaty? How can you draw the distinction? If a minority of the Cherokees are competent to invest a delegation with treaty making powers, is not the same, or even a greater minority, upon the same principle, equally competent to make a treaty themselves?

This, sir, brings us to another remarkable incident in this affair. The records show that Ross and his friends here in Washington, after the news of the treaty reached them, were enabled, from some time in the early part of January to 3d of February, to present to the Senate two protests against the ratification of the treaty, one of 3,250 signers, the other 14,910, making 18,160. This is a circumstance I leave for Ross and his friends to explain. Can any man believe it possible that in one month's time, or less, in the midst of winter, among mountains and snows, eighteen thousand one hundred and sixty persons in the Cherokee country could have been seen, their names got to these protests and transmitted from the Cherokee country to this city? The thing is impossible. There were not, at that time, as many Cherokees in the nation; and, if they had been there, the time in which the protests were obtained absolutely forbids the belief that the names were genuine. Yet, sir, we see many gentlemen are willing to take eighteen thousand one hundred and sixty as the number opposed to the treaty, when there can be but little doubt that the whole population at that time east of the Mississippi did not number as many. But, Mr. Chairman, all must admit that, if the resolution of the General Council was competetent authority for John Ross and other delegates then appointed to treat with the Government, their power was unrestrained, and they were at liberty to make such treaty as was, in their judgment, to the interest of their people. It will be remembered that Ross, in his correspondence, expressed a deliberate conviction that the happiness, nay, the very existence, of his afflicted nation, depended upon their protection from State laws. In this he was doubtless correct. But the question is, did he act in conformity with this opinion by defeating a treaty? Certainly not. No sooner had he secured himself and his friends in a treaty-making power in the manner I have already described, than he became bolder and more unequivocal in his movements. He announced with much pomp his readiness to treat, if Mr. Schermerhorn would produce his credentials and they were satisfactory. At length our commissioner exhibited his credentials, and received for answer that, though there might be well-founded objections taken to them, he, [Ross,] however, would waive all exceptions to form, and hear the proposition of Mr. Schermerhorn. The project of a treaty was again submitted and again rejected, and Ross and his party then gave notice that they would leave for Washington and there receive propositions. Our commissioner, as he was in duty bound to do, again gave notice for the nation to be convened for the purpose of making a treaty, and that none would be made in Washington. In the mean time, Ridge and Boudinot, discovering the game that Ross was resolved to play, withdrew from the delegation and declined to have any thing more to do with Ross. A council was assembled at New Echota in December, after full and fair notice to all parties, and there the treaty, so much denounced, was concluded; and, I am free to admit, with less than a majority of the nation. But while I make this admission, it was the fault of the nation, or rather John Ross's intriguing and selfish policy, that prevented the Indians from meeting in larger numbers. Had Ross been faithful to his nation he never would have abandoned it at this time, when he was aware that a council was again called, when he had been officially informed that no negotiation could be again opened at Washington, and when he had himself, about the middle of the preceding March, declined entering into a negotiation at Washington; alleging, as a reason, that it was his duty to submit the subject to the sense of his nation.

Now, Mr. Chairman, under all these circumstances, when it is remembered that this Government exceeded, by six hundred thousand dollars, the award of the Senate—when every body must have perceived that Ross and his party were wielding a despotic influence over their people, in order to advance his own selfish views—I submit it to the candor of all if this treaty is not placed upon as high grounds of moral justice as any ever made between this Government and our Indian tribes. I claim for this treaty no more nor less than for other treaties with the Indians. If all others are null and void that fill our statute book from the origin of this Government to the present day, then you may consider this in the same light. If those that precede the New Echota treaty are valid and binding upon the conscience and honor of the nation, so is this: I place them all upon the same footing. All—yes, sir, all—if to be regarded in the light of treaties as made between civilized nations, between equal powers, are null, and, if you please, sir, fraudulent. Will any gentleman tell me that the means resorted to to effect this treaty were different or more exceptionable than have always been practiced? No, sir: if you charge those who made the treaty of New Echota as usurpers and dishonest men, I answer you by saying that I have proven Ross to be both the one and the other. So much for the treaty if it were now an open question, which, as I said before, I utterly deny.

Mr. Chairman, has it occurred to gentlemen on this floor that Georgia, in her federal relation to the other States, has rights of the first magnitude involved in this question? It has long been to me, sir, a matter of much surprise to see all the sympathies of this House constantly and earnestly engaged on the part of the red man in all our disturbances with them; but of this I do not complain. I stand here to ask for the rights of my State, not the sympathies of the House; if the one cannot be obtained, the other is not worth having. What, then, let me repeat, are the rights of Georgia? So far, sir, as regards sovereignty and jurisdiction, and soil, they are equal to the rights of any of the original thirteen States. None will, none can, controvert this. Has Georgia, whilst a colony, or since she became a member of this Union, parted with her right of jurisdiction and soil over the lands in the occupancy of the Cherokees? Certainly not; but, on the contrary, as far back as April, 1802, the State of Georgia entered into a compact with this Government, whereby she ceded that immense tract of country now comprising the States of Alabama and Mississippi, and the latter stipulated, among other things, to "extinguish, for the use of Georgia, as soon as the same can be peaceably obtained on reasonable terms, the Indian title to all the lands in said State." And what is of some consequence in this discussion, by the same compact, this Government did "cede to the State of Georgia whatever claim, right, or title they may have to the jurisdiction or soil of any lands lying within the United States, and within the defined limits of Georgia," as settled by said compact, which embraces a portion of the territory ceded by the New Echota treaty.

Mr. Chairman, this compact does not enlarge the rights of jurisdiction and soil in the sovereignty of Georgia, but it is a full recognition of an antecedent right, an unquallified surrender of all pretension whatever to the soil and jurisdiction within the limits of Georgia, and thereby surrendering up to Georgia the undisputed control of jurisdiction and soil which embraces property and population in its fullest sense. Hence, sir, if Georgia thinks proper to move against any portion of her population, unless they can claim protection under the Federal Constitution, which I admit to be paramount to the act of cession, there is no power known to our form of Government that can rightfully interpose or question our course. Can the Cherokees claim the protection of the Federal Government as against Georgia, by virtue of any power under the Consttution? Certainly not. The only clause of the Constitution that has a bearing on the question is, that "the Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the States, and with the Indian tribes." The States mean nothing more nor less than the States of this Union, and of course embrace the whole population of the entire State. The boundary of the State, so far as territory is concerned, gives us the idea of locality and extent, and to regulate commerce with a territory as contradistinguished from the population inhabiting the territory, is an absurdity. To regulate commerce with the States, means the people of the States. It is not possible you can discriminate between portions or colors, but all must be regarded, in a commercial point of view, as a State or community. If this be true, then there is no power in Congress, either in a commercial or political point of view, to draw a discrimination between different portions of the people of the same State. Hence, sir, all your treaties with the Cherokees within the limits of Georgia, are merely permissive, not binding upon that State a moment longer than she may choose to submit. You have the same power under the Constitution to treat with the citizens of any one county in a State; and attempt to enforce the provisions of such a treaty against the will of the State, as to insist upon the right of treating with the Indian population of the original States, and enforcing the provisions of the same against the will of such State. In the one case as in the other, a State might acquiesce, but the sovereign right to disregard at pleasure is not at all impaired, and can be called in requisition whenever the occasion may require. Georgia has paid this Government thirty-six years ago to extinguish the Indian title within her limits; but it will not be pretended that Georgia is thereby precluded, by virtue of her sovereignty, to do it herself. She may, by her own act, forfeit her lien on the Government to perform the contract, but she never has, for one moment, divested herself of complete power over the whole subject.

Now then, Mr. Chairman, how does the question stand? You have made a treaty with the Cherokees by which you have extinguished their title to the lands in Georgia. In this you have redeemed at last your obligation by the compact of 1802. Here then the question is settled. If Georgia is satisfied with the manner and mode you have thought proper to discharge your obligation to her, it does not become this Government to object. We hold you to the compact with us; we hold you to the compact with the Indians, which is the fulfilment of your obligation to Georgia. And never will that State, nor will I as one of her representatives, consent to any modification or alteration of its terms. To the letter I will go, and on that will I stand or fall. Yes, Mr. Chairman, Georgia remained quiet, confiding in the justice of this Government, for more than the fourth of a century. She looked with regret and mortification at the shameful neglect of her rights. She saw and felt that repeated opportunities were offered when this Government could have extinguished the Indian title to the lands within her borders. In 1808, in 1814, and in 1817 and 1819, at which times treaties were made with the Creeks and Cherokees, it was in the power of this Government to have quieted the Indian titles to lands in Georgia. But sir, the policy of the Government was to purchase the Indian title west of our boundary. In Mississippi and Alabama the Indian title was first to be extinguished. What was the effect of this policy? To concentrate in Georgia, and on her frontier, the whole Indian population of the mighty tribes of Creeks and Cherokees. And, sir, as you narrowed down her territory, in the same proportion did this Government increase her difficulty in discharging her obligations to Georgia. This consequence should have been forseen, and strictly guarded against. Yet it was the pleasure of the Federal rulers, notwithstanding the repeated memorials and protests of Georgia, obstinately to persist in this course of policy, the direct tendency of which was to fasten upon the territory of Georgia, throughout all time, an Indian population—a population that this Government was under the highest moral obligation, as well as by express stipulation, to remove with the least possible delay, and at her own expense. Well, Mr. Chairman, after waiting from 1802 to 1829, with no earnest effort having been made to discharge the obligations of this Government to Georgia, a state of things had actually taken place in the Cherokee country which would no longer admit of delay on the part of that State. It was most manifest that Georgia had to look to herself for the preservation of order and good neighborhood, for the maintainance of her political rights, and the enforcement of her own laws. Remonstrance and petition had failed, argument, reason, and justice urged with all the eloquence of candor by the constituted authorities of Georgia, by her legislative bodies, were no longer regarded with favor by this Government. And the alternative was presented to my State either of beholding, for the first time in the history of this Government, the right of a sovereign State over the jurisdiction and soil within her own limits—a right for which she, in common with the original thirteen States, fought for and won in our Revolutionary struggle, and which she believed and felt was guarantied to her by the Constitution—prostrated under foot by a code of Indian laws; or, otherwise, to assume the responsibility that honor and patriotism demanded, of vindicating her laws and free institutions from violence at home, or aggression from any other quarter, Sir, she did take her stand; and I behold in her attitude that undying and unconquerable spirit—the love of liberty—which is the patriot's best hope that our free institutions may yet be preserved.

Mr. Chairman, in 1827, the Cherokee tribe of Indians organized a Government with a written constitution and code of laws, extending over all that portion of territory then in their occupancy within the limits of Georgia. The Cherokees claimed exclusive jurisdiction over the persons and things within their limits. What, sir, was the consequence? The bad, the profligate, the idle, all grades of the human character from every portion of the country, were rapidly congregating in the Cherokee nation. Public highways, connecting the white settlements in Georgia, Tennessee, and Alabama, were frequently beset by these lawless wretches; robbery, and murder was the necessary consequence. These examples were quickly imitated by the more ignorant Indian. The scene was too shocking to describe. If, perchance, the offenders were likely to be brought before the tribunals of the Cherokee nation, they sought safety in flying to the mountains in Georgia and Carolina, Tennessee and Alabama, and then would again commence new operations, by plundering the Indians. When in the Cherokee country, they would plunder the whites; when on the borders of the settlements, they would plunder the Indians; and so numerous and well organized was this band of thieves, that for a length of time the arm of the judiciary, the ministerial officers of the law were resisted, and often baffled by the superior force of the offenders, in the due administration of the laws. This state of things, brought about solely by the pretensions of this Indian Government, could not longer be endured. The jurisdiction of Georgia and her responsibility to herself and the world, for preserving the rights of her citizens of property and life itself, imperiously demanded of her, as the Government had failed to remove the cause of this annoyance, to arrest the evil. Well, sir, what was the first step taken by Georgia to accomplish this object, which the candid of all parties must admit was her duty? It was, by legislation, to extend her criminal jurisdiction over her entire territory, and thereby abrogating the Indian form of Government. Was not the Indian as much protected by this act as the white man? Was it not as much, nay more, necessary to protect the Indian than any other portion of our population? Their own laws had proved inadequate to the object, they had been tried and failed. Instead of preserving order, the result was endless confusion and misrule. We had stood by and seen the experiment fully made, and it had most signally failed. Every principle therefore of enlightened humanity, as well as of honor, of patriotism, and of State sovereignty, demanded the course that Georgia pursued. Yet, sir, it is remarkable, that for this act of Georgia there has been an uniform and deep voice of censure, from a particular quarter of this Union, from that day to this. Nor has there been any thing left undone, that could thwart the policy of Georgia, in adjusting her own domestic rights and interest, to which it is even indecent on the part of other States to allude, in the terms of censure, much less of interference, and more especially the older States of this Union. If, sir, I were disposed to retort, by telling the story of outrage, cruel, merciless, and vindictive as it was, even to the extermination of whole tribes, what answer are gentlemen prepared to give? Where are the tribes that once inhabited this country from Maine to Georgia? Either swept from the face of the earth, or here and there small numbers residing in obscure corners, broken down in spirit, degraded, poor, and miserable. Yet, sir, we of Georgia are to receive lectures on morality, on the rights of the Indians, of humanity to savages, from the people of those States whose forefathers have exterminated tribe after tribe, by their just, and humane policy to the savage! Did it ever occur to those who are thus unjustly dealing out their denunciations against Georgia, how different must be the judgment of posterity from their own, when history shall tell the solemn truth, that the humanity and justice of the East and North, as well as portions of the South, had exterminated the mighty tribes that once held the possession of those sections, long before the close of the eighteenth century; while at this day the cruelty and injustice of Georgia towards the savages in her State had enabled them to boast of men of the first talents, high literary attainments, and in numbers exceeding the entire Indian population of all the old States together. These are things, sir, of which, as an American, I can take no pleasure in adverting to; but, as a Georgian, I can only feel all the emotions of disgust, when I hear my State denounced for her Indian policy, by the people of States who have hunted down, as the wild beast of prey, the last of the red man within their borders. If we are to be lectured, let it come from pure hands and honest hearts; not from those whose practice it is to preach justice, equality and humanity abroad, while at home every act is shrouded with designs black and wicked.

But, Mr. Chairman, there are other facts that should be known to this committee and the nation, in order to understand the true position of Georgia. By the treaty of 1819 with the Cherokees, made with Ross, Gunter, and others, who have been opposing the late Cherokee treaty, there is an express reservation in favor of John Ross, Lewis Ross, John Martin, James Brown, John Burge, Edward Gunter, Richard Taylor, Thomas Foreman, and Richard Fields, and a number of others, of 640 acres of land to each, provided they wished to become citizens of the United States, &c.

Now, sir, I will state also, as a fact not generally known, that this very same John Ross, Lewis Ross, Edward Gunter, George Lowrey, and John Gunter, did put in, in writing, which was regularly recorded at the Cherokee Agency, their applications for the reservations as set forth in the treaty. I will give the letters of Lewis Ross and John Ross.

WASHINGTON CITY, March 6th, 1819.

SIR: Agreeable to the 3d article of the treaty signed at Washington on the 27th February, 1819, I hereby notify that it is my intention to continue to reside permanently on the land reserved to me in said treaty.

(Signed) LEWIS ROSS.

COL. R. J. MEIGS, Cherokee Agent.

CREEK AGENCY, June 17, 1819.

SIR: Finding that some of those persons who have been granted special reservations in fee simple, by the late treaty, concluded at Washington City on the 27th day of February last, have thought proper to report to you, agreeable to the condition stipulated in the third article of said treaty, notwithstanding I am fully convinced in my opinion that said condition does not immediately apply to special reservations, yet, in order to avoid any misunderstanding of the treaty, I have also thought proper to follow their example. You will therefore please to acknowledge this as my notification, in compliance with the aforesaid stipulated condition, that it is my intention to continue to occupy and enjoy permanently the land reserved me in that treaty.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

JOHN ROSS.

Col. R. J. MEIGS, Cherokee Agent.

The letters of the others are of the same character. Mr. Chairman, can this House, will the American people, ask more to satisfy them of the true character of John Ross and others who are oppposing this treaty, and the peculiar situation in which Georgia has found herself situated? Sir, it should be remembered that it was not until after John Ross, his brother, Lewis Ross, and the others now hostile to this treaty, had accepted the provisions of that of 1819, constituting them citizens of the United States, and with a fee simple in 640 acres of land, selected as the most valuable in the nation, that the project was set on foot by the same individuals, that they would sell their reservations, return again to the nation, assume the command and the control of the Cherokees, organize a Government, adopt a written Constitution and code of laws, to advance their own ambitious projects. What have the eulogists of John Ross to say to his solemn, written pledge, that he intended to reside permanently on his reservation, under the 3d article of the treaty of 1819? Where stands his unblemished character in this transaction? Just where it stands in the present. It was John Ross and his party that made the treaty of 1819, securing, among other things, the best possessions in their country in fee simple, with the rights of a citizen of the United States. How long did they adhere to the conditions upon which they obtained this bounty? No longer than was necessary for them to pocket the profits of their treachery, and a new scene of ambition opened to their view. He then renounced all the rights and honor of an American citizen, and sought for glory and distinction by again betraying the best interests of his nation; and it is this man and his party who, it is contended, have the sole and exclusive right of making treaties for the Cherokees. Is it so, sir? Have not he and his associates, by their own voluntary act, as far back as 1819, deprived themselves of the influence they now seek to exercise?

One other fact, Mr. Chairman, I will allude to in justification of the course of Georgia, in abrogating the Cherokee Government. Among other oppressive enactments, these people passed the following barbarous laws for the sole purpose of perpetuating in the hands of Ross and his party, who had then seized upon the government of the Cherokees: "That any person or persons whatsoever, who shall be found guilty of forming unlawful meetings, with intent to create faction against the peace and tranquillity of the people—to encourage rebellion against the laws and government of the Cherokee nation, shall receive one hundred stripes on the bare back." Another section provides: "That any person or persons who shall, contrary to the Legislative Council, enter into a treaty, &c. and agree to sell any part or portion of the national lands, upon conviction, shall suffer death." And it is, also, provided that persons who abscond, or who shall refuse, by resistance, to appear at the place of trial, are declared outlaws; "and any person of this nation shall kill them, so offending, in any manner most convenient, within the limits of this nation, and shall not be held accountable to the laws for the same." And another section of the Cherokee laws provide, after administering one hundred lashes on the naked back, for a particular offence, "and no treaty shall be binding upon this nation which shall not have been ratified by the General Council, and approved by the principal chief."

I will not spend the time of the committee in commenting on these laws. No one can mistake their object. John Ross was the principal chief, and no treaty could, therefore, under their law, be binding without his approval. This gave him the power, unlimited and despotic as it was, that he desired. These laws were enacted in October, 1829, and it was not until November or December, 1829, that the Legislature of Georgia extended her criminal jurisdiction over the Cherokee country within her limits. I need not here repeat what is universally believed to be true, that these laws prevented the great mass of the Cherokee people from emigrating. If one dared express a desire to go West, or treat with the United States, we all know his fate; and, if the reports of the day are to believed, many paid the forfeit of that law with their lives. Under such circumstances, Mr. Chairman, was my State placed at the moment she took her stand and asserted her rights. If consequences to be deplored have resulted, they must be attributed to the folly and ambition of Ross and his party, and the delay of justice by this Government to Georgia. Georgia acted as became her at so momentous a crisis. Had she done less, she would not have commanded the respect of her sister States, herself, or of posterity.

Mr. Chairman, the honorable gentleman from Virginia condemns the policy of this Government, in removing all the Indian tribes West of the Mississippi. That this policy, so fatal to the red man, originated with General Jackson, and must end in ruin. I think the honorable member is mistaken, when he gives the entire credit, for so I regard it, to General Jackson. The policy of removing the Indians West, and without the limits of the States, commenced under the administration of General Washington, and has been the settled policy of the Government, from that day to this. It is true, sir, and so much the more creditable to General Jackson, that he never failed to urge this policy upon Indian tribes within the States, or upon Congress, on all suitable occasions, as the last and only means of throwing around the savage the efficient protection of this Government. But while I am free to admit, that this policy, under his Administration, assumed a decided and organized form and practical bearing, yet I will not yield all the honor of this mighty work of national humanity to General Jackson. It originated in the benevolent and comprehensive charity and practical humanity of our first Chief Magistrate, and has been sanctioned by all who have come after him; and though it may be said of General Jackson that more has been done under his Administration to carry out this great work, in which every philanthropist must feel an abiding interest, it does not show the whole credit to be his, or that the policy itself is wrong. The honorable gentleman will take upon himself a task of no ordinary character, when he attempts to prove that what is understood to be our Indian policy, is either wrong in itself, or will be productive of results fatal to them or to the whites.

The honorable gentleman, as is somewhat common in this House on particular occasions, reminds us of the danger of a large standing army to the liberties of the people; and that such an army will become necessary, in order to protect our western frontier, if the Indians are all concentrated on the west of the Mississippi. He informs us, from our experience in the Seminole war, that we have found that it was necessary to have seven American soldiers to contend against one Indian warrior; that when the Cherokees shall reach their western home, the mighty tribes can number sixty thousand warriors, which would require, according to our late experience in Florida, a standing army of upwards of three hundred thousand soldiers to protect that frontier, and hold the savages in check; and the honorable gentleman concludes that the policy is unwise, because it will necessarily lead to this overgrown standing army, that is to swallow up the liberties of the people. Sir, I cannot think there is much force in his view of the question. The honorable gentleman greatly underrates the character of the American soldiers, if such is his opinion. But I regard the immense army spoken of by the gentleman as imaginary, and that he entertains too much respect for the courage of our soldiers, to disparage them by any such comparison.

Mr. Chairman, the honorable gentleman insists that we can live side by side with the Indians in harmony, and that it would be humanity and justice in Georgia to permit the Cherokees to remain on the land of their fathers. Sir, this is the feeling of many gentlemen, who have either forgotten the lessons of all experience, or know but little of Indian character. How often has the experiment been tried; and where can you point to a solitary instance of permanent good resulting to the savage? No sooner do you bring the white and red man in close contact in the same community than the latter falls into all the vices and errors of the former, imitating none of his virtues. Sir, I have seen something of Indian character; I know something of the demoralizing influence upon the white and red man by placing them in contiguous neighborhoods; and I should regard it as one of the greatest moral evils that could befall the Cherokees to remain in their present situation. Better for them that they be driven at the point of the bayonet to their western homes, than to remain where ruin, wretchedness, and misery await them. Why, from the beginning, such should be so, I will not attempt to explain; but that the fact exists, all must admit. Then, sir, should we now halt in our career, again to make experiments that have, as often as repeated, led its victims to the altar? Is it not the part of wisdom, is it not our duty, to provide for evils that exist, to treat the condition of these Indians as a practical question, rather than indulge in morbid sympathies and bitter railings, that the laws of nature have fixed an insuperable barrier between the moral condition of the savage aud the christian? In all this there is a providence beyond the ken of man; stubborn and unalterable laws of nature, that will neither yield to our entreaties, nor disappear at our bidding.

Mr Chairman, the honorable gentleman, with his accustomed earnestness of manner, asked, would not Georgia consent to pay an additional sum of money to induce the Indians to emigrate sooner than engage in a war? Yes, to bribe Ross and his party to sanction this treaty, rather than see war raging on our soil? I would deprecate as much as any man living a conflict with the Cherokees. I will pursue no course here or elsewhere, with the intention of bringing about such a result; but, sir, I will never vote one dollar to bribe a faithless man to sanction the supreme law of this land. Others, who take a different view of the subject, may vote John Ross million upon million for pacification. I shall not complain at that; but, as one of the representatives of Georgia, I cannot consent, by any vote of mine, to purchase the peace of my constituents at the hands of John Ross. And has it come to this, that the treaty which has been so often on this floor denounced as fraudulent, as a foul blot upon our national character, as a crying sin invoking the vengeance of heaven, is at last to be purified, stripped of its infamy, made worthy the support of all that have denounced it, by voting two or three millions to John Ross and his friends? I rejoice, sir, that the true issue has, after all, been presented. John Ross is now, as he always has been from the first moment, in the market. Give him one or two millions, and the entire control of the five millions embraced in the treaty, with the power of conducting the emigration of the Indians, and all his attachment for the land of his fathers, the soil of his birth, will die in that false and treacherous bosom, unlamenting the necessity that compels the separation.

For one, Mr. Chairman, whatever may be the consequence, I can conceive of nothing I would not prefer to placing my State by any vote of mine in a situation so humiliating. I will never consent to vote one dollar to bribe Ross, or extend the emigration one day beyond the time prescribed in the treaty.

SUPPRESSION OF INDIAN HOSTILITIES.

SPEECH OF MR. HAYNES,
OF GEORGIA,

In the House of Representatives, May 28 and 29, 1838—In Committee of the Whole on the bill making appropriations for preventing and suppressing Indian hostilities for the year 1838, and for arrearages for the year 1837.

Mr. HAYNES addressed the Committee as follows:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: When I first came into this House, in 1825, it was in the midst of an Indian controversy between the then Executive of the United States and the State of Georgia; and no one can regret more than I do, that, after having occupied a seat here, first and last, for more than twelve years, and when the period of my public service is drawing to a close, I should find myself under the necessity of once more entering into the discussion of such a subject. It is with the deepest regret, and alone under the strongest sense of duty to my constituents and myself, that I could be induced to take any part in this discussion. But, sir, I should be recreant to the trust reposed in me by an intelligent and confiding people—I should be false to the honor which belongs to my character as their representative—if I could sit by and hear the denunciations which have been hurled against the State of which I am one of the representatives, without endeavoring to repel them. The wide range of discussion which has been opened before this committee, renders it indispensable that I should indulge a scope of remark entirely beyond what properly belongs to the bill now under consideration. To enable me to do justice to Georgia, uninteresting as it may be, I am compelled to recur, briefly, to the European colonization of the American continent. It must be well known to this committee, that the various nations descended from European stock, now settled on this continent, emigrated to the portions colonized by them upon one great and general principle. I may assert, without fear of contradiction, that from the time the standard of Ferdinand and Isabella was planted on the shores of the new world by the great man who discovered it, the European colonies were settled in this country upon the principle that discovery gave a perfect right to soil and jurisdiction over every person and thing whatsoever. I could not better lay down the doctrine, in its application to the aboriginal inhabitants, as it has been carried out and acted upon by every nation which has established colonies here, than by a reference to remarks made by a distinguished citizen of Massachusetts [Mr. JOHN QUINCY ADAMS,] in an anniversary oration delivered by him in commemoration of the landing of the Pilgrims at Plymouth in that State, in December, 1802.

"The Indian right of possession itself stands," says Mr. ADAMS, "with regard to the greatest part of the country, upon a questionable foundation. Their cultivated fields; their constructed habitations; a space of ample sufficiency for their subsistence, and whatever they had annexed to themselves by personal labor, were undoubtedly by the laws of nature theirs. But what is the right of a huntsman to the forest of a thousand miles, over which he has accidentally ranged in quest of prey? Shall the liberal bounties of Providence to the race of man be monopolized by one of a thousand for whom they were created? Shall the exuberant bosom of the common mother, amply adequate to the nourishment of millions, be claimed exclusively by a few hundreds of her offspring? Shall the lordly savage not only disdain the virtues and enjoyments of civilization himself, but shall he control the civilization of the world? Shall he forbid the wilderness to blossom like the rose? Shall he forbid the oaks of the forest to fall before the axe of industry, and rise again, transformed into the habitations of ease and elegance? Shall he doom an immense region of the globe to perpetual desolation, and to hear the howling of the tiger and the wolf silence forever the voice of human gladness? Shall the hills and the valleys, which a beneficent God has formed to teem with the life of innumerable multitudes, be condemned to everlasting barrenness? Shall the mighty rivers, poured out by the hand of nature, as channels of communication between numerous nations, roll their waters in sullen silence and eternal solitude to the deep? Have hundreds of commodious harbors, a thousand leagues of coast, and a boundless ocean, been spread in front of this land, and shall every purpose of utility to which they could apply be prohibited by the tenant of the woods? No, generous philanthropists. Heaven has not been thus inconsistent in the work of its hands! Heaven has not thus placed at irreconcileable strife, its moral laws with its physical creation!"

The doctrine contained in this extract is not only conformable to the system of English colonization on this continent, but that of every other European nation which established colonies upon it. From the settlement of the oldest of the Anglo American colonies, from the settlement of Virginia in 1606, to that of Georgia, the youngest in 1733, there is, among the original thirteen States, but a single exception, in which entire jurisdiction has not been exercised by them, either as colonies or States, over the Indians within their respective limits, as will be found on reference to their statute books. Of all the old thirteen States, Delaware alone has abstained from the exercise of such jurisdiction; and if I am not very much mistaken, alone for the reason that there was not a single Indian tribe within her limits. A small portion of the Nanticokes were there, but the body of the tribe was in Maryland, and subjected to her jurisdiction. The terms of the statutes of the different colonies and States are various, but the principle of absolute sovereignty over the aboriginal inhabitants, with the single exception of Delaware, is found in them all. It would be easy to sustain the assertion, that entire sovereignty and jurisdiction over the Indians was the principle of Anglo American colonization, by reference to the laws of the several colonies and States now composing this Union, but it could not be necessary to inflict such labor upon myself, nor so far to tax the patience of this committee. As this principle of jurisdiction over Indians was at first established upon the settlement of the colonies, so did our fathers find it at the commencement of the Revolution. Well, sir, Georgia stood upon the same footing, both as a colony and a State, with her sisters on this subject. After the establishment of American independence, when the articles of confederation were found to be insufficient to promote the public welfare, and to secure the blessings which the union of the States was intended to establish and perpetuate, when the delegates met in convention in 1787, for the purpose of revising our form of Government, we find in the Federal Constitution, that great and glorious result of their labors, but a single particular which touches at all upon the jurisdiction of the several States over the Indian tribes within their limits. In fact, the word "Indian" occurs but twice throughout the whole instrument—once in the clause which confers the commercial power upon the General Government, and once in relation to the persons entitled to be enumerated for representation in the Congress of the United States. Nor does the Federal Constitution confer any power upon this Government over Indians, except the single and simple power to "regulate commerce with the Indian tribes." We know very well that for a long series of years, attempts have been made so to torture and misinterpret that clause of the Constitution, as to authorize the extension of jurisdiction over them by the Federal Government in all cases whatsoever; but, sir, it is the idlest and absurdest of all deductions that could be drawn from any one clause in that instrument. Every one knows that the whole commercial power of the General Government in relation to foreign nations, the several States, and the Indian tribes, is embraced in one single little clause of the Constitution. But if the power to regulate commerce with the Indian tribes, confers exclusive jurisdiction upon this Government over them, it confers a like jurisdiction over the several States, and annihilates their respective Governments at a single blow. I repeat, that such an interpretation of the Constitution is the idlest and absurdest inference which could be drawn from any part of that instrument. I am very well aware that this may be considered a stale and unprofitable train of argument on my part; but it is impossible to do justice to Georgia, without adverting to it. Sir, in the whole history of the legislation of that State, she has never, in a single instance, overstepped the principles set forth in the extract just read from the Plymouth speech of the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] nor strained her jurisdiction one inch beyond what all the other original States have exercised, except Delaware, with respect to the Indians. In exercising this jurisdiction, which was alike exercised by the various colonies, or States, it was based upon the principle of entire sovereignty over the whole soil, and over the whole population within their limits as colonies or States.

It is now too late to inquire into the question of abstract right to such jurisdiction; it is enough for my argument to have shown its universal application to all the European colonies planted on this continent. If the time shall come when it will be necessary for me to inquire whether the sum of human happiness has been increased by the settlement of European colonies in America, giving full allowance for its effect upon the aboriginal inhabitants, I shall be prepared to sustain the affirmative. It is well known that the British colonies on this continent were settled under the authority of charters from the Crown, and that the limits of the original States have been settled by them where no conflicting claim has been shown to exist. Georgia, like her sister colonies, was settled under a charter, by which her original limits were so clearly defined, that no contest is believed ever to have arisen between her and another colony or State, except that which involved a small strip of territory claimed by South Carolina, and which was amicably adjusted between them at the convention of Beaufort in 1787.

By the commission to Governor Wright, and the royal proclamation in 1763 or 4, her limits were defined to extend from the Savannah to the St. Mary's, and inland from the 31st to the 35th degree of north latitude, and from the Atlantic ocean to the Mississippi. Thus stood the extent of her territory at the treaty of peace with Great Britain in 1783; and thus it continued to stand until she ceded a large portion of her territory—about one hundred thousand square miles—to the United States, in 1802.

Mr. Chairman, we have heard much about the common right of the Union to the waste or unappropriated lands within the several States. Often as that question was brought before the Revolutionary Congress, and much as it retarded the ratification of the articles of Confederation, some two or three of the States insisting upon the establishment of the principle before they would ratify them, the ratification of all was finally accorded without it. So far, indeed, from the affirmation of the principle, it was distinctly disaffirmed as often as it was brought before the Congress of the Confederation. The utmost length to which that body ever consented to go was earnestly to recommend liberal cessions by the States owning large bodies of unappropriated lands.

At the close of 1787, or early in the year 1788, Georgia made a formal proposal to Congress to cede a large portion of her western territory to the United States; which, instead of being rejected because the lands were already the property of the Union, was declined on the ground that the Federal Government was not then in a condition to meet the payment demanded for it by Georgia, and for other considerations not necessary to mention. Notwithstanding Georgia was entitled to all the land embraced within her charter, about forty years ago, the then President of the United States, and a Congress subservient to his views, established a Territorial Government within her limits, although within the preceding four years, in negotiating the treaty of San Lorenzo El Real touching the southern boundary of the United States, Spain had been vanquished upon the title of Georgia. That circumstance, together with others of a local nature, occasioned the assembling of a convention in 1798, for the purpose of revising her constitution; which convention inserted a provision in the revised constitution authorizing the cession of a large portion of her territory to the United States, defining the boundary beyond which such cession should be made.

On the 24th day of April, 1802, twenty-five days after the passage of the law to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes, and which virtually repealed that law as to Georgia, a compact was entered into between the United States and Georgia, for a cession of this territory to the United States, by which Georgia conveyed to the United States about one hundred thousand square miles of her most valuable lands, upon the condition of receiving, at a period uncertain and remote, the pitiful sum of $1,250 000, and the removal of the Indians from the limits reserved by her. The language of that compact deserves particular consideration. I do not, however, place the right of Georgia to jurisdiction over the soil and people, and every thing else upon her territory, upon the compact of 1802. I place it upon the high and original ground of European colonization, referred to at the opening of my remarks, as confirmed and settled by the Declaration of Independence, the treaty of peace with Great Britain, and the Federal Constitution which now binds these States together. But if doubt could exist in any human mind whatever, as to her rights, that question would be clearly settled by the compact of 1802; for, by it, in express terms, Georgia ceded to the United States "all claim to soil and jurisdiction" beyond a certain limit; and the United States ceded to Georgia "all claim to soil and jurisdiction" within that limit, as reserved by Georgia to herself. The United States entered at once fully into the enjoyment of "soil and jurisdiction" as ceded to them by Georgia; and who will dare to say that Georgia had not the same right to enter upon and enjoy the "soil and jurisdiction" ceded to her by the United States?

By no known rule of construction can one branch of these mutual stipulations be enforced, and the other not. Is it not, then, surprising that, after the United States should have entered at once and fully into the possession and enjoyment of what was ceded to them by Georgia, we should find at this late day, in defiance of the cession to her of "soil and jurisdiction" by the United States, the doctrine set up that an Indian tribe may hold a position as an independent political community upon the soil of Georgia? I have said that all the colonies, and original States of this Union, exercised perfect and entire jurisdiction over the Indians within their limits; and, I will now add, that the very last of all the old States, as she was the last one planted on this continent, to extend her jurisdiction over the Indians, was Georgia. Various acts of legislation, it is true, were adopted by her some forty or fifty years ago, in relation to the Indians; but she deferred the whole and entire exercise of her sovereignty over them until within the last ten years.

The occasion was this: In the summer of 1827 a council of delegates of the Cherokee nation assembled, and adopted, and promulgated, a formal Constitution, setting up a permanent, independent, sovereignty, embracing some four or five millions of acres of territory, within the limits of Georgia. Notwithstanding the proceedings of this convention were known to the Governor and Legislature of Georgia, at its meeting in November, 1827, even then, Georgia forbore to interfere with this pretended Cherokee sovereignty.

In January, 1828, the distinguished individual who now presides over the Department of State, [Mr. Forsyth,] being then Governor of Georgia, communicated a copy of the Cherokee constitution to the President of the United States. That President, with whom Georgia had just triumphantly closed the memorable controversy which grew out of the Creek treaty made at the Indian Spring, in February, 1825, being willing, so far as might be practicable, to carry to fulfilment the obligations of the United States to remove the Indians from within the limits of Gergia, entered into a treaty with the Cherokees of the West in May, 1828, looking, among other things, to the emigration of the Eastern portion of the tribe to the west of the Mississippi. Is peak from a knowledge of the fact, that such was one of the important motives which led to the conclusion of that treaty, being, at the time it was made, a member of the Georgia delegation, who were consulted on the subject. It was understood that a portion of the Western Cherokees, who made that treaty, returned through the Eastern portion of the tribe, in the summer of 1828, for the purpose of inducing their friends and kindred to emigrate to the West, and that, so far from finding a friendly reception, were abused and maltreated for it. But the opposition of the authorities of the tribe did not stop there.

At the meeting of the Cherokee council in October, 1828, an act was passed, disfranchising any Cherokee who might enrol for emigration to the West, and authorizing any other Cherokee to enter into the possession of houses and lands then occupied by him. It was not until after the passage of that act that the Legislature of Georgia extended the jurisdiction of the State over the Cherokees, at the annual session in November, 1828. In spite of the attempt to enforce the Cherokee law of 1828 against emigration, the spirit was not checked sufficiently for the authorities of the tribe; and in November, 1829, another act was passed by the council, or, as would appear from a printed copy of the Cherokee laws, solely by John Ross, as principal chief, inflicting a fine of one thousand dollars, and the punishment of one hundred lashes, upon any and every Cherokee Indian who should dare to enrol for emigration to the West. As the law of Georgia, of November, 1828, was made to meet the Cherokee law against emigration which preceded it, so in November, 1829, the Legislature of Georgia passed another act to countervail the Cherokee law which preceded it. In both instances, it will be perceived that Georgia legislation followed that of the Cherokees, and was occasioned by it. It would not be difficult to show that Georgia has proceeded progressively in the same course, basing her legislation upon the previous action of the Cherokees. It is worthy of remembrance that the Creeks, Chickasaws and Choctaws have been removed from the lands ceded to the United States by the compact of 1802; while the Cherokees, after the lapse of thirty-five years, and the establishment of two flourishing States upon the ceded territory, are still permitted to encumber the soil of Georgia.

If the expense of removing the Indians from Georgia is alleged to her prejudice, my answer is, that the United States have received not less than sixty millions of acres of land as an equivalent for doing it. Surely, upon an examination of the account current, no one can complain that the United States have made a hard bargain. Would the people of this country be willing to cancel it, and restore the ceded territory to Georgia upon being reimbursed what has been expended in removing the Indians? I think not. The difficulties growing out of the conflicting legislation of Georgia and the Cherokees were heightened by the depredations mutually committed by bad men of either race upon the people of the other, or both. During the period under review, and that which followed it, the question was not as to the mode in which Georgia should exercise, or had exercised, jurisdiction over the Cherokees, but involved the naked, vital principle of her right of jurisdiction. By what right could any community, either before or since the adoption of the Federal Constitution, establish an independent Government within the limits of any one of the States of this Union, I leave to the adversaries of Georgia, and defy them to answer. Let moralists say what they will, it does not become the people of this country, especially those of the older States, to arraign the course of Georgia on this subject. Well might she say to them, "Let him who is without sin first cast a stone at me." In 1828 and 1829, the extent to which Georgia carried her authority over the Cherokees, was to protect such of that people as might desire to emigrate from the barbarous inflictions of the laws of the tribe. In 1830, a Cherokee by the name of Tassels committed murder upon one of his own countrymen, for which he was arraigned before the superior court of Hall county for trial, and upon solemn inquest was found guilty of murder. I might here show that it was far better, on the ground of humanity, for an Indian to be tried by the white man's law than by the law of the Indian; by the Anglo Saxon institutions than the bloody code of his own countrymen; by that law which not only requires proof of the fact of killing, but which requires to be brought home to the culprit malice aforethought, express or implied. But Georgia was not permitted to proceed quietly in the exercise of her jurisdiction over this Indian murderer. A hue-and-cry was raised against her throughout the whole length and breadth of the land, and the power of the Supreme Court of the United States was invoked to arrest his execution, and to take him away from her authority. A citation was served upon the Governor of Georgia, and upon the judge before whom the murderer had been been tried and convicted; and because the authorities of the State went on to execute Tassels in conformity with his sentence, Georgia was accused of braving and defying the authority of the United States. I may say here, before I proceed further with the narrative of the contest between Georgia and the Cherokees, that in the case of Tassels there was no haste to execute the sentence of the law. On the contrary, the day of execution was made so distant as to enable the unfortunate convict and his friends to invoke Executive clemency for a respite, and to memorialize the Legislature for a pardon. No mitigating circumstances being shown, the pardon was refused, and he was executed. But even according to the doctrine contended for, that the Supreme Court had appellate jurisdiction over the case, under what obligations did Georgia stand to obey the citation of that tribunal? How she braved the authority of the Supreme Court, will be seen by referring to the decision of the late Chief Justice Marshall, in the case of Cohens against the State of Virginia. In considering what a citation is, Judge Marshall says:

"And what is a citation? It is simply notice to the opposite party that the record is transferred to another court, where he may appear, or decline to appear, as his judgment or inclination may determine. As the party who has obtained the judgment is out of court, and may therefore not know that his cause is removed, common justice requires that notice of the fact should be given to him. But this notice is not a suit, nor has it the effect of process. If the party does not choose to appear, he cannot be brought into court; nor is his failure to appear considered as a default."

Sir, if a citation is neither suit nor process against an individual, I should like to know how it can be so against a State? Such an idea would be preposterous in the extreme.

To show, still further, that it was the question of jurisdiction alone which was in controversy, and not the mode of its e xercise, it is only necessary to refer to the celebrated Cherokee chancery bill against the State of Georgia, which was argued before, and determined by, the Supreme Court, at its session in 1831. That bill denied entirely the jurisdiction of Georgia over the Cherokees, and prayed the Court to enjoin that State against the future exercise of such jurisdiction. And what was the decision of the Court, as delivered in March, 1831? We shall learn from the following extract from its decision, delivered by Chief Justice Marshall himself.

In delivering the opinion of the Court, Chief Justice Marshall observes: "The Court has bestowed its best attention on this question, and, after mature deliberation, the majority is of opinion that an Indian tribe or nation within the United States, is not a foreign State in the sense of the Constitution, and cannot maintain an action in the courts of the United States."

* * * "A serious additional objection exists to the jurisdiction of the Court. Is the matter of the bill the proper subject for inquiry and decision? It seeks to restrain a State from the forcible exercise of legislative power over a neighboring people asserting their independence; their right to which the State denies. On the several matters alleged in the bill, (for example, on the laws making it criminal to exercise the usual powers of self-government in their own country by the Cherokee nation,) this Court cannot interpose, at least in the form in which these matters are presented."

In reference to the jurisdiction of Georgia over the possession of lands by the Cherokees, Chief Justice Marshall says: "The mere question of right might, perhaps, be decided by this Court in a proper case, with proper parties; but the Court is asked to do more than to decide on the title. The bill requires us to control the legislation of Georgia, and to restrain the exercise of its physical force. The propriety of such an interposition by the Court may be well questioned. It savors too much of the exercise of political power to be within the proper province of the judicial department."

In the closing paragraph of the opinion of the Court it is observed: "If it be true that the Cherokee nation have rights, this is not the tribunal in which these rights are to be asserted. If it be true that wrongs have been inflicted, and that still greater are to be apprehended, this is not the tribunal which can redress the past or prevent the future."

"The motion for an injunction is denied."

It is very remarkable that, after pronouncing such an opinion as this, disclaiming jurisdiction, and that too for the reason that its exercise would savor too much of the exercise of political power, in one short year, the Supreme Court of the United States should have attempted to arrest the jurisdiction of Georgia over one of her own citizens, residing in the country occupied by the Cherokees; and still more so that the Court should have sought to justify it, by assuming the individual to be the citizen of a State some eight or ten hundred miles off, when he had a permanent residence within the limits of Georgia.

If ever there was an attempt by a judicial tribunal in this country to usurp power not belonging to the Government of which it was a member, that attempt was made by the Supreme Court in the case of Worcester and Butler against the State of Georgia; an attempt which, I venture to predict, will never be renewed by that Court against any member of this Union.

The State of Georgia, in the progress of her legislation for the purpose of extending her jurisdiction over the Cherokees, organized counties, and established her civil and other authorities within them. In 1831 the Legislature of the State went the whole extent of the doctrine contained in the extract from the Plymouth speech which was read at the commencement of my remarks, by surveying and apportioning the waste lands in the Cherokee country among her own people, securing the Indians in the possession of such portions as were occupied and improved by them.

There is, in connection with the legislation of Georgia, and the course of the principal chief of the Cherokees, one important circumstance which has not yet been brought to the notice of the committee. I have said, the Legislature of Georgia had determined to take possession of the country, subject to the principle of Indian occupancy, to which I have already adverted; and I will now say, that, up to the 25th of May, 1838, the Cherokees were protected in the possession of the improvements occupied by them to the extent of from one hundred and twenty to one hundred and sixty acres, to each head of an occupant family. This was the state of the case between Georgia and the Cherokees, when the delegation, at the head of which was John Ross, urged upon the Executive of the United States to submit the valuation of all the lands occupied by them east of the Mississippi, to the decision of the Senate, as has been shown by more than one gentleman who has already addressed the committee, and most particularly by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. GRAHAM.]

In February, 1835, that delegation, clothed, as I believe, with the whole power of their tribe, being essentially its Government—for I consider John Ross as the impersonation and embodiment of Cherokee power and Cherokee will—through the Secretary of War, proposed to submit the question of the valnation of their land to the Senate of the United States, pledging themselves to use their efforts to induce their people to accept the award. That award was made; and the committee have already been told, that when the delegation was urged to enter into stipulations on the basis of five millions of dollars awarded by the Senate, their own especial umpire, they then for the first time discovered that they had no power to enter into such stipulations. They could not treat at Washington, but must treat in the Cherokee nation. Pending the transaction, after the question had been submitted to the Senate of the United States; after that body had awarded five millions of dollars as an ample indemnity to the Eastern Cherokees as the price of their removal to the West, a very short time before the proposed meeting of the Commissioners of the United States with Ross and his people in their country, for the purpose of there consummating the award of the Senate, while the Cherokees were still under the protection of the laws of Georgia for an indefinite time; John Ross and his council transmitted to the Governor of Georgia a communication, a copy of which I will ask the Clerk to read.

The CLERK read the following:

COUNCIL GROUND OF THE CHEROKEE NATION,
Red Clay, October 26, 1835.

SIR: The undersigned, the principal Chief, the assistant principal Chief, the Committee, and Council of the Cherokee nation, trust you will appreciate the purity of their motives for thus addressing you. You are aware of the distressing situation in which our country stands. We are the earlier possessors of the soil, which we yet retain, but where events, which we have had no share whatever in producing, surround us with all the anxieties and privations of war, although in a perfect state of peace.

Various attempts have been made to arrange our difficulties, and upon conditions which may satisfy the people. We have been misrepresented, we have been slandered. The General Government of the United States has been swayed by agents of its own, who do not enter into the feelings of our nation, and who adopt a course in reference to it which has made the nation distrustful The Cherokees will only put faith in those whose devotedness to them has been tried. They have appointed a delegation to settle their difficulties. To accomplish this, they have invested that delegation with the fullest powers. If sources of irritation are now avoided, we doubt not all will be accomplished which can be desired on the close of the present session of Congress, should we not greatly misapprehend the feelings of the General Government.

Under these circumstances, we have thought it due to ourselves, to you, to the United States, to the interest of humanity, to make this representation, and to ask that you will submit it the Legislature, of which you are the head; and, in submitting it, that you will entreat the Legislature, whatever they may have had the purpose of doing regarding those portions of our nation which border on their possessions, to abstain, at any rate until this negotiation shall be completed, from passing any law, of sanctioning any proceedings, which may further harass a people so deeply galled that a renewal of irritating measures, at a moment so critical, might entirely defeat the objects of those who have nothing at heart but the peace and happiness of their own countrymen, and a permanent friendship with yours.

We have the honor to be, sir,
Your Excellency's most ob't servants,

To his Excellency the GOVERNOR OF THE STATE OF GEORGIA.

I stated, Mr. Chairman, that at the time this communication was made to the Governor of Georgia, the Cherokee Indians were secured, for an indefinite period, in the possession of their improvements in Georgia, to the extent of one hundred and twenty to one hundred and sixty acres of land for each family. Therefore, there could have been no motive on the part of the State of Georgia to have changed her legislation on the subject, unless it was intended to bring this matter to a close. But, acting on this pledge from John Ross, the Legislature, in November thereafter, passed an act securing Indian occupants in their possessions until November or December, 1836, reserving to the State the power still further to extend their right of occupancy. John Ross and his Council stated to the Governor of Georgia, that, relying on the disposition of the Executive of the United States, not starting any difficulty in relation to the award of their own umpire, the Senate of the United States, but leaving Georgia to act on the clear, distinct, and unquestionable presumption that they would carry out that award by the necessary details; in consideration of which, Georgia legislated specifically to protect the Cherokee occupants in their possessions until November, 1836, several months beyond the session of Congress within which Ross pledged himself to close a final adjustment, still reserving the power of further extension, and in 1836 actually extending the right of Cherokee occupancy up to the 25th of May, 1838. In the course of that session of Congress in which Ross held out to Georgia the promise of a final arrangement, the treaty of which we have heard so much was ratified; and in conformity to its provisions, allowing to the Cherokees two years to complete their removal from the 23d of May, 1836, in November thereafter, the Legislature of Georgia extended the protection of the State to the Cherokee occupants up to the 25th of May, 1838. Sir, the whole course of the legislation of Georgia upon this subject, from the time the communication from Ross was laid before the Legislature, was based upon the faith of that document.

[At this stage Mr. HAYNES yielded to the entreaties of a number of gentlemen, and gave way to Mr. UNDERWOOD of Kentucky, on whose motion the committee rose. On the following day the House went again into committee on the same bill, and Mr. HAYNES concluded his remarks as follows.—Reporter.]

Mr. Chairman, when I addressed the House yesterday, I had, as I thought, closed, or nearly closed, the remarks I proposed to make as to the right of Georgia to jurisdiction over the Indians within her limits, together with her legislation upon the subject. As I stated to the committee at the commencement of my remarks, it was a subject of sincere regret to find myself under the necessity of once more taking part in the discussion of this Indian subject. But I will now recur, for a moment, as connected with the history of this subject, to a document written, or purporting to have been written, by a distinguished citizen of Kentucky, now one of her Senators in the Congress of the United States, [Mr. CLAY.]

ASHLAND, June 6, 1831.

DEAR SIR: I received your letter of the 14th ultimo, describing the wrongs and sufferings of the Cherokee nation. Of these I have been previously well informed. In common with a large portion of the citizens of the United States, I regretted them, and felt the sincerest sympathy with you on account of them; I regretted them not only because of their injustice, but because they inflicted a deep wound on the character of the American Republic.

I have supposed that the principles which had uniformly governed our relations with the Cherokee and other Indian nations, had been too long and too firmly established to be disturbed at this day. They were proclaimed in the negotiation with Great Britain, at Ghent, by the American commissioners who concluded the treaty of peace; and having been one of those commissioners, I feel with more sensibility than most of my fellow-citizens, any violation of those principles. For, if we stated them incorrectly, we deceived Great Britain; and if our Government acts in opposition to them, we deceive the world.

According to those principles, the Cherokee nation has the right to establish its own form of Government, and to alter and amend it from time to time, according to its own sense of its own wants; to live under its own laws; to be exempt from the operations of the laws of the United States; and quietly to possess and enjoy its lands, subject to no other limitation than that, when sold, they can only be sold to the United States. I consider the present Administration of the Government of the United States as having announced a system of policy in direct hostility with those principles; and thereby encouraged Georgia to usurp powers of legislation over the Cherokee nation, which she does not of right possess.

Such are my opinions, which are expressed at your request. But they are the opinions of a private individual, which can avail you nothing.

What ought the Cherokees to do in their present critical situation? is a most important question for their consideration. Without being able to advise them, I see very clearly what they ought not to do. They ought not to make war. They ought to bear every oppression rather than fly to arms. The people of the United States are alone competent now to redress these wrongs, and it is to be hoped that they will sooner or later apply the competent remedy.

In communicating these opinions at your instance, I have done it with no intention that they should be published. A publication might do injury, and I therefore request that it be not made.

I feel very thankful for the friendly sentiments towards myself, which you have expressed; and offer my sincere wishes that your nation finally may obtain justice at the hands of the United States, and may become a civilized, christian, and prosperous community.

I am, with high respect,
Your obedient servant,
H. CLAY.

MR. JOHN GUNTER.

There is no member of this committee who is less inclined to engage in partisan conflict than I am; but as a part of the history of the influences brought to bear upon the controversy then pending between Georgia and the Cherokees, I should have felt conscious of doing injustice to the people who have confided to me a high trust, if I had not placed that communication in such connection with this subject as to have brought it to their notice. I will advert once more, for a moment, to the controversy between the authorities of Georgia and the missionaries Worcester and Butler, for the purdose of stating, that all which Georgia required of them, or any other individuals residing within that portion of her territory occupied by the Cherokees, was the acknowledgment of, and submission to, the jurisdiction of the State.

I might not have thought it necessary to spend a word upon this subject, if it were not for the impressions made in various parts of this country as respects the true motives which actuated Georgia in these transactions, and if she had not been represented as designedly trampling upon the dispensation of religious and christian principle. When those missionaries entered the Cherokee country, it was by permission of the Government of the United States, and the law of Georgia under which they were tried and convicted, contained ample provision for the protection of every individual settled there as an agent, &c. by the permission of that Government; and they must have been exceedingly ambitious of martyrdom, or something else, wantonly to have exposed themselves to the criminal jurisdition of the State.

In the remarks made by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE] upon the conduct of Georgia towards the Cherokees and other Indian tribes within her borders, he was pleased to arraign her motives for disposing of, or distributing her own lands, and not only designated them as mercenary, but spoke of her plan of distribution as a gambling lottery system, if I rightly understood his expressions.

In adopting that method, she adopted no new principle in reference to her public and unlocated lands. From the earliest period of the history of Georgia, so far as I have been informed, and certainly ever since the passage of her law for opening a land office on the 7th of June, 1777, the public lands of the State of Georgia have been considered the property of her citizens, and distributed among them. This, sir, is an old system of gambling, and sanctioned by some of the wisest and best men of this country, which has existed in one form or another, certainly for sixty years, and probably in substance for more than a century. I remarked yesterday, that in the jurisdiction claimed for the Federal Goverment over Indians, there was but a single grant of power to it in the Federal Constitution on that subject, and that that grant was contained in the brief clause conferring the commercial power upon this Government, and was alike applicable to the regulation of commerce with foreign nations among the several States, and with the Indian tribes. I said it was the absurdest of all inferences to attempt to deduce exclusive jurisdiction over Indians from that clause of the Federal Constitution. For that in so doing, we should annihilate the reserved rights and jurisdiction of the States in every thing else. The slighest attention to the general tone of discussion on the part of those who contend for the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States over the Indians, must satisfy every unprejudiced mind, that it is made to rest upon the extravagant an erroneous impression that, from first to last, the United States, as one consolidated nation, possessed original, inherent sovereignty over this whole subject. But, as I said yesterday, the entire sovereignty over the soil and population of the several colonies planted on this continent, from the hour that the banner of Ferdinand and Isabella was unfurled upon its shores by Columbus, was claimed by the colonizing nations of Europe; and that such sovereignty, as to us, passed, perfect and unimpaired, to the possession of the several States at the establishment of American Independence. This being the case, all the powers of the Federal Government are the free gift of the States; and none but the commercial power having been granted to it in regard to the Indian tribes, their jurisdiction over them is not in the slightest degree impaired or limited in any other particular.

Having passed as briefly as I could over the question of the jurisdiction of a State over Indians within her limits, and especially adverted to the legislation of Georgia towards the Cherokees, it may be proper that I should say something on the subject of the emigration and colonization of the Indians to the west of the States and Territories of this Union. Upon inquiring into the history of this subject, the first official notice I have been able to find of the adoption of the principle of Indian emigration and colonization, is to be found in the treaty concluded with the Cherokees in 1817, in which is recognised a pledge given to a portion of the tribe by President Jefferson early in the year 1809. I have understood, but cannot now lay my hand upon the document, which may be quoted as authority, that one important consideration which induced Mr. Jefferson to desire the acquisition of Louisiana, was to procure an extensive range of wild country, to which to remove and colonize the then residing Indians east of the Mississippi. Be that as it may, he encouraged the emigration of the Cherokees as early as January, 1809, urging them to settle high up the Arkansas and White rivers, that they might be entirely removed from the neighborhood of the white population; and one of the provisions of the treaty of 1817 purports to carry into effect the pledge thus given to the Cherokees, in 1809, by President Jefferson, and to secure to them the peaceable possession of their new country in the West.

There is nothing further in our legislation, or other documentary history, so far as I have been able to learn, on this subject, until we come down to the last annual message of President Monroe to Congress, in December, 1824, in a short paragraph of which he invites the attention of Congress to it, and urges its adoption. At a subsequent period of the same session of Congress, on the 27th of January, 1825, Mr. Monroe communicated a special message to Congress, emphatically recommending a general plan of Indian emigration and colonization west of the Mississippi, but Congress then adopted no general, or even partial legislation, so far as I know or believe, in regard to it. Early in the year 1826, troubles having arisen in the Creek nation the previous year, which resulted in the death of Tustunnuggee Hadki, the white warrior of Muscogee, better known as General McIntosh, his followers were anxious to remove to the West, and provision was made by law for their emigration and settlement there.

As has been already stated, in 1828, a treaty was made by the Western Cherokees, one of the objects of which was to induce the emigration of that portion of the tribe still remaining, east of the Mississippi.

In the last annual message of President Adams, communicated to Congress in 1828, he invited its attention to the general plan of Indian emigration as fully and elaborately urged in the report of Gen. Porter, the then Secretary of War. The subject was again earnestly pressed upon the attention of Congress, by President Jackson, in his first annual message to Congress, in December, 1829; and in May, 1830, the Indian bill, as it was called, was passed, the object of which was the full and entire emigration of all the Indian tribes residing east of the Mississippi, to the west of that river.

So, sir, the scheme of Indian emigration to the west is not new, nor the offspring of a single, heated and visionary imagination. For near thirty years we have evidence of its existence, in a more or less extended form; and from December, 1824, the entire plan has had the sanction and recommendation of three successive Presidents of the United States. As I have before said, in May, 1830, under the recommendation of President Jackson in his first annual message to Congress in December, 1829, an act was passed contemplating the entire emigration of all the Indians residing east of the Mississippi to the west; and I very well remember the hard fought battle through which we accomplished its passage in this House. Sir, it was with no little regret, upon my return to this House in 1835, that I found we had lost, or seemed to have lost, to this great question of Indian emigration, the powerful co-operation of my honorable friend, the distinguished member from Tennessee, [Mr. BELL,] now, as in 1830, the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs. I could not readily express my regret at the altered, or apparently altered, position of my honorable friend, for personally he is so, and I regret that I cannot call him my political as well as personal friend, upon this subject. I have taken this occasion to speak of the honorable gentleman from Tennessee, that he may have the opportunity to set me right if I have mistaken his present position in reference to this question of Indian emigration, in the furtherance of which we so heartily co-operated with each other eight years ago.

What are the considerations which bear upon this subject of Indian emigration and colonization? What has been the course of the different States of this Union—I mean the original thirteen States—in regard to the Indian tribes settled within their territories? I shall not recur to it in a spirit of unkindness, or for the purpose of awakening unpleasant recollections, but to contrast for a moment the fate of the numerous tribes scattered over this great country, and subjected to the legislation, as I have shown, of twelve of the thirteen original States, with what will be the condition of such as shall emigrate beyond the reach of our population to the west of the States and Territories of the Union. I shall not attempt to enumerate the Indian wars which have occurred at various periods of our history, nor the severe enactments of many of the colonies towards the Indians. In many instances, what seems to have been kind, benevolent, and paternal legislation, has been exercised towards them; and I may here say, without intending to make an invidious distinction between one portion of the country and another, that the Southern States have been as remarkable (might I not say more so?) for kindness and indulgence towards the Indian race, as any other members of this Union. That ancient and renowned Commonwealth (Virginia) which I am proud to call my mother, may well compare her legislation over the Indian tribes, for humanity, kindness, and paternal solicitude, with that of any other State in the Union, and what has become of her Indians?

The honorable gentleman from that State, [Mr. WISE] who so vehemently opposes the fulfilment of the Cherokee treaty, and seems to be so much opposed to the general scheme of Indian emigration, has given us a sad commentary upon the fate of Indians surrounded by a white population, in his statement of the degraded and now extinct Gingaskins, once flourishing on the eastern shore of Virginia. Looking throughout the wide extent of our country, looking back to the numerous and powerful tribes by which it was covered when our fathers colonized the American wilderness, let me ask, where are the Catawbas, the Tuscaroras, the Nottoways, the Pamunkeys, the Nanticokes, the Delawares, the Six Nations, the Narragansetts, the Pequods, the Penobscots, and the thousand other tribes which once covered the land? Gone, buried, most of them, and the next generation may forget their very existence. Does this encourage us in the course which has been pursued by the various States of this Union towards the Indians? Does this justify us, as a humane and benevolent people, in endeavoring to subject to a process, by which all these tribes have been annihilated, or nearly annihilated, the remnants still lingering among us? I think not, sir. And if any one will take the trouble to inquire of an intelligent Cherokee or Creek, of John Ridge or Chilly McIntosh, he will find that the portions of those tribes which have emigrated to the West are in a more prosperous condition than they have ever been at any former period of their history. On the one side, degradation, decay, and final extinction await them; on the other, their social, moral, and intellectual advancement in all the arts of refinement and civilization, with the permanent preservation and elevation of the Indian race.

These are some of the considerations which justify the great men who have gone before us, and which should embalm their memory in the heart of every lover of his kind, for setting on foot this great scheme of Indian emigration and colonization in the West. We have been told of the danger to be apprehended from embodying so large a number of Indians on our Western frontier, and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] has seemed to desire to appal us by arraying an aggregate of more than three hundred thousand, ready, without warning, to devastate one of the fairest portions of our country. That gentleman must have forgotten that much the largest portion of that number exist in that country independently of any action of ours, and has overlooked the countervailing force of the four great Southwestern tribes residing between us and the wilder and more turbulent portions of their race. For my part, I do not hesitate to express the confident belief that the Chickasaws, Choctaws, Cherokees and Creeks, will form for our frontier a cordon of defence against the wilder tribes beyond them. The various considerations of interest and good will which must tend to such a result, it cannot be necessary for me now to enumerate. I am aware that I have fatigued the committee by going into a tedious detail of the principles of American colonization by the different nations of Europe, and the extent of jurisdiction claimed and exercised by the colonies over the aboriginal inhabitants of America. I have, perhaps, added to that fatigue by the brief and desultory observations I have made upon the emigration of the Indians to the West, but I could not otherwise have placed the subject in the light in which I think it ought to be viewed by every benevolent mind from one extreme of our country to the other.

Having, in this imperfect manner, passed over what seemed to be essential preliminaries, I come now to make a few brief closing observations upon the subject immediately before us. I regret exceedingly the wide range of discussion which has been indulged in, especially by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] upon a bill, the single object of which is to make an appropriation to repress and suppress Indian hostilities, and to discharge arrearages for the past. I regret, with no less sincerity, that a topic which has no necessary connection with the bill, whether the Cherokee treaty be indeed a treaty or no treaty, should have been introduced into this discussion. But as it is our habit to discuss any thing and every thing in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, however immediate or remote its relevancy, it might be considered indelicate for me to remark further upon it. I will, therefore, come, as briefly as I can, to the consideration of that treaty, the opposition to which has rendered a portion of the appropriation now asked for necessary. In the winter of 1834–5, as the Committee has been informed over and over again, a delegation of Cherokee Indians came to this city, and proposed to the President of the United States, through the Secretary of War, to settle all their difficulties by a final cession of their territory east of the Mississippi, for the gross sum of $20,000,000. This proposition being very properly considered extravagant and unreasonable, was promptly rejected by the Secretary of War. He was then urged, in February, 1835, in a further communication from the delegation, to submit the question, without stating any particular sum, to the Senate of the United States, with the assurance that whatever sum might be fixed by that body as a fair equivalent for the territory to be abandoned, they would use their exertions with their countrymen to induce them to accept. In compliance with this earnest assurance, the proposition was submitted, and the Senate returned as their answer, that the Cherokees should receive five millions of dollars.

Subsequent to the declaration of the award by the Senate, an attempt was made by the Executive to induce the delegation to enter into the necessary stipulations for carrying the award into effect, and then, and not until then, as I verily believe, did that delegation dicover that they had no power to close the arrangement without reference to their countrymen. It is necessary to be remembered, that in the course of the communication referring the acceptance or rejection of the award to their countrymen, the delegation again pledged themselves to use their influence to induce them to accept it, laying particular stress upon the principle that it should have due regard to individual rights.

Reference has been made to an attempt subsequently made by the Executive to enter into an arrangement with another delegation, and it has been attempted to be shown that the Executive endeavored to depart from the award of the Senate, by reducing its amount. This was triumphantly answered by the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. GRAHAM,] who showed that it still proposed to adhere to the basis of five millions of dollars. The Executive having failed to induce the delegation to enter into stipulations here, it was adjourned to the Cherokee council to be assembled at Red Clay in October, 1835. Commissioners were sent by the President to that council, under the pledge of Ross and his delegation, that the arrangements should be there made for closing the affair, by carrying out the award of the Senate, by such stipulations as might be agreed upon by the parties. The delegation stood doubly pledged to endeavor to induce their people to accept the award of the Senate, and to enter into the necessary stipulations when met by commissioners in their own country.

But what was the course pursued by John Ross at that council? Notwithstanding his pledge to treat, and to endeavor to induce the acceptance of the five millions awarded by the Senate, he not only declined to treat with the commissioners altogether, but himself presented to the meeting, and procured the adoption of, a protest against the acceptance of the five millions awarded by the Senate.

This violation of the pledge given by John Ross, both before and after the declaration of the award by the Senate, is not left to inference or conjecture, but is placed beyond the possibility of doubt by the statement of an individual of the nation, Elias Boudinot, as respectable as Ross himself, who says, that so far from endeavoring to redeem that pledge, by pressing the acceptance of the award upon his countrymen, Ross himself presented to them and induced them to adopt a protest against that very award.

Mr. Boudinot, in speaking of the proceedings at the meeting at Red Clay in October, 1835, holds the following language:

"At the call of the public crier, the Cherokees, to the number of about one thousand, were collected around a stand, to hear some important communication from their chief. Mr. Ross soon appeared, with a bundle of papers in his hand, which turned out to be the nomination of the twenty delegates, and their powers. They were all written out, ready to receive the assent and the signatures of the multitude, who stood around the chief with indescribable anxiety, to hear some important development, or a suggestion of some plan that would result in their relief. Mr. Ross commenced to read an instrument of writing, drawn in the form of resolutions, to be adopted or approved by the people, granting powers to the twenty delegates, of which number he was one. Those powers, to an English reader, or to a person understanding the English language, may be understood as being ample and sufficient. They authorized the delegation to terminate the difficulties with the United States, by a treaty arrangement, either there or elsewhere. They gave them full power to negotiate, upon what principles they pleased, in any manner they pleased, and for any amount they pleased. In fine, they were unlimited, discretionary powers. So far, it was well enough, only that they were too extensive to be intrusted to twenty irresponsible persons. In addition to the fullest extent of authority which the people had conferred upon their delegation, they were made to declare that they would be bound by all the acts of that delegation. What will be your surprise when I tell you that those resolutions, containing such a declaration, were accompanied with a protest in which the people are made to say, that they will never consent to a treaty made upon the basis of the five millions of dollars!"

Thus did that artful and perfidious chief, John Ross, concentrating in himself Cherokee power and Cherokee will, violate his own voluntary pledge to urge upon his tribe the award made by the Senate at his own pressing solicitation. As Ross had violated his engagements by the proceedings at Red Clay, the commissioners notified the Cherokees that they would meet them at New Echota in December following, for the purpose of drawing up these stipulations. According to that notice given to the nation, a meeting did take place at New Echota on the 29th of December, 1835, and a treaty was entered into with a larger number of delegates than usual on such occasions, which treaty, subsequently modified by the Senate, was ratified by that body on the 23d of May, 1836. We know that the opposers of this treaty have artfully directed public odium against the two individuals by whom its stipulations were arranged with the Cherokees. And why? Because the breath of calumny dares not utter a whisper against the Senate by whom it was ratified. Who are the commissioners usually employed on such occasions? Men of business, acquainted with Indian character, and competent to settle the details of the proposed arrangement. But is their work a treaty? No, sir; far from it. The only power known to our laws competent to make a treaty, is the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. When we remember that there is not another body in the world possessing a higher character for intelligence and integrity than the Senate of the United States, it would seem sufficient to stamp the seal of validity upon any transaction, treaty or otherwise, which had passed the ordeal of its scrutiny. If objections are made to this transaction, it is sufficient answer to say, that it was not the work of an hour, or a day. It was under advisement, from the first to the last, from February, 1835, to the 23d of May, 1836. All the evidence, all the documents referred to in the course of this discussion, all that had been said or written on the one side, all that had been said and written on the other, was under the calm and deliberate consideration of the Senate, previous to the ratification of the treaty. And upon solemnly viewing and reviewing the whole ground, with an eye single to justice to all parties, t received the assent of the Senate. Whatever opinions others have entertained on the subject, it is my solemn conviction that there never has been a treaty entered into by the United States with an Indian tribe, ay, or with any other nation in the world, more fair, just, and honorable to our Government than this. Under what circumstances was this treaty negotiated? It was essentially a transaction directly between the United States and the Government of the Cherokee nation; as much so as a similar transaction could be between us and any one of the Governments of Europe.

Mr. Chairman, who is John Ross? He is the principal chief of the Cherokee nation, so far as the two are concerned; and his friends here who have extolled him—especially his peculiar friend, the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] who has ranked him above every citizen of Georgia—have said enough to convince this committee, and every intelligent man in this country, that he is the impersonation, the embodiment, of the political power and will of the Cherokee nation. In his proposition to refer, and, so far as he was concerned, to abide by the umpirage of the Senate, he placed himself and the Cherokee people under as strong an obligation to this Government as any civilized Government in the world could place itself. Yes, sir, if Great Britain, or France, or Russia, or any other power in the world, had contracted such obligations to the American Government as John Ross contracted, and failed or refused to redeem its pledge, it would furnish just cause of war.

It is said that fraud has been done to the Cherokee Indians. What is fraud? It is wrong, injustice, injury. Let me ask what wrong, what injustice, what injury, has been done to the Cherokee Indians?

Sir, the head of that nation, the Cherokee government, politically the Cherokee nation, bound himself to the Government of the United States to accept five millions of dollars as an equivalent for the abandonment of the territory occupied by them east of the Mississippi, and how has wrong been inflicted by the treaty we are considering? That treaty not only secures the full amount of five millions of dollars, as stipulated by the award of the Senate, but it gives the additional sum of six hundred thousand dollars for the expenses of removal, and certain spoliations prev onsly committed upon them.

Not only this, but it also stipulates to extinguish, for the use of the Cherokees, certain reservations within the country to which they are to emigrate, which will cost some twenty or thirty thousand dollars more. Nor is this all: for it further provides that they shall be authorized to send a delegate to this House, whenever Congress shall make provision for it. Further still, it takes particular care of individual rights, in the mode of applying the funds to be received under it; and I am not quite sure that this does not constitute one of the greatest objections in a certain quarter against it.

Where, then, is the wrong, the injustice, the injury, of which we have heard so much? John Ross, the Cherokee Government, politically the Cherokee nation, not only placed himself under a pledge to the United States to accept the award of the Senate, when the question of the value of the Cherokee country was submitted to that body, but in October, 1835, as I showed to the committee yesterday, addressed an official communication to the Governor of Georgia, desiring him to lay it before the Legislature, and asking forbearance, as all difficulty would be adjusted at the approaching session of Congress, unless he misunderstood the sentiments of the Executive of the United States, about which he could not be mistaken. Georgia did not only forbear to authorize her citizens to enter upon lands in the occupancy of the Cherokees, but passed an act especially to protect them in such occupancy until November, 1836; a period beyond the close of the session within which Ross expected a final adjustment—reserving the power still longer to extend such protection.

In the course of the session referred to by Ross, a treaty was made and promulgated, allowing two years from the 23d of May, 1836, for the final emigration of the Cherokees. Georgia hears nothing more from Ross; but when her Legislature convened in November, 1836, an act was passed still further extending protection to the Cherokee occupants until the 25th of May, 1838. Sir, upon a review of the whole subject, I do not think I go too far when I say that John Ross has been faithless to the United States, faithless to Georgia, and faithless to his own people.

I have already spoken, in the course of these remarks, of the various causes which were brought to operate upon the relations of Georgia and the Cherokee Indians—of the attempted usurpation of the Supreme Court—of the letter of the distinguished Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY] all brought to bear upon us before the formation of the treaty which it has just been my duty to discuss. But, from the showing of Ross himself, in a letter addressed to George Lowry, and published at pages 679 and 680, of Senate document, No. 120, of the present session of Congress, powerful and active influences have been at work, since the ratification of the treaty, to prevent the emigration of the Cherokees, in compliance with their obligations. Ross says, in that letter: "Some of the members say that the President is displeased with the Senate's amendment; and others say, what has been done cannot be viewed as final, until a majority of the whole Cherokee people shall approve it; but all that has been done would be nothing, if the Cherokees would be firm in their minds, and consider it the same as if there was no treaty made and ratified, and be strong in this resolution, and not accept of the provisions of the fraudulent treaty, made by unauthorized individuals." Who were the members that advised this course, I cannot pretend to know; but this I will say, that if the blood of the white man or the Indian shall flow from the unhappy controversy they have so largely contribute to create, theirs will be the responsibility.

The gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] has given to John Ross great credit for his forbearance in restraining his people from acts of violence towards the citizens of Georgia. Does not that gentleman know that the plainest dictate of self-preservation of himself and his tribe imperiously demanded it? Is there any thing magnanimous in the forbearance of the weaker party, when his own existence depends upon it? I think not. I have already expressed my regret at the latitude of discussion indulged on the present occasion, and could very much have desired that it had been confined to the bill immediately before the committee. Upon that bill, a brief discussion upon the contingency of Cherokee hostility, and the necessity of precautionary measures for its prevention would have been sufficient. I shall not now enter into it, but refer to the warning given us by our Indian relations in Alabama and Florida, that it is our imperative duty to be prepared for the worst. If war with the Cherokees should come, we shall be free from the vain regret of not having foreseen or provided against it, and if it should not come, the appropriation now asked, so far as it relates to the future contingency of war, will not be needed, and in due time will fall back into the Treasury. I trust, therefore, for that reason, and further for the reason that, as a representative of Georgia, I insist upon the full and complete fulfilment of the Cherokee treaty, that I am most decidedly opposed to diverting from its original object any portion of the proposed appropriation. I cannot vote either for the amendment offered by the honorable gentleman from Tennessee, nor that offered by order of the Committee on Indian Affairs. I will not, I cannot, consent to recognise any alteration of the treaty in the smallest tittle whatsoever. Sir, I can but express my astonishment and regret at the proposition of the Secretary of War to the Cherokee delegation, essentially to change, as I understand him, the terms of the treaty. That proposition meets my most decided and unqualified disapprobation.

I regret that proposition more on account of the correspondence that preceded it than any thing else. The bare opening a correspondence with John Ross, to a certain extent, placed the Executive in his power, and justified, on his part, the expectation of essential modifications of the treaty, at least in the particulars of time and money. I do not question the benevolence of the motive by which the Secretary was actuated; but cannot doubt that the tendency of this measure has been materially to retard the execution of the treaty.

I know not who may have been his advisers, but, for myself, I would never have consented to any alteration of the treaty whatsoever. Its prompt execution, I have no doubt, was equally demanded by the best interests of the Cherokees, as well as that of the citizens of the States concerned in its immediate execution.

A word or two in reply to the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] and I have done. I will not discuss the question mooted by that gentleman about the castigation of a State by this Government. I need only say to him that "sufficient for the day is the evil thereof," and that when such a contingency shall arise, Georgia will be prepared to meet it as becomes her. Sir, Georgia threatens no one. Her Representatives threaten no one. But whenever the gentleman from Virginia shall set on foot his expedition for the castigation of Georgia, we shall be glad to see the projector the leader also. Georgia has not been unused to the threat of castigation. And whatever the gentleman from Virginia may think of her spirit, she stops only to consider the power of her enemy that she may return him a fitting answer. To the powerful she gives defiance, to the powerless contempt. Georgia has heard the war clang rung out by a President of the United States, without blenching, and is little likely to quail at the report of a pop-gun.

My task is done. Would that it had been done more worthily. But if I have succeeded in wiping out from the fair name of Georgia the blot which ignorance or malevolence has cast upon it, in regard to her Indian relations, I shall have cancelled some small portion of the debt of duty and of gratitude to her, which has been accumulating upon me for more than half a century.

NEW TREASURY BUILDING.

REMARKS OF MR. YELL,
OF ARKANSAS,

In the House of Representatives, June 11, 1838.—On a motion of Mr. HARRISON of Missouri, to lay a motion to reconsider a motion to lay a bill for taking down the walls of the new Treasury building on the table on the 9th instant.

Mr. YELL, on taking the floor, moved a call of the House. He saw it was the determination of many gentlemen to pull down the walls of the Treasury building at all hazards, and he was anxious to know who was disposed to vote for such a proposition.

Mr. S. WILLIAMS of Kentucky and Mr. YELL simultaneously demanded the ayes and noes on the motion for a call of the House, but subsequently withdrew it. The debate was now opened, and Mr. YELL had possession of the floor, when Mr. MERCER of Virginia asked him to give way for a moment till he [Mr. MERCER] could submit an amendment. Mr. YELL nodded assent, and Mr. MERCER submitted his amendment, which was, in substance, that the cost of completing a new Treasury building should not exceed one hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

Then Mr. YELL offered the following as an amendment to the amendment: That no farther appropriation should be made in the erecting of a new Treasury building, until the Treasury was relieved from the debt of ten millions of Treasury notes issued during this session of Congress, &c.

Mr. WISE rose and said that it was a matter of perfect indifference to him what became of the bill; the consideration of the value of a bawbee would not sway him one way or the other in relation to it. For his own part, however, if he had his own way, the new Treasury building should stand as it now stands, till the brief period of time which this Administration had left to it had expired. Sir, (said Mr. WISE,) this Treasury building is the House that Jack built; it is a monument of the inability and stupidity of the Administration; and I am reminded to inquire, where is the malt that once lay in this House that Jack built. It is all gone; the rats have eaten it; and yet we are called upon to vote more malt to be placed in this House that Jack built, to be devoured by the rats and cats of the Administration. Mr. WISE proceeded at some length to play on the nursery tale of the House that Jack built, and closed by expressing and reiterating a perfect indifference as to the fate of the new Treasury building.

Mr. MERCER followed Mr. WISE briefly, and seemed to deprecate the position which his colleague [Mr. WISE] had assumed. He proceeded to descant on the importance of the subject before the House, and was understood to deprecate all attempts to connect the subject with the political topics of the day.

Mr. YELL, from the beginning to the present moment, had been opposed to the project of pulling down the Treasury building, and hoped most sincerely that it would be defeated. As for the amendment that had been offered by the honorable gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MERCER] to limit the expenditure in pulling down and building up, it was not acceptable; and if adopted, and the bill should be passed, what would be the end of it? If the building were commenced, and were half erected, and it were ascertained that it would cost a little more than had been appropriated, would it stop there? Not at all. Every day's experience and practice were sufficient to prove to the contrary.

I, Mr. Speaker, continued Mr. YELL, have had some small experience in these matters, and I know what they lead to; I know somewhat of the extravagance that these limited appropriation bills engender; and every gentleman may know as well as I do, if he will but watch closely the history of the country. Sir, I never knew a limited appropriation to be made that did not, in the end, before its objects were half executed, lead to a quadruple expenditure of money beyond that which was originally called for. Some years ago, when the State which I have the honor to represent, stood in the humble relation of a mere Territory to this Government, she appealed to Congress—the common nursing mother of all the original offspring—and asked for an appropriation of money or lands to enable her to erect a Territorial Government house. If she was then young, she was also modest; and having resolved that, as she could not deem it expedient or sound in policy to ask her nursing mother for too much money at once, she said that if the sum of ten sections of land were awarded, she would be enabled to erect a Government house for the Territory, which would be every way calculated to meet her wants, and establish among her fertile plains and towering hills an edifice that would do honor to her ancient Grecian and Corinthian models. Well, sir, the good natured nursing mother of Arkansas, like a kind and an indulgent parent, or like Cornelia of old, pointed to her offspring in Arkansas, and exclaiming, "These are my jewels!" opened her coffers, and with a liberal hand, and without a moment's hesitation, paid over the money; or, which was the same thing, or better, gave to Arkansas the amount desired in the public domain.

The building was commenced, and Arkansas rejoiced in beholding, in anticipation, a noble structure, from which she was destined to dispense justice and mercy, and enact those laws which wisdom should engender, to promote the happiness and glory of a free people. The edifice had scarcely been commenced, before it was discovered that a little more money would be wanted to complete it. Like good and confident children, relying on the justice and liberality of our nursing mother, they again asked, and the donation was liberally allowed.

Well, sir, the artisans continued their labors; the edifice advanced in size and beauty, when it was accidentally discovered that other "five thousand marks banco" would be needed to carry out the execution of the original plan. Again and again was the nursing mother called on "for other moneys;" and the end of all was, that the Government edifice for the Territorial Government of Arkansas, which originally, according to figures, was to cost only five thousand dollars, (and let me tell you, sir, figures will sometimes lie, and types, too, sir, that print Federal newspapers will now and then utter gross falsehoods,) cost the round sum of sixty thousand dollars!

Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to cast any, nay, not the remotest, censure on the people of the Territory of Arkansas. I am glad that they got the money, for they were entitled to it and as much more as they can get; and my only object has been to show that the moment you make an entering wedge to the public chest, by making limited and specific appropriations, you open a door for almost interminable prodigal appropriations. So much sir, for the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. MERCER,] who is now so ready to limit the cost of the new Treasury building to one hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

Another gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] who has addressed the House on this subject, has been pleased to manifest a total indifference to the fate of the bill. He, sir, says it is "the House that Jack built;" and, for one, he had rather it would stand as a monument of the folly and weakness of this Administration. Mr. Speaker, the candor of that gentleman, in thus openly avowing that he is disposed to convert it into a political hobby, wherewith he can succeed in charging the Administration with profligacy and extravagance, is entitled to all commendation. Sir, the gentleman is right. For some years past that honorable gentleman, and the party with which he associates, has looked anxiously at this "House that Jack built;" and of late, within the last three months, the aspect of the political atmosphere has been such as to lead him to hope and believe that the lapse of a little period would enable him and his friends to take possession of this "House that Jack built," together with all the malt that may be deposited within its bins. He may be mistaken, and it may be well enough to suggest to him the expediency of not over-calculating his prospect of triumph.

Mr. Speaker, it is not to be denied that there are in this House cats and rats—I certainly do not intend to offer any term of reproach or of discourtesy to any gentleman, when I make use of such epithets—who have for years been struggling, and often with too much success, to clutch the malt, and carry it away from this House that Jack built. The fact has been known to all—the late and the present Executive have both been aware of the fact; and if I have any language of censure or of reproach to add, it must be found in a well-grounded complaint that they have not drawn the offending rats from their hiding places, dismissed them from their confidence, and held them up to public reprobation.

Sir, I am opposed to this bill in all its varied phases and ramifications. I protest against its passage; and I will exert myself to defeat it. What, sir, does it contemplate? A grand scheme of profligate expenditure.

Mr. LINCOLN rose, and asked if Mr. Y. would suffer him to propound a single interrogatory?

Mr. YELL. Certainly, sir.

Mr. LINCOLN. I would then ask the gentleman from Arkansas upon what authority he avows that the bill to which he refers is a "grand scheme" of profligate expenditure?

Mr. Y. said that he would answer the gentleman as well as he could, and then went into a recapitulation of sundry facts in connection with the public buildings in Washington; but as this portion of the conversation was held in an under tone, it was not distinctly heard by the reporter.

Having replied, continued Mr. Y. to the satisfaction of the gentleman from Massachusetts, I hope I shall again and again protest against a bill which proposes the waste of four or five hundred thousand dollars, for the purpose of gratifying a mere matter of taste and fancy; and I shall propose that no further appropriation be made to tear down or upbuild the Treasury building, till the Treasury is filled, and the country is disembarrassed of the debt of ten millions of dollars, which now hangs over it. As for the building itself, I believe it to be capable of sustaining all the purposes for which it was originated. Its fitness is a question about which architects may quarrel and differ; but, be that as it may, I am not disposed to tax the people three or four hundred thousand dollars, to enable scientific architects to settle their private quarrels.

Is this the time, sir, for us to think of useless taxation, and useless expenditure? What is our condition? An empty Treasury, a national debt, a vilified credit, a factious party around us, seeking to break down the fortunes of the nation to enable them to creep into power. With all these evils around us, shall it be said that this Administration is found voting away the money of the people to enable a faction to blaspheme its good name, libel its doings, and render it odious? I cannot for a single moment harbor any such supposition.

At a time like this, strict and rigid economy should be the order of the day. Your western and southwestern border is now threatened with the horrors of an Indian war. Already have the war songs of the savage foe broken the silence of he wilds of the West, and, wafted on the gale, have carried alarm and consternation from the sources of the St. Lawrence to the passes of the Sabine. Your defenceless borderers, lured by your promises, and cheated by your visions of ultimate greatness, were induced to emigrate to the wilds of the West; and what do you say to them, when they ask you to interfere in their behalf, and stay the uplifted tomahawk, and scalping knife? You reply, the Treasury is embarrassed; we want the means to assist you; be of good cheer; confide in your own good arms, and rely on the justice of our common God, and we will protect you in all good time, provided we can but obtain the means essential to your wordly salvation! Sir, when the hardy and brave hearts of your western settlers shall realise any of the promises you thus hold forth, the baseness of your ingratitude may be recorded in wrecks of desolated hamlets, in the headless trunks of violated matrons, in the expiring groans and cries of murdered infants, and in the just imprecations of those who have been betrayed and desolated in heart by your ruthless inhumanity and cold blooded mendacity.

And, sir, while these scenes are enacting, you are to be found wasting, with a criminal prodigality, the public money, in erecting stately edifices, and splendid palaces, to entertain the lazzaroni that you would feed and fatten on the pap of the Treasury.

On the North, you are threatened not only with a war with one of the most powerful and civilized nations of the earth, but with domestic rebellion. You have not made any preparation for the defence of the northern border; the West is exposed to savage violence; and until the country is put in an ample state of defence, I, for one, cannot be so reckless to all duties of honor and patriotism, as to be found voting for the erection or destruction of any of your princely palaces.

SUPPRESSION OF INDIAN HOSTILITIES.

DEBATE IN THE SENATE,

THURSDAY, June 7, 1838.

On motion of Mr. WRIGHT, the Senate proceeded to consider the House bill making appropriations for the prevention and suppression of Indian hostilities for 1838, and for the payment of arrearages in 1837.

On ordering this bill to its third reading,

Mr. WEBSTER said he did not know that any amendment would be necessary to the bill, nor did he mean to propose any, neither did he know that he would offer any opposition to the measure. It struck him, however, that public attention should be awakened on the subject. We were now making provision for an army of eight thousand men; what necessity there might be for it, he was not prepared to say. From the latest accounts we had received from that quarter, and he was sensibly rejoiced at such an event, there would be no trouble in relation to a certain matter, for the result of which so many fears were entertained. The transportation charged showed an enormity of expense hitherto unknown in former wars; he was not prepared to say that it was an unnecessary charge; but the enormous expense incident upon it must strike every body. This Florida war, (said Mr. W.) has already cost us over twenty millions of dollars. After all we had heard of the difficulties of the army, the small number of fighting men that ever were together in that country, it did really appear to him that the cost was far greater than need have been. He had no disposition to obstruct this measure; but he should like to know what assurance we had that we should not want some five or six millions more before the affair was ended. The whole matter was such in his opinion, that it ought to receive a thorough investigation from the hands of Congress.

Mr. PRESTON said so large an amount of money had already been expended, that he felt but little disposed to give more without a thorough investigation of the whole subject. An appropriation of million after million had been suffered to go on without any deliberate examination into the matter, until it had cost the country twenty millions of dollars, a sum larger than all our Indian wars put together. When we first entered into it, no human being could have supposed it to cost five millions. The late President never permitted himself to believe that there were ever at any time in the province more than a thousand fighting men; and when the first million was asked for we were astounded; and yet appropriation after appropriation had gone on, until it had reached the enormous sum of twenty millions of dollars, four times the price we paid to Spain for the acquisition of the whole country. The whole subject required a thorough and deliberate examination, which Congress could not do. It should be the action of the Executive, and the inquiry made by competent military men, whose knowledge of such matters rendered them fitter agents for such purposes than any committee of Congress could be.

Mr. P. then adverted to the recall of Gen. Scott, and the court of inquiry instituted into his conduct, when a million only had been expended. That gallant officer, said Mr. P. was censured, and superseded, because he had not brought the war to a close. At that time, the Executive would not hear of the slightest pause in the movement against these Indians, and now millions are lavished without any inquiry into the matter: nobody ever asked "Why this delay?" All went on quietly; the enormous sums expended year after year to subdue a handful of poor, naked savages, without any knowledge of the rules of practised warfare, and nothing, in short, but their own unbroken, unsubdued spirit. The great master chief, Oseola, had been captured, it was true, but how captured, let the history of the times speak. That great and daring man had ended his days on a deserted island, in a state of utter destitution and misery, without any of those sympathies which the high conduct and noble daring of so great an aboriginal chief should have challenged from his captors.

Mr. P. went on to maintain that this great warrior deserved a better fate, and animadverted on the manner of his capture (which was said to have been under a flag of truce,) with some severity. Mr. P. asked, too, why it was that the successor of Gen. Scott had not been called to account for the delay of the war, and for the money so wantonly lavished in the transportation and other matters connected with it.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama rose, and said he had heard the remarks just made by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. PRESTON] with the most profound astonishment. That Senator had not only most extravagantly eulogized the savage chief Oseola, but had, at least by insinuation, cast most injurious reflections upon the gallant officer who lately commanded the army in Florida, whilst, at the same time, he had assailed the Administration on account of the amount of money expended in the prosecution of that war.

Sir, said Mr. C. why this impassioned and high wrought eulogy, of the Senator from South Carolina, upon this savage chief? Was it on account of Oseola's utter disregard of the obligations of the treaty into which, with his tribe, he had solemnly entered, for their peaceful emigration west of the Mississippi, and which he had, but recently before, reaffirmed? Was it on account of his reckless violation of all the obligations binding between man and man, whether savage or civilized, in the murder of General Thompson, the agent of the United States, whose kindness, humanity, and hospitality, he had repeatedly experienced, and even just before the perpetration of that most foul murder? Or was it because he had wielded the unrelenting tomahawk and scalping knife against the innocent and defenceless women and children of Florida, with a cruelty and ferocity even surpassing ordinary savage barbarity? Mr. C. said he knew of no other merits of this savage warrior to call forth such extraordinary panegyric! He said Oseola was as faithless as he was bold and daring; he made promises merely to deceive: he inspired confidence only to violate it; he had, throughout his whole career, so far as we had any knowledge of it, exhibited a degree of treachery unparalleled. When he put on the smile, and made the most solemn assurances of friendship, it was but to delude, and to make more sure the victim of his perfidious artifice. Yet this was the wretch who was to be extolled for his virtues, while the Administration was to be censured, and the gallant soldier of many a well-fought field degraded in the estimation of his countrymen! Sir, said Mr. C. I have no praises to chant to the memory of one whose chief merit consists in giving additional and more abhorrent traits of treachery and cruelty to the character of the savage. He said his sympathies were much more justly due to the brave and patriotic men who had encountered the hardships, the privations, and the perils of the Florida war. Were he to weep, it would be for our gallant countrymen who had fallen, fighting with courage unsurpassed, for the rights and honor of their country.

The Senator from South Carolina had spoken, Mr C. said, of the enormous expense of the Seminole war; but why introduce that topic on this occasion? Had we the data on which to form a correct opinion on the subject? Was there no danger of doing injustice by this loose censure, upon mere conjecture? It should be recollected, said Mr. C. that this tract of country covers four or five degrees of latitude, abounding in interminable swamps, inaccessible hammocks and everglades, unexplored, if not inexplorable. The cost of transportation was a very important item in the expenses of an army. Mr. C. asked who could determine, with the information we had, the amount of this item of expenditure in such a country as Florida? And how could gentlemen, without any personal knowledge of the country, and without having ascertained facts, by any process of investigation, undertake to press on the question, whether the expenditures had been reasonable and proper, or the contrary.

The Senator from South Carolina, Mr. C. said, had alluded to the course of the Executive, in regard to General Scott, and had asked, why it was that his successor had not been treated in like manner.

Mr. C. said, the result of the investigation in the case of General Scott had, in all probability, been one of the principal considerations which rendered the Executive less disposed to institute a similar proceeding in the case of General Jesup. He said, whatever suspicions had been entertained of the mismanagement or delay of the commanding General in the first campaign, they had all been dissipated and removed by investigation, which had resulted in the honorable acquittal of General Scott of all ground of blame or censure. This result had been satisfactory on all sides, so far as he was informed. Was not this calculated to inspire caution and hesitation in regard to his successor? Yet, Mr. C. said, he had no objection to an investigation of General Jesup's conduct. If the Senator believed that could be properly done by a committee of the Senate, he would agree to vote for one—he would readily give him all the facilities of prosecuting the inquiry Mr. C. would not be understood as saying or admitting, however, that this was the most proper place, or a committee of the Senate the most proper tribunal, for the examination or trial of charges against military men. But he had no doubt, if the President were properly assured that such a proceeding was desired, that he would promptly institute it. Then, said Mr. C. let the Senator from South Carolina, and his friends, if they believe there are sufficient grounds to call for the investigation of a court of inquiry, or a court martial, intimate their opinions and wishes to the President; he will, no doubt, promptly respond to the application. But, Mr. C. said, was the passage of this bill to be arrested, because the war might not have been prosecuted with as much energy, as came up to the expectations or judgment of Senators, or because there may have been a prodigal expenditure of money heretofore? He trusted not. It would be recollected that a large portion of the appropriations proposed by this bill, was to discharge liabilities already incurred, and to meet drafts already drawn upon the Treasury by disbursing officers, charged with the Subsistence and Quartermaster's Departments. These were debts already contracted by our authorized agents; and were the public creditors to be required to wait till an investigation could be had, to ascertain whether the campaign had been mismanaged, or whether its expenditures had exceeded the limits of a strict economy? He hoped not. The honor of the country was pledged for the payment of those debts, and it should be promptly redeemed.

Another part of the appropriations proposed by the bill, Mr. C. said, related to the removal of the Cherokees, now in progress, and was indispensable to the success of our operations in that quarter. Major General Scott was now in the field, with an adequate force to effectuate a prompt execution of the treaty, by a removal of that tribe, he hoped peacefully, to the country assigned them west of the Mississippi. Energy and promptitude, Mr. C. said, were demanded by every consideration of economy, expediency, and humanity. He said he was gratified to be able to announce, that the work of removal had already been auspiciously commenced by the commanding General. He had that morning been favored with the perusal of a letter from a highly respectable officer of the General's staff, which contained the very agreeable intelligence that every Cherokee warrior within the limits of Georgia had already been disarmed, and that a general submission in that quarter had been secured without bloodshed. Mr. C. said he had entire confidence in the energy and discretion, the humanity and forbearance, of the commanding General. He had gone to the Cherokee country with proper instructions, and with the proper spirit and sentiments for carrying them out. His instructions did not require him, nor was he disposed, to exercise any unnecessary harshness or severity. He had gone upon this service with the most kind and humane feelings toward those deluded people, compatible with the faithful discharge of his responsible duties. He had already given evidence that such were his views and feelings in his initiatory measures. He had announced to the Cherokees, in a tone of firmness and moderation, that their treaty with the Government required them to remove; that it was his duty to carry that treaty into execution; that he had adequate strength and power to perform it; yet that he was ready to extend to them all the forbearance and indulgence which their circumstances might require, so long as they manifested a disposition to comply with the requisitions of the treaty, in good faith.

Mr. C. said it was only necessary to let General Scott proceed in the performance of his duty, under the instructions with which he had gone forth, without alteration or change, and with the temper which obviously actuated him, and all would be well; in a few short months the great body of this tribe would be on their march to the far West, perhaps, peacefully, and without any waste of human life.

With regard to the additional appropriation of money for the benefit of the Cherokees, although he did not admit it to be justly due, Mr. C. said he would vote for it. He concurred in the views taken of this subject in the report recently submitted from the Committee on Indian Affairs. On the proposition of Ross himself, this body had determined five millions of dollars, in addition to the country they were to be allowed west of the Mississippi, to be not only a just, but a liberal, compensation. Mr. C. said it no doubt exceeded the fair intrinsic value of the country they now inhabited; but he was willing to go beyond the mere measure of justice. If they could be induced to go peacefully, and without coercion—the condition on which they were to have the benefit of the appropriation—he would give it cordially, and consider it sound economy; for, if it became necessary to resort to force, it would doubtless cost the Government an amount far exceeding the sum proposed by the bill, besides the loss of many lives.

Mr. C. hoped the bill would meet the approbation of the Senate in its present shape, and that it would not be retarded in its passage by any remarks which had fallen from gentlemen.

Mr. PRESTON replied at some length to the remarks of Mr. CLAY. He was glad to hear the Senator from Alabama say, that the commanding General in Georgia had made such prompt and energetic arrangements as would be likely to prevent any further disturbance. He thought the matter wisely confided to that gallant and humane officer, who, he knew, would do all that humanity and justice would require in the matter. Mr. P. then went on to comment upon the capture of Oseola by treachery, by detaining him after he had came in under a flag of truce—at least so said the rumors of the day, and the doubts and suspicions entertained, seemed to justify the truth of what had been said. If such were the fact, he [Mr. P.] would not have been his captor for all the wealth in the wide spread universe. He was aware that Oseola was an aboriginal savage, and, as such, entertained the feelings peculiar to such a people; but did he not exhibit all the nobler traits found among that race? was he not brave in fight? was he not full of courage and noble daring, and did not his exploits bespeak his noble and lofty character? Admit that he and his untutored race were cruel in battle; subtle, revengeful, and treacherous, if gentlemen pleased to think so; but did that furnish a justification for our conduct towards that generous chief? If this race of men departed from all the rules of warfare recognised by the code of civilized nations, should we stand justified in the eyes of the world, if we perpetrated upon them such enormities? He thought that no justification could be found for treachery on our part towards the unhappy Seminoles, who were defending, as they supposed, the soil of their ancestors. Mr. P. said we had all been made aware of the difficulties connected with the Florida war. The country was known to be intersected by swamps, by hammocks and savannahs, and all that, and dreadfully unhealthy; still he should like to know how it happened that Gen. Scott should have been recalled at the time he was, when the same difficulties were presented to our soldiers, and reproached for not terminating a war at a cost of less than one million of dollars, while his successor had been permitted to go on from year to year, without subduing these savages, costing the Government the most enormous sums, and yet no inquiry instituted into the matter.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama again rose in reply to Mr. PRESTON. The Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. PRESTON,] Mr. C. said, seemed to justify himself for the reflections cast upon the officer charged with the prosecution of the Florida war, on the ground of the doubts and suspicions which, he said, were abroad; and intimated that they seemed to rise spontaneously in his [Mr. C's] own bosom whilst he was speaking. Mr. C. said he could not account for this latter intimation. He could not understand in what manner he had manifested doubts or suspicions; that, feeling and entertaining none, he had expressed none, and could not imagine from what circumstance the honorable Senator had made such an inference. On the contrary, Mr. C. remarked, that so far as he had been able to judge of the conduct of the late commanding General in the management of the several campaigns under his direction, he had seen nothing to censure. He was not prepared to say General Jesup could have effected more than he had done in such a country as Florida. If that General had erred in any thing, it had been, in the opinion of Mr. C. on the side of humanity, and forbearance toward his savage enemy; certainly not in cruelty or treachery.

Mr. C. said he regretted that the Senator from South Carolina had thought proper to make insinuations unfavorable to the character of an American officer of high grade, merely upon the authority of doubts and suspicions which might have been abroad. Mr. C. remarked that, for his own part, he would never suffer himself to be made the conduit of doubts and suspicions injurious to the reputations of officers or citizens, who were not here to answer for themselves or make defence. He said, upon a moment's reflection, the Senator from South Carolina must be sensible of the dangerous tendency of adopting too hastily the slanders of mere rumor, or the libels of the licentious press of the day. If that course were pursued, and too ready an ear given to such slanderous imputations, who amongst us could stand? Was there, he asked, a member on that floor whose reputation had not been, at some period, injuriously assailed? And if reputation be dear to others, it is doubly so to the soldier, who lives and fights for it, and whose "wealth is honor."

Mr. C. denied that there had been any treachery practised toward Oseola. So far as he understood the facts, the treachery had all been perpetrated on the part of the savage chief. He had been faithless throughout, not only toward the unfortunate and lamented Thompson, but in every movement calling for the confidence of any of our officers.

The Senator from South Carolina, too, had laid much stress upon the opinion he alleged to have been expressed by the late President, that there were not more than six or eight hundred warriors belonging to the Seminole tribe. Now, said Mr. C. if the late Chief Magistrate ever expressed that opinion, it was, of course, founded on mere conjecture. No man could pretend to an accurate knowledge of their numbers, dispersed, as they were, in small bands, over a country of the peculiar character, and such vast extent, as Florida; and, said Mr. C. conjecture in this case, as in all others, must give way to ascertained facts. He said we had killed and taken a much greater number than that supposed, and still there were many warriors in arms, and not yet taken.

But, said Mr. C. if the Senator from South Carolina is not satisfied that the Florida war has been well conducted, let him institute the requisite inquiry in the proper manner, and before a tribunal qualified to judge, and nobody will object. Whether that war has been well managed or not, was not a question necessarily involved in the passage of this bill, and he hoped it would be permitted to pass without further delay.

Mr. STRANGE said he was unwilling to prolong the debate, but, from the course it had taken, he did not feel satisfied to remain silent. Gentlemen on the other side had not announced any purpose to vote against the bill, but, as they said, were desirous to call public attention to the ruinous amount which had been, and was about to be, expended in the Florida war; and he was, on his part, desirous to call public attention to the course taken in this debate. Why did gentlemen wish to call public attention to the large amount expended in the Florida war? Was it with the expectation it would thereby be ascertained that the amount was greater than necessary? Will any portion of the public be more competent than the gentlemen themselves to discover and point out this excess, if it exist? They do not, they cannot, think so. And have they pointed out any single item, and shown it to be excessive? Not one. Their design, then, is obvious enough. They are aware of the startling effect upon the public mind of the expenditure of large sums. They know that the people are naturally and justly jealous upon this subject; and they hope, by merely throwing before them this large amount, accompanied with their own expressions of doubt and suspicion—unaccompanied by specification or calculation—may excite prejudices against the Administration, and especially if those inuendoes and doubts are silently listened to by its friends. So well convinced was the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEBSTER] of the necessity of the appropriation proposed, that he does not attempt an argument against it. He had too much sagacity to place himself in the attitude of direct opposition to it. But true to the principle (almost instinctive) of the Opposition, of never yielding a hearty approval to any thing coming from the Administration, he could not forbear giving the bill a side blow as it passes, although his own vote must ultimately be given in its favor. But he dare go no further than adopt this masterly stroke of Opposition tactics, of merely remarking upon the largeness of the sum, and the importance of public attention being directed to it. The warm imagination of the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. PRESTON,] however, perceives a great many other circumstances which may be thrown in, greatly to thicken the cloud of prejudice against the Administration, and, with less caution than the Senator from Massachusetts, fully discloses the impulse under which they act. With his characteristic ardor he brings before us mere pictures of the fancy, and forces us to contemplate them as living realities, deeply affecting the question under consideration. He presents to us Oseola as a noble aboriginal chief, doing battle in some glorious cause, and suddenly transferred, by the basest treachery, to a desert island, where he is left to perish of starvation. But, sir, the whole picture is one of fancy, and finds no original in historic truth. Oseola was not a noble savage battling for rights, but a miserable half breed, a traitor, and violater of every thing held sacred among all races of men, whether civilized or savage. His heart was warmed in equal proportions by the blood of the white man and the red. His ties were as strong by nature to those whom he butchered and assassinated, as to those whom he lead on to murder and spoliation. His quarrel was unjust, and he prosecuted it in violation of every principle of honor and humanity. We see, then, sir, in whose behalf this effort has been made to excite our indignation. And against whom is it sought to direct it? Against the brave and the patriotic of our own land—against those who have staked life and reputation in the cause of our country? No one has said, however, either here or elsewhere, that treachery or injustice is to be tolerated towards even this heartless and unprincipled savage; and if any have been guilty of it, let them answer it in the proper place, at the proper time, and in the proper manner. But this is neither that time, place, nor manner. Let it be conceded that all that has been said by the Senator from South Carolina is, in sober seriousness, nothing but substantial truth, and borrows none of its tints from the pencil of imagination—does it follow that we shall fold our arms, and suffer our country to be overrun, and our citizens butchered by the compatriots of Oseola? What has the fate of Oseola to do with the question, whether we will tamely submit to savage aggression—whether we will give up a portion of our country to the most ruthless of foes? As little to the purpose, it seemed to him, was another subject adverted to by the Senator from South Carolina, and which had given rise to a long and animated discussion between him and the Senator from Georgia [Mr. LUMPKIN.] These topics could only have been introduced for the reason before stated, of rousing and nourishing in the public mind prejudices against the Administration. In the bill under consideration, there is an additional appropriation proposed on account of the Cherokee treaty. Now no one, I believe, is opposed to this appropriation, but it is made the pretext for inflicting upon the Administration a severe castigation for some supposed improprieties in relation to the execution of this treaty. A message sent to the Senate and House of Representatives, a few days ago, upon that subject furnishes the main, perhaps the only, subject of complaint. Now, as this subject had been introduced, he felt bound to contribute his mite towards placing the Administration upon what he conceived to be the proper ground, and the more so, as he might have conduced, in some slight degree, to the present misapprehension. Let us inquire, then, in the first place, what are the complaints against the Administration growing out of this message. They are,

First. A design to procrastinate the execution of the treaty.

Secondly. Holding out to the Cherokees false hopes of procrastination, and thereby producing ruinous mischiefs.

Thirdly. Indirectly condemning the treaty, and censuring those who voted for it.

Now the statement of these charges, and the proof of them, are two very different things; but such is the frailty of the human mind, that it is as much prone, according to the circumstances in which it may be placed, to believe things without proof, as to reject those which rest upon the strongest testimony. But it surely behooves a grave legislative body not to send forth, with the currency which its sanction gives, imputations against the Executive not only without being proven, but when the whole testimony is directly the other way. Now, sir, said Mr. S. I venture to say, in sending the message, (of which I, among others, complained, hearing it in the imperfect manner which we always do such things from the Clerk's desk,) the Executive not only did nothing wrong, but could not with propriety have acted otherwise, under all the circumstances. This is the opinion to which he had come after that deliberate perusal of which, having it in a printed form, had afforded him an opportunity. It is true a treaty was made with the Indians in 1835, which they were bound to fulfil, and of which the Government might have enforced the fulfilment. But in the very fact of entering into treaty with them, we had treated the Indians as a quasi independent power, upon whom we could not act individually, but collectively. If, then, they did not choose to execute the treaty, we had no mode of enforcing it but by making war upon them. A high responsibility rests upon every Government in its dealings with independent powers, which there is no eluding. The eyes of the world are upon them, and there are two sets of public opinions, against neither of which can they with safety or propriety act. Their acts must not only be based upon principles of abstract justice, but they must be such as will be recognised as being applicable to the particular case by public opinion at home, and public opinion abroad. Now, sir, in our dealings as a nation with the aboriginal tribes, we are forced to look back upon the past history of our intercourse with them. We must not forget that they were the early possessors of every foot of soil we now occupy, and that in establishing their possession, our forefathers were forced to make might the standard of right. A change of circumstances has produced great changes in the conduct of their successors; but a heavy debt to humanity has been transmitted by them to us, which we can never hope to pay; but it imposes upon us the obligation of manifesting in our dealings with the Indians not only the most rigid justice, but the most enlarged liberality; not only abstinence from unprovoked outrage, but great forbearance under even aggravated wrongs. Such is public opinion, both at home and abroad. In this state of things, a treaty has been made with the Cherokee Indians, which, so far as I am informed and believe, is quite as formal and obligatory as treaties with savages can usually be made; but yet its validity is doubted by great numbers of both nations; and a very large portion of the weaker power complains that it has been overreached; that if the treaty must be enforced, humanity demands that they shall be allowed more time in relinquishing the homes of their fathers, and that such additional pecuniary provision should be made, as that, all private claims being paid off, and the expense of removal discharged, the sum originally contemplated, to wit, five millions of dollars, should be left to them, to recommence their national existence in their new home beyond the Mississippi. Under all these circumstances, how did it behoove the Government to treat these applications? Suppose the Secretary at War had stopped his ears, and turned his back upon their complaints; or, having listened to them, suppose he had stoically told them, "here is the bond—this is the treaty—it must be literally fulfilled. What is your distress to the people of the United States? You have made your bargain, and you must abide by it. Ruin may overtake you individually and collectively; but your Great Father, as you have been wont to call him, cares not for it; it touches not the hearts of your white brethren. Literal execution of the treaty or extermination is the alternative." What would have been the verdict of public opinion? A tumultuous roar of disapproval would have resounded through all lands; and the welkin might well have rung with the shout of triumph which the Opposition would have sent up." "This weak, ruthless, tyrannical Government, it would have been said, would have been too cowardly to have made war upon the strong; but see how it crushes the weak into the dust! Behold how needlessly the blood of our own citizens has been shed, and the most civilized of the savage tribes annihilated, that its purposes may be accomplished!" A response, then, was necessary, and that response must be dictated by kindness and humanity, and it must meet distinctly the several suggestions of the suppliants. The first is, as to time. And upon that point, the reply is, this Government possesses no power to act. We have not the language of the suppliants before us, but there is no doubt they represent, in the most glowing colors, the miseries impending over them if their flight must be sudden; and this picture was presented in all the seeming sincerity of anticipated distress. To such an appeal, how could a feeling man return the cold response, "I have no power to help you," without throwing in some word of consolation, without pointing to the only remaining hope, however faint and distant it might be? If, said the Secretary, you cannot remove within less than two years, I know the generous hearts with whom you have to deal; and if the ruinous consequences which you depict are likely to follow from an earlier removal, I know they will relieve you. And could not any citizen in this country have ventured to give the same assurance? might he not with confidence have said, There is no State in this Union which will not suffer some temporary inconvenience to its citizens, rather than thousands of fellow-creatures shall be involved in irremediable distress and ruin? But the Secretary believed in his conscience, as every other man who knows any thing upon the subject believes, that the story was an artful appeal, intended for effect; and that there would be no necessity for this exercise of liberality on the part of the States concerned. But he was not at liberty to say so. A tale of sorrow falls upon a benevolent mind, and whether true or false, its first effect is touching, and the answer is according; and it is left to experience and reason to test its truth.

Upon the point of a further provision in money, the answer of the Secretary finds an echo in every bosom, and has met the concurrence of the appropriate committees in the two Houses of Congress. This branch of the subject must necessarily be laid before Congress, and the question is, whether he ought to have kept back from it what he had said in relation to removal? If he had done so, we can well imagine, what charges of fraud, cowardice, duplicity would have been brought against him. He did right in laying the whole document before Congress, and would have done wrong had he suppressed any part of it. He gave no assurance that time for removal would be allowed, and disclaimed all authority to do so. He promised to recommend further appropriations of money: he has made that recommendation. It has received the sanction of both committees and of one House of Congress, and will doubtless receive that of the other.

But the Senator from South Carolina, with a warmth and indignation which seemed to him to be entirely out of place, says this message is a condemnation of the treaty, and a censure upon those who ratified it. No such condemnation or censure could, he thought, be found any where but in the imagination of the Senator himself. The message proposes no annulment of the treaty; but, on the contrary, insists upon its fulfilment; and for reasons therein stated, proposes a donation of a further sum for the preservation of peace, and insuring the fulfilment of the very treaty of which condemnation is imputed. He regretted having dwelt so long upon this topic, but having hastily misconceived the drift of the message, and having become convinced of his error, this explanation was due. But none of these things have aught to do with the subject. All agree the further appropriation for the Cherokees to be right. And with respect to the appropriation for the Florida war, the matter was as simple as could be, and it was mainly to disencumber the subject of foreign and exciting matters, which had been improperly complicated with it, that he had risen. Is any one here prepared to give up the war, and surrender the peninsula of Florida to the Indians and negroes now in possession of it? If there be any one, he may, of course, consistently vote against the appropriation. But he, for one, was not so disposed. He would never consent to see this Government withdraw its protection from any portion of its citizens. Gentlemen had said that Florida had cost much more to defend it than it had to acquire it. Be it so. There was a time when the cry rang through this nation, "Millions for defence—not a cent for tribute." He hoped that would always be the cry; and he, for one, would never consent to yield to force one foot of our soil, though it might take millions to defend it. The object of the appropriation, then, is legitimate, is indispensable? Is the appropriation proposed too large? We raise committees in both Houses upon the respective subjects of legislation, that they may give to them their particular attention, and advise the whole body as to the result of their investigations. This subject has been under the consideration of the Committee of Ways and Means in the other House, and the Committee of Finance in this, and the sum proposed has met their approbation. If gentlemen think themselves more competent to decide, better informed upon the subject, let them show themselves so, and it will be well. Let them show us by figures (for they are bound to figure as well as we) that a less sum will answer, and they will deserve well of their country. But no attempt is made to show the sum too large; and he would feel himself safe in following the guidance of the appropriate committees.

But gentlemen ask for a new datum. They ask us to count the number of the Seminoles, and then, I suppose, to ascertain how much it will take per head to get rid of them, and thus find the proper amount of appropriation. "Hic labor, hoc opus est." This is the very difficulty. Let the gentlemen count the flight of birds passing above them. To count the savages we must catch them; and if caught, the necessity for counting would be over.

They tell us further, that the war has been more expensive than it should have been, because at its commencement it was considered a very trivial affair; that the foe was contemptible and his conquest easy. That is probably the very secret of the difficulty. Had we not underrated the strength of our adversary, and put forth more force at once, we should probably have finished the war much sooner. England committed a similar mistake in her first assaults upon the e colonies, and both England and ourselves were guilty of a like fault in the last war; and if gentlemen wish a prolongation of any war, they can adopt no plan more effectual than stinting or delaying the supplies of each successive year. It is reproachfully asked why the system which brought one officer to public examination, who did not terminate the war, has not been followed up, and his successor brought to examination also? Without going farther into the subject, an answer may be found in the result of that very examination. It resulted in the conviction that the foe was more formidable than had been supposed; that he had a pestiferous climate warring on his side, and was surrounded by natural defences and entrenchments impregnable to civilized man. But, sir, I institute no invidious comparisons among the brave officers of our army. I cannot, however, forbear remarking that the officer against whom I suppose this inquiry to be more personally levelled, has succeeded in capturing about two thousand savages. Others have doubtless done well; but whether as well, I will not undertake to decide.

Believing, then, that the objects of these appropriations are just and proper, and their amounts do not exceed the dictates of prudence, the question seems to me to be answered whether the bill should be ordered to a third reading.

Mr. LUMPKIN then addressed the Senate, but as his speech has already been given, it is not deemed necessary to repeat it here.

Mr. L. was replied to by Mr. PRESTON.

Mr. WHITE went into the subject in a speech of considerable length, in which he affirmed his entire belief in the validity of the Cherokee treaty, and went into a full and detailed statement of the connection between the General Government and Georgia in relation to the extinction of the Indian title in that State. Mr. W. complimented Georgia on her long patience and forbearance, after she had ceded to the United States Government that portion of her most valuable territory which now constituted the rich and productive States of Alabama and Mississippi.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama said he hoped when the question was taken it would be by ayes and noes; which being assented to,

Mr. SOUTHARD intimated his intention to vote for the bill, which, in some measure, had now become necessary through the mismanagement of those entrusted with the affairs of Government; but he would take occasion to say, that he believed both treaties had their origin in fraud. We had now paid away twenty-one millions on account of a feud, which, had it been properly looked into by those in power, would have saved to the nation the blood spilt, and money expended. With regard to what had been said on the capture of Oseola, the proof rested on the hand writing of the accused. The whole conduct of the war could not be approved by those who felt for the honor of their country.

Mr. S. then glanced at the Cherokee treaty, and defended John Ross, whom he declared to be one of nature's strong men; and if he had erred at all, it was from the attachment to the people of whom he was the chief.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama rose in reply: He said, after what had fallen from others who had spoken on this occasion, in reference to the communication of the Secretary of War, addressed to John Ross and others, it was due to himself to explain his own position. He could not say, as the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. STRANGE] had done, that he now took a different view of the language employed by the Secretary of War from that which he had taken when that communication was first laid before the Senate. He still thought the import of its language justified the construction he then placed upon it. But, he said he had no objection to the effect and meaning of that communication, as construed by the Secretary himself, in his letter to Gen. Scott, since published. If that construction should be adhered to, he was entirely satisfied, and thought there could be no well founded complaint from any quarter.

Mr. C. said, as he had risen, he would take occasion to make a remark or two in reply to the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. SOUTHARD,] who had just spoken. As that Senator had intimated his intention to vote for the bill, he could not see the propriety of his observations. That Senator had thought proper to state his belief that both the treaties with the Seminoles and Cherokees were fraudulent, and without any of the sanctions of a treaty.

Mr. C. said, as the validity of neither of those treaties was involved in the passage of the bill under consideration, he could see no motive in giving utterance to such sentiments, but to feed and nourish that spirit of fanaticism which, unfortunately, was abroad in a portion of this country, and, under professions of philanthropy, had been, for some years past, seeking the universal guardianship of this wide-spread confederacy. One while, Mr. C. said, those influenced by this spirit had been found intermeddling with the transportation of the mails on Sunday, and characterizing it as a national sin, which would bring us under the displeasure of the Almighty. At another time they were interposing in behalf of the poor Indians, and essaying to take care of the national honor! At another they were impelled, by pure religion, to enlist in the cause of the poor negroes, to deprive us of our property guarantied by the Constitution, and involve us in all the horrors of a servile war.

And now, again, they have directed their attention to the poor Cherokees; and, under the professed object of preserving them, and defending their supposed violated rights, these philanthropic christians (good souls) were ready to involve us in another Indian war, although it might carry death and misery into many families of the white inhabitants, and result in the almost total extermination of the Indians themselves. Such, Mr. C. said, was the character and tendency of this universal benevolence, which was not content with the management of its own affairs, but must take care to direct and control those of every body else.

But, sir, said Mr. C. on what ground does the Senator from New Jersey undertake to pronounce these treaties fraudulent? Mr. C. said there had been two treaties with the Seminoles—one at Payne's Landing, in Florida, and the other west of the Mississippi. In regard to the first, he was aware that a similar charge had been elsewhere made; but he had since seen a publication over the signature of the high-minded and honorable man by whom it had been negotiated, inviting and defying investigation.

[Here Mr. SOUTHARD interposed, and said he did not intend to apply the charge of fraud to the treaty of Payne's Landing—that his remarks only had reference to that subsequently made west of the Mississippi.]

Mr. C. resumed, remarking that he was glad so much of the charge had been withdrawn. He was sure that the high character of the individual by whom that treaty had been made, would be a sufficient protection, amongst those who knew him, against the imputation of any thing like fraud or dishonor.

As to the treaty subsequently made west of the Mississippi, Mr. C. said he saw as little ground for censure. He had not had time to examine the subject with much attention; but, if he did not misremember, the treaty of Payne's Landing stipulated that a special delegation should be sent west to explore and examine the country contemplated for the future residence of the Seminoles; and, upon the contingency that this delegation were satisfied with the country, and the Creek tribe were willing to receive them, the treaty was to be fully carried into effect by the removal of that tribe. The delegation did go west of the Mississippi, and did examine the country; and by a treaty then made with the commissioners of the United States—Messrs. Montfort Stokes, former Governor of North Carolina; Henry L. Ellsworth, now Commissioner of Patents, and the Rev. John F. Schermerhorn—ratified and confirmed the former treaty, in all its essential provisions. Those commissioners were appointed by the Government for the adjustment of our Indian affairs west of the Mississippi; employed in settling limits amongst the several tribes in that region; and as he had never heard any complaint that they had transcended the powers confided to them, and as the treaty had been ratified, he thought it fair to presume that they had acted on ample authority. So, Mr. C. said, the Seminoles had given the sanction of their acquiescence far nearly three years afterwards, and, as he understood, had reaffirmed the treaty by a new stipulation to emigrate. It seemed to Mr. C. that these circumstances were a sufficient answer to the charge of fraud, and want of authority, on the part of the negotiators.

Well, said Mr. C. what were the facts in regard to the treaty with the Cherokees? Commissioners of unquestionable respectability had been appointed on the part of the United States, to go into the Cherokee country and negotiate with the tribe on their own soil. Besides the large and respectable delegation of the tribe, it was well understood an unusually large number of the Cherokees was present at the negotiation, and gave the treaty their sanction. Since then, the treaty had not only been ratified by the votes of two-thirds of the Senate, but it has also received the sanction of the House of Representatives, by its co-operation in the enactment of laws to carry it into effect. How, then, could the Senator from New Jersey, with a knowledge of the facts stated, feel justified in saying he believed this treaty was without any of the sanctions of an instrument of that character? Sir, said Mr. C. it has the highest sanction that can be given to any treaty; it has the united sanction of both branches of Congress; and to say the contrary, when the validity of the treaty is not necessarily involved, I repeat, is but to nourish the michievous spirit of fanaticism, without the possibility of producing any good effect whatever.

Mr. C. concluded by saying he was far from desiring to consume the time of the Senate unnecessarily, but he had felt called upon to make this brief reply to the remarks of the Senator from New Jersey, as he thought they reflected injuriously upon the character of our country, and were calculated to keep alive the discontent known to exist in reference to these treaties in some portions of the Union. He hoped the vote would be taken, and the question put at rest.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed by a unanimous vote.

FINANCES OF THE GOVERNMENT.

DEBATE IN THE SENATE,

FRIDAY, June 8, 1838.

Mr. WRIGHT, From the Committee on Finance, to which was referred the resolution of the Senate of the 1st May last, directing them to take into consideration certain provisions of the deposite law of 1836, made a report thereon, and moved that, without reading, it be printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. WEBSTER observed that he had looked over the report, and concurred with the chairman that it would be very proper that it should be printed. A majority of the committee, Mr. W. said, were of opinion that it was competent for the Secretary of the Treasury to reappoint, as banks of deposite, such banks as had been appointed under the deposite law of 1836, but which had, since that time, suspended specie payments; but the committee were further of opinion that, as the law now stood, it was not competent for the Secretary of the Treasury to select and employ any banks, which, since that time, had issued and paid out notes of a less denomination than five dollars. There was no doubt of the correctness of this opinion, because such was the provision of the law. As to the other matter referred to the committee, the expediency of repealing so much of the law as forbids the employment of banks that have issued and paid out notes less than five dollars, the committee came to the conclusion that it is necessary to make some modification of the law, by fixing another day beyond which they shall cease to issue notes less than five dollars; and, in the mean time, permit their notes to be received for the dues of the Government. But the committee were opposed to an unconditional repeal of the provision referred to. The majority of the committee entertained the opinion that if, in this respect, some provision became necessary, it was not expedient for this House to act, till the final vote on the Independent Treasury bill in the other House shall be ascertained. Entertaining different views on this subject, he gave notice that before the decision of the other House is presented, he should ask leave to introduce a bill making further provision for the deposite of the public money; not that he supposed it possible for such a bill to receive the decision of both Houses at this session, but because he believed it necessary to act in some way. It was not enough to say that the Senate had already acted on the subject. It had taken one of the provisions of that bill, (the Independent Treasury,) and passed it into a law by a subsequent act of legislation, which showed that those who voted for it must have been under a doubt whether the House would act on the bill referred to at this session. He could not take his seat on this occasion, without expressing his regret that, after the expiration of three months since the passage of the Independent Treasury bill, there was some disposition to revive it. He believed that for the last three weeks the business of the country was going on well—the country was recovering from the depression under which it had long suffered, commerce was reviving, and confidence was returning. The banks of New York and others had resumed specie payments, and there was a prospect of resumption by those of Philadelphia and the cities south of it. But if this Independent Treasury bill is revived, it will prevent the resumption of specie payments, and interrupt the returning prosperity of the country. To bring it up now, after it was considered by the country as defunct, would no nothing else but create new alarm and discouragement. He sincerely hoped that those who had the administration of the Government of the country, would avail themselves of that policy which some philosopher called masterly inactivity. As things were going on well, it could not but be regretted that there should be an attempt to revive that bill, when even the attempt itself must necessarily produce alarm. It was his purpose to ask leave to introduce a bill to render more effectual the resolution which was passed the other day.

Mr. NORVELL protested against what had been said by the Senator from Massachusetts in relation to the repeal of the Treasury Circular, as connected with the Independent Treasury bill. Many Senators, on this side of the hall, in voting for the section introduced into that bill repealing the Specie Circular, had so voted with reluctance, because they did not consider the two subjects properly or necessarily connected; but the question of repeal being directly presented to them, they were bound to sustain it. When the separate joint resolution on the subject subsequently came before us, we voted for the repeal with pleasure. We considered the Specie Circular partial and sectional in its operation, and as having ceased to have any beneficial effect. It never had any such effect, except for four or five months, in checking inordinate speculations in the public lands. But its repeal did not impair the objects or policy of the Independent Treasury; and it was new to him that the intended action of the other House upon that subject was to be considered a matter of surprise, either by the honorable Senator, or by any one else. Certainly no friend of the measure had ever, for one moment, supposed that Congress would adjourn without a direct decision upon it, in one way or the other. Without, however, indulging in any further observations, he would call for the reading of the report.

Mr. WRIGHT observed that he was not disposed to excite a debate on this matter, but he could not discharge what he believed to be his duty, and fail to reply to some of the remarks of the Senator from Massachusetts. What he had to say would not be in reference to the proposition the gentleman had given notice of his intention to introduce, but in reference to a sort of surprise he expressed that a measure which he referred to, and which having passed this body, had been sent to the other House, and was there pending, would be taken up and acted on. The gentleman spoke of the taking up of this measure, and acting on it by the other House, as something new and surprising. He knew, Mr. W. said, that there had been an attempt, vast and persevering in its character, to inculcate the belief throughout the country, that this measure was ended for the present, or to use the language of a gentleman on that floor, that it was dead and buried. He was not able to contradict the allegation, but he knew that when it was first made here, he expressed his own dissent, and declared that he had never renounced the hope that the other branch of Congress would, before the end of the session, consider and decide on that subject with which the feelings and interests of the country were so closely connected. He had therefore hoped that any movement respecting it would not have been represented here as altogether new and surprising. He knew of no expectations that an effort would be made here to consider that measure. He himself had no intention to make such an effort. He also knew that by a large number, a disposition had been entertained that it should not be again considered in either House. But it was not right that it should be represented any where, that that measure was ended, and not again to be considered; that to take it up and act on it in the body in which it was pending, was new and surprising. If such were the expectations of the Senator from Massachusetts, he had drawn them from a source not known to him, [Mr. W.] He could not consent to sit by while the Senator was making such allegations, without expressing his dissent to them. Again the Senator told them that within a few weeks the country was springing into new life, that prosperity was returning, and business reviving, but that this Administration had started up a measure which had thrown them back again.

We have seen that measure the subject of constant agitation and unreasonable anxiety; and yet they were told that it was dead and buried, and that the attempt to revive it would produce alarm, embarrassment, and distress. It was against such inferences that he was compelled to speak. He had heard it announced from the same quarter, that in consequence of the passage of a measure to which some importance was attached, a resumption of specie payments was soon to commence by the Bank of the United States; and that fact had been announced by their great ally himself. Was that ally to recede so soon from his purpose, and that, too, in consequence of the apprehended attempt of this Administration to revive the Independent Treasury bill? If this proclamation is not to be carried into effect; was it intended to lay the blame at our door? The Senator knew that all those who advocated and supported this Independent Treasury bill here had never abandoned it; and he should not be surprised that they still advocate it, and represent them as bringing up as something new that which had been consigned to the tomb. He ought not to represent it as consigned to the tomb till it is really so. At present, said Mr. W. we do not agree that it is.

Mr. WEBSTER. The gentleman says if I flattered myself that the subject was not again to be agitated, that I have been in great error. I certainly never flattered myself that they would have ceased at any time to urge its passage, if they thought they could have done so. It is part of their system—part and parcel of their avowed policy. When I state that it was supposed the matter was at an end, it was not of ourselves that I spoke, where we were in daily habits of conversation in relation to these topics; but I spoke of the country, where, I undertake to say that the impression is general, ay, very general, that the subject would not be likely again to excite and agitate the country. And, sir, let me ask if I have not very good foundation on which to rest such an opinion even for myself? Has it not been continually the party topic of the times? Was it not received from the Chief Magistrate at a former and the present session? Has it not twice passed this house, the last time by a majority of two votes, and been sent to the other House, where it has slept a solid sleep for ninety days? And was it likely to suppose that, at this advanced state of the session of six months, and near the time of adjournment, when Congress sits even longer than usual—was it not natural, I say, to suppose that it was abandoned? Certainly, nothing was more natural than to suppose that there was no further disposition to disturb it. Mr. W. then went on to show, that, so far as they were able to judge from their correspondence, from the articles of the daily presses, etc. that the matter was at an end, and would no longer excite and agitate the country. The public had acted on the belief that we had fallen back on the deposite law. Mr. W. concluded by expressing a hope that the subject might not again be made the means of agitating the country, at a time when the late action of the Government had already begun to be beneficially felt, in the reviving business of commerce and trade.

Mr. WRIGHT understood now the difference between the Senator and himself. It was not here, then, that the impression existed that an attempt would not be made to take up the measure pending in the other House, but the impression existed abroad. He did not know but that strong efforts had been made to produce that impression; but in a paper of the Opposition where he had seen it declared that the measure was dead and buried, and could not succeed, he had also seen the declaration that it would pass. Now he did not know but this last declaration was a better move than the other, or whether both were not made for the purpose of producing a conviction on the public mind unfavorable to the measure. But the Senator knew that when the vote to which he alluded was taken in the other House, that the House was thin—that there were some twenty or thirty members absent. The Senator knew also, as well as he did, that from that time to this there had been a strong controversy in the public mind as to what would be its ultimate fate.

Mr. BENTON said the conversational debate which had taken place appeared to him to be irregular and unparliamentary. It is out of order to call in question the action of the House of Representatives upon any subject, and to make remarks which, even by implication, reprimand or threaten that House. The remarks of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER,] seem to imply a reprimand upon the House of Representatives for proposing to revive, as he calls it—to revive the bill for the divorce of Bank and State; and he attributes to that revival the infliction of distress and alarm upon the country. Upon this idea of revival of a bill in the House of Representatives, there is certainly some remark to be made. Has the Divorce bill ever been dead in that body? and if it was dead, have not the house a right to revive it? and if they revive it, has the Senate a right to animadvert upon them in the nature of a reprimand, or of a threat, for so doing? How stands the fact? Has the Divorce bill ever been dead in the House of Representatives? Certainly not. They have two such bills there; one of their own, which has never been acted on, and one from the Senate, which has been laid upon the table. Now it is perfectly competent to the House of Representatives to act upon either of these bills. Neither of them are dead; and to take them up is merely to go on with existing bills, and not revive dead ones. If gentlemen, who have carried on a system of boasting that the Divorce bill was dead, perhaps to make it die—if these gentlemen have deceived themselves, or others, it is their own misfortune, and no cause of censure upon the House. The Divorce bill has been in that House, as sent from us, three months; but how many other bills have been there as long, or longer? The army bill has been there longer, the pre-emption bill also, the steamboat explosion bill likewise; and the graduation bill nearly as long; none of these measures are considered dead; nor can it be called a revival when the House shall take them up and act upon them. I know not whether the Divorce bill will pass the House of Representatives. I never remark upon such a subject in this chamber. I have seen gentlemen of the Opposition, for months past, proclaiming on this floor that that bill was dead and buried in the House of Representatives. I deemed all such speculation on the fate of bills in the House of Representatives, to be unparliamentary and irregular, and never would join in any such remarks, even to express a contrary opinion, if I felt it.

Mr. B. said this was a day to be marked in the history of the times; this Friday, the 8th day of June, was a day to be remembered; for it was a day on which had commenced, and from which time would go forward, a new war from the political part of the banks against the Government and the country. The Treasury Order of July 11th, 1836, was rescinded. Scarcely was it done, when a billet from the president of the miscalled Bank of the United States appears, addressed to an old correspondent of the other House, in which the writer gives the public to understand that the scales had been knocked from his eyes; that he could now see what he could never see before; and that the vision brought to light by this second sight was the immediate resumption of specie payments, and the preservation of a good currency. Now, sir, the insignificance of the cause for such great events struck every body. The Treasury Order had been inoperative for a year! it had been the same as dead since the 10th of May, 1837. Besides that, the Senate had passed a bill which contained a clause for its recision three months before, and the passage of that clause, in some form or other, was known to be absolutely certain in the House of Representatives. That order was then no longer a stumbling block, even to the blind, to the resumption of specie payments; its entire recision was nothing but an act on paper, the fact of inoperation already existing. Yet this most insignificant circumstance is seized upon by the president of the miscalled Bank of the United States to back out from the famous non-resumption letter which placed that bank at the head of a confederation of insolvent and political banks, so much to its honor both in Europe and America! A pretext might be wanting to retreat from that letter, or to enable the writer to take a new hold upon his subject, and bottom his non-resumption on a more tenable ground. It was a miserable pretext, and laughed at by every body. Fair, open resumption, if resumption was intended, would have been much better. But it would seem, from this day's proceedings, that resumption was not intended; that a shifting of ground only was wanted; that a quarrel with the Government was the thing desired; and that non-resumption was to be the policy still, but based upon a new ground, and that ground to be founded in the conduct of the Government itself. I look upon the speech of the Senator from Massachusetts this day as a revelation from the miscalled Bank of the United States! as a proclamation that she does not mean to resume! and as a declaration that she is going on to form her league of non-resuming banks; to revive the old panic scenes of 1833–35; to make all the mischief that she can; and to charge the whole upon the Independent Treasury bill, or the new Treasury Order, or both; and so make war upon the country again for the purpose of governing the elections and forcing the Government to submit to her. This is the aspect under which the scenes of this day present themselves to my mind; and let the events tell how far they are true. Certain I am that the events of this day furnish new and potent reasons for the passage of the divorce bill. It presents us a parcel of banks making our action the cause of their resumption, or non-resumption, of specie payments; pretending to live, or die, as we do this or that. The import of what they present is, that they cannot resume if the Federal Government is separated from them; and certain it is that the Government cannot live if it is connected with them. They make their own ability to resume to depend on their conjunction with the Federal Government: now what is this but to admit their insolvency and to require the Government to supply them with credit to go on? It is a confession of insolvency, if it was true, and a pretext for non-resuming if it was not; and, in either event, furnished new and strong reasons for the passage of the divorce bill. It is not safe for the banks to depend upon the Government; nor for the Government to depend upon the banks. Divorce, eternal divorce, should be the word; and so fully am I convinced of the necessity of that divorce, that I stake my political existence upon it, and I am ready to sink with it. If that measure goes down, I am ready to go down with it.

Mr. WEBSTER said it might appear strange to the Senate, that he should rise again on this question, but he could not allow the member who last addressed them, or any other, to indulge in such a course of perversion of remarks made by him without notice. He did not say, nor intend to say one word disrespectful to the other House. The gentleman called his reference to the delay of action by that body on a particular measure irregular and unparliamentary; and on his denial that there were any such irregularity, the gentleman boiled over as tempestuous as Etna or Stromboli, with smoke, heat, and lava. What did he say? He said that the agitation of this question again in Congress would necessarily produce agitation in the country. He said that he believed that a new attempt to carry that question would agitate the country anew; and the gentleman came out with a warm and zealous vindication of the other House, as if it was assailed. "Non tali auxilio eget"—the House did not want the gentleman's assistance; it could take care of itself; it knew him, and the denunciations and the volcanic eruption of the gentleman would produce no effect. Every body knew that he was speaking of this measure as one that had already agitated the country, and therefore he was warranted in saying that an attempt to take up again would agitate the country anew.

Mr. BENTON said if the Senator from Massachusetts had said nothing to threaten the House of Representatives when he was first up, he had certainly done so now. He had charged that House with agitating the country, and preventing the revival of business, by reviving the Divorce bill. Agitation is the word he used; agitating the country, and preventing the revival of business, is the accusation which he prefers. And has it come to this, that here, on the floor of the Senate, the term agitation is to be applied to the regular and Constitutional action of the House of Representatives, on questions depending before them? and are they to be deterred from proceeding with a bill by being stigmatized on this floor as agitators, and charged with doing mischief to the country? Sir, we have seen agitators assembling in public meetings, adopting panic resolutions, sending on distress committees with distress petitions, to this city; all done by self-constituted assemblies, acting under bank impulsions; and we have seen all these agitators extolled and applauded on this floor; and now when the Constitutional representatives of the people proceed with their regular duties, they are to be called agitators, and to be charged before hand with creating that distress in the country, by agitating measures here, which the political bank party mean to create for their own purposes of mischief, and then falsely charge upon the measures of the Government. This is what they have done before; this is what they are preparing to do again; and this is what these preliminary attacks upon the House of Representatives are to cover over, and to excuse in advance. Sir, it it time for us to speak out, and to call things by their right names; it is time for us to strip off the masks, and to exhibit the mischief makers in their odious deformity. Here is an attack in advance upon the House of Representatives, to deter it from going on with its business; and this attack comes from a class of political banks which have been making mischief ever since 1832, and falsely charging their own work upon the Government. These banks must be met with the language that is due to their conduct; they must be discriminated from the business institutions, and the stamp of reprobation must be fixed upon them. They and their followers must be detected and exposed; they must not be allowed to plot mischief against the country, and then come here and falsely charge their own machinations upon the Government.

The Senator from Massachusetts complains of fire and rocks, of burning mountains, and rivers of lava; and seems to think that I have hurled all these things upon his head. Far be it from my intention to use him so cruelly. I only undertook to learn the future conduct of the Bank of the United States from his present conduct here to-day; and if, in doing this, I have been writing on his naked skin with the point of a red-hot iron, it may have been the innocent cause of all these confused sensations about these fiery eruptions, heaving mountains, flowing rivers, and falling rocks, which have led the gentleman to believe that he was standing under the showers of one of those volcanic mountains which bury a city in a moment. The remedy is to cover the head, and fly. The inhabitants of Pompeii and Herculaneum, in the time of Pliny the elder, covered their heads with pillows; let him cover his with a document, and he will come out safe.

Mr. WEBSTER observed that the gentleman, with a remarkable emphasis, and with a very warm repetition of the argument, insisted on for the last six months, had repeated the charge that the Bank of the United States was about to scourge the country, with a view to bring about a state of things desirable to it; and the gentleman had found every time he addressed his argument of the solidity of mountains in favor of his pure doctrine, that this bank had some such design in view. What was the scourge which the gentleman announced with so much emphasis was to go abroad to the country? Why, it was a repetition of the same song so long sung that the banks were in a state of hostility to the Government, and that their interests were opposed to each other. Who believed one word of this, from Dan to Beersheba? The gentleman had taken great exception to some remarks which he [Mr. W.] had just made, in reference to the action of the House. Why he [Mr. W.] announced nothing: he spoke in no one's behalf, but only gave his own individual opinion as to the effect likely to be produced by the revival of a particular measure. He only spoke of what was apparent to every gentleman who looked at current events, and who was acquainted with the business and commerce of the country. Every man at all conversant with commercial affairs, and who was in the habit of consulting the public newspapers, would see that a disposition to press the Sub-Treasury bill, would seriously affect the business and commerce of the country. The gentleman might entertain a different opinion. But the gentleman spoke of the great irregularity of the reference he [Mr. W.] had made to the proceedings of the other House, and stigmatized it as unparliamentary. How long was it since a report was made to the Senate by a committee, of which the gentleman was a member, and with the gentleman's concurrence, in which this measure and others pending in the other House were spoken of again and again. Was this irregular and unparliamentary? Did it not meet with the gentleman's concurrence? And if this report was not irregular in the particular referred to, how could he justly be charged with irregularity for following the example set by it? But the truth was, there was no irregularity in it. There was no parliamentary rule applicable to it. It might be irregular to notice what was said in debate in the other House, because the member thus noticed could have no opportunity of replying, but it was far different with regard to any measure which might be acted on by that body, or passed over without action. Are not their journals [said Mr. W.] sent to us every day, for the purpose of letting us and the country know what they are doing, and shall we refrain from speaking of what is notorious to every body. Besides, if we send them a measure which is not acted on for three months, it is natural to suppose that it is dead and buried. Why it was the height of affectation to say that it was irregular and unparliamentary to notice the proceedings in the other House.

It was idle to have doubts on this subject when every body knew the common course of things was to speculate on the probable fate of measures pending in either House. With regard to the effect produced by our measures, and the effect produced by the delay to act on them in the other House, had not every body a right to know and comment on it? Are we not surrounded by millions of active, intelligent, and industrious citizens, whose interests are deeply concerned, and are we to shut our eyes as if we are not seen by them? Such a course of conduct was not becoming our condition, or consistent with our obligations to the country? I see that the country entertained the hope that, after the passage of the joint resolution rescinding the Treasury Order, no further attempt would be made to take up the Sub-Treasury bill, and that the returning prosperity of the country would not be interrupted. But the gentleman said that the same thing as this joint resolution was passed by this body five months ago, in a clause of the Sub-Treasury bill, and, therefore, it could not have produced the effect attributed to it. But did it receive the sanction of the other House? Did it become a law? It did not; and, consequently, it was to the passage of this joint resolution, as a distinct measure, that the returning prosperity of the country was to be attributed.

When it was seen that both branches of Congress, with a degree of unexampled eagerness and unanimity, had taken the subject of this joint resolution out of the Sub-Treasury bill, and passed it as a separate measure, the people had a right to understand that the bill would not be acted on; and to speak of this was considered the Senator as irregular and unparliamentary. Under the state of things existing on the adoption of the joint resolution, the public had a right to expect that there would be no further attempt to agitate the country by reviving this measure, which was considered as defunct. As to any attempt on his part to reprimand the other House, he did not believe that any member of that body would consider what he had said in that light.

Mr. BENTON rose again to say that, since he had sat down, a member of the House had communicated to him a piece of information, which, if true, would serve as a key to unlock the door which would give a view of the secret springs which put this day's proceedings in motion. The information is, that a letter has this day been received from Philadelphia, stating that a bank meeting was held in that city on Wednesday night last, and that the Bank of the United States put herself at the head of non-resumption, and actually gave the casting vote against taking measures for resuming. This is the information. It may be true, or it may not be. Of this I know nothing; but if it is true—if that Bank either has fallen back, or means to fall back, upon the non-resumption policy indicated in the April letter to Mr. ADAMS, then the broad light of day is shed upon the movement which we have just witnessed. Then we see clearly the reason of this coming forward in advance to raise a new panic and alarm about the Independent Treasury bill—to predict ruinous consequences from the passage, or even the discussion, of that bill—and to charge specifically that no resumption of specie payments can take place if the House of Representatives goes on with that bill. All this movement here, if this is, or shall be true, is to cover the plot of the mis called Bank of the United States, and to get a start on the public mind in falsely charging upon the Government the very mischief which that Bank is contriving to perpetuate. If this information either is true, or shall become true; if this Bank either opposed resumption last Wednesday night, or shall oppose it hereafter, then it is clear that the elaborate, argumentative letter—the cotton bag letter of April last to Mr. ADAMS—contains the settled policy of the Bank; and that the billet of May to the same gentleman was nothing but a juggler's trick to shift the reason for non-resumption from the cause assigned in the cotton bag letter to the new one disclosed by the Senator from Massachusetts this day. That billet was looked upon from the first, as a flimsy pretext for a change of position in the Bank; it was considered by every body as a flimsy pretext; but it now seems that it did not even amount to the respectability of a ridiculous pretext, but was in reality a mere juggler's trick—a mere piece of legerdemain—to conceal an evolution on the part of the Bank; to conceal a change of position, and place its non-resumption upon a new basis. Be all this as it may, the events of a few weeks will decide. If that Bank does not resume, all that is supposition now, will become historical truth. The public patience, and the public credulity, has been sufficiently taxed by the exactions of that Bank on the public understanding. When she stopped in May, 1837, it was declared to be purely to follow the New York example; that she was strong enough to go on; and should take the lead in resuming. So far from taking the lead in resuming, she has been, since November last, the sole obstacle to universal resumption. Now when the 100 banks of New York have resumed, she refuses to follow their lead, is getting up a confederation of insolvent and political banks, of which she is to be the head; and finding that the reasons given in the cotton bag letter are too contemptible to be tolerated by the public, a change of reasons must be effected; and this notable scheme of a new panic about the Independent Treasury bill seems to be the delectable device fallen upon! Sir, I despise such trickery. I abhor it. I denounce it upon this floor; and I call upon the Senate and the American people to mark it, and to remember it; and, when the new distress commences, and when the chorus of accusation resounds against the Government, let the revelations of this day be recollected; and let the finger of the miscalled Bank of the United States be seen, directing the whole mischief, and charging it upon the Government.

Mr. WEBSTER said he would rather have the hot stones on his head than some of the documents. The gentleman seemed to insist that he spoke with the knowledge of the views of the Pennsylvania Bank of the United States. This he Mr. W. chose to deny. He only knew what the bank published to the world, and nothing more. The gentleman dealt a good deal in the motives of others; but take away that part of his argument, and he would be found in the condition of that warrior of antiquity who, when he was deprived of all his weapons that had been poisoned contrary to the rules of war, was found to have no weapons left.

Mr. NILES said that he was about rising just as the war between the giants [alluding to Mr. WEBSTER and Mr. BENTON] commenced, but after such a fight, he might perhaps omit what he had intended to say. He had supposed, or at least hoped, that the bank war, or what some called the war of the Government upon the banks, but what he considered as the war of the banks and the bank petitioners upon the Government, had ceased He had hoped that if there could not be a permanent peace, which the country and all the interests so much desired, we might at least have a truce—a temporary suspension of hostilities. We all certainly have had a right to expect this, since the appearance of a certain document from the head of one of the belligerent parties. The paper referred to, was on its face a declaration of peace, or at least a declaration of the cesation of hostilities. It came upon us somewhat unexpectedly, and was, no doubt, received joyously by the people, tired, if not exhausted in this currency war. It occasioned the more surprise, because it was but a few weeks before that a new and formal manifesto was issued from the same high source, setting forth at length the causes of the war; we were told that the two parties were in the field face to face; that it was to be a war of extermination; that there was no neutral ground; that there could be no compromise; that one of the parties must conquer. Either the credit system or the hard money system, as this manifesto called the policy of the Government, must fall. The Treasury Order of July, 1836, was named as one of the causes of the war, but by no means a prominent one; the alleged hostility and determination of the Government to destroy the banks, seems to have been regarded as the principle cause for continuing hostilities, as set forth in this famous manifesto.

Immediately after the passage of the act which superseded the Treasury Order, a proclamation was put forth declaring that the repeal of the Specie Circular had removed all causes of war; and we were told that this unhappy controversy was now at an end, that the currency was to be restored, and all hostilities were to cease.

Mr. N. said under these circumstaeces he had not doubted that we should, at least have a truce, and that the country would, for a time, enjoy a little repose, which all seemed so anxious for; the merchants, manufactures, and even the banks, all classes seemed rejoiced at the prospect of returning once more, after so long an interruption, to their accustomed pursuits of business.

But, sir, within a few days past, these favorable indications of a termiaation of this controversy appear to have suddenly changed, and fresh evidences of hostility have appeared. The new Treasury Order, which is predicated on the existing laws, is seized upon us as a fresh aggression on the part of the Government, and new cause of war. We are also now told by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER,] that there is a renewed determination on the part of Congress to pass the Independent Treasury bill; that this has alarmed the country, and was beginning to agitate the public mind anew. He, Mr. N. had heard the remarks of the Senator with surprise, and considering his known connection and influence with the class who control the moneyed institutions and interests of the country, he could not but consider his remarks, taken in connection with the other circumstances to which he had referred, as strong evidence that attempts were to be renewed, to arrest the progress of resumption, and prolong the present state of things. Is the proffered truce to be recalled, the resumption arrested, and a new panic to be got up?

The Senator says that the country has been led to believe that the Independent Treasury bill was to be abandoned, and that the policy of the Administration was changed; and, if he did not say, seemed to insinuate, that it was this state of public opinion which had encouraged the banks to resume, and led to the improvement which had taken place in the monetary affairs of the country and the revival of business. We are then told of alarm and new agitation of the public mind, by a renewed attempt to pass the Independent Treasury bill and new measures from the Executive unfriendly to resumption.

Mr. N. said he believed all these statements to be incorrect. So far as he was informed, there was no such public opinion. The country did not believe that there had been any change of policy on the part of the Administration or its friends; nor did they believe that Congress had abandoned the Treasury bill which passed the Senate. He knew not what information the Senator may have received, or from what sources it is derived; he may have means of information in relation to a particular class not enjoyed by others; but he, Mr. N. spoke of the ordinary channels of intelligence, the public press and public meetings, which we must regard as the surest indications of public sentiment. He had seen nothing in the public press, either on one side or the other, of the Administration, that even led him to suspect that an opinion prevailed with any party, or any portion of the public, that there had been, or was to be, any change of policy on the part of the Administration or its friends in Congress; and, so far as respected his correspondence, it was in perfect harmony with what he regarded as the tone of the public press. Instead of the expression of an opinion that the Independent Treasury bill was abandoned, his correspondents who made any allusion to the subject expressed the strongest convictions that the bill ought to be acted upon and passed at the present session. And, Mr. President, is it probable, or scarcely possible, that an opinion can have prevailed to any extent with any portion of the public, that the Treasury bill would be voluntarily abandoned, or that there had been any change in the views of the majority in Congress or the Executive in relation to it? Has there been any act, any proceeding of either branch of Congress, or any Executive measure, which authorized any such opinion? None has been referred to, because none exist, except the negative circumstance that the bill which passed the Senate has not been taken up in the House. This is the only circumstance relied upon; but the delay is generally understood to have arisen from the peculiar condition of the House, being nearly equally equally divided on this question, its having been occupied with other business, and the embarrassments from its own rules. There has been no intimation by any of the friends of the measure that it was to be abandoned, and no want of disposition to act upon it at the earliest possible period. But why should it be inferred that this measure was given up, because it has not been acted upon? This is also the case of all the important bills which have passed the Senate. The Army bill, the Steamboat bill, the two Land bills, and others, all had slept in the same way. He learned that one of the Land bills was now under consideration. Has it been supposed by the public that all these bills have been abandoned? He presumed not. Why, then, should it be inferred that the Treasury bill, the most important measure of the session, and upon which the Senate had spent nearly four months at the extra and the present session, was to be abandoned, simply because the action upon it has been delayed in the House?

What act, then, has there been of either House that could have given rise to the opinion which we are told exists? He knew of none: a bill, it is true, has passed, superseding the Treasury Order of July, 1836. But that bill only contained the single principle that there should be no discrimination in the different branches of the revenue; but it had nothing to do with the management of the finances, or the currency in which they are to be collected and disbursed. These depend on the joint resolution of 1816, and the deposite act of 1836. But, instead of there having been any thing done to authorize an opinion that there was a change of policy since the Independent Treasury bill passed the Senate, the proceedings of the Senate must have satisfied the country that there was no change If there has been no movement in the House, there certainly has been here. The views of this body have been constantly brought into discussion, and particularly in the various proceedings upon the resolution of the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY.] The able report of the committee, the debate, and all the proceedings of the Senate on that resolution, must have satisfied the country that in this body, at least, there has been no change. We go for a separation; if we cannot obtain that, we take what comes nearest to it. If we cannot carry that measure, we choose to remain where we are; we do not intend bringing about a more intimate connection between the Government and the banks than results from existing laws, unless it be so to modify the deposite act of 1836 as to remit the forfeiture the banks have incurred by the suspension of payments. We are willing to place them where they were when that act was passed, or before the suspension. More than this they can have no claims to. There are restrictions in that act, which, if the connection between the Government and the banks is to be revived, we intend to hold on to. This is our position; and it is, or certainly ought to be, known to the country. There has been no act, no proceeding of the Senate, inconsistent with it. And yet we are told that the public have supposed that the policy of the Administration and its friends is changed; and it is intimated that it is this opinion, that a more favorable course was to be pursued in relation to the banks, that has encouraged and favored resumption thus far.

Sir, the banks which have resumed have acted from a more just view of this subject; they have not been influenced by any supposed change in the policy of the Administration. They have not looked to the Government for aid or encouragement. They do not ask it, or desire it; it is only the politicians, and the political banks, that desire this: the banks which have resumed, have done it from their own resources; they rely on their own means, and them alone; they depend on their own strength, by which they expect to stand or fall. They know that the Government has not, and will not, oppose them, or, in the language of the day, make war upon them. This is all they ask; they know that to depend on the revenues of the Government, would be to lean on a precarious prop, which, the very moment it is most wanted, might be removed.

The resumption has not commenced, and gone on thus far, in consequence of any real or supposed change in the policy of the Administration, or of the majority in Congress; and if it is now to be arrested, and a renewed effort made to prolong the present state of things, let it not be supposed that it can be successfully charged upon any new indication of an unfriendly policy towards the banks. If, as he feared was the case, the resumption is to be arrested, or such an attempt made, a new panic got up, and the country forced to suffer still longer the evils and difficultics of a suspension, let it not be supposed that it can be charged upon the Administration!

That this will be attempted, however, cannot be doubted. The country has been told from high authority that the controversy was at an end, and that the currency was now to be restored. Is this proclamation to be revoked, and the war about the currency to be continued? There are many indications that such is the case; and the speech of the Senator from Massachusetts is not at all calculated to remove these apprehensions, considering his connection with the sources whence these indications have appeared.

If the resumption is to be arrested, and the derangement and suspension of business prolonged, it is natural that new grounds of complaint should be sought for, and urged upon the public mind. If the war is to be resumed, new causes must be assigned; the old ones have lost their force. Some new aggressions on the part of the Executive, or Congress, must be found out, and made use of, to justify the renewal of hostilities. The new Specie Circular is doubtless to be one; and the refusal of Congress to repeal or modify some of the restrictions of the deposite act of 1836 may be another. We are already told that there is a new alarm and agitation of the public mind, in regard to the measures of the Government.

Sir, if there is a design to arrest resumption, and prolong the present difficulties, let me say to those engaged in it, whether here or elsewhere, that they assume a heavy responsibility. Let me also say to them, they will not succeed. The people, of all parties, have got tired of this war about the currency and the banks; they want a respite at least, and all are anxious for the revival of business. This war has been kept up by a union between the politicians and the banks, the merchants and the manufacturers. The advantages of it have resulted to the politicians a one. To the other classes engaged in the contest, it has been attended with heavy sacrifices; these they have borne for more than a year cheerfully; but they have for some time shown symptons of uneasiness and dissatisfaction; they begin to be satisfied that it is a contest in which they are to make the sacrifices, and the politicians to reap the advantages.

The merchants and manufacturers never engage in these panic contests as an end, but only as a means. When their business becomes deranged, and almost at a stand, being unable to perceive the true cause of the difficulty, they readily believe what is told them by their political friends, that all the difficulties arise from the measures of the Government, which is waging war on the banks, and trying experiments on the currency. Under this belief, and vexed and cross from the loss of their usual profits, they neglect their business, and enter furiously into party strife. They are led to believe that if they will help to put down the Administration, they shall then have better times; that money will be plenty, and their business become good. But on the present occasion they have struggled long, and got tired of a contest productive of so little good to them. They are anxious to return to pursuits more congenial to their feelings; they love money better than politics.

The more intelligent among them also begin to discover that all the clamor about the measures of the Government being the cause of all the difficulties the country has experienced, is intended for political effect. They begin to perceive that the true causes which prostrated the banks, and brought on the commercial revulsion, lie much deeper than any measures of the Government. Men of sense, of all parties, cannot but see that if the banks or the merchants have traded beyond their means or the wants of the country, the embarrassments which have followed can be justly chargeable upon no one but themselves. He believed that the time was not distant when all would be convinced that the measures of the Government, having a reference only to its own revenues, had much less influence, either for good or for evil, on the currency and monetary concerns of the country, than is generally supposed. This subject is becoming daily better understood; and the more generally it is understood, the better for the quiet of the country and the interests of all, unless it be that class of politicians whose cause will flourish only by the stimulus of panics.

Whether an attempt is about to be made to revive the panic, he could not say; nor would he say that the remarks of the Senator from Massachusetts have any connection with such a purpose. He knew not what the designs of the Senator may have been, but he must say that they were directly calculated to produce a new alarm, and prolong existing difficulties.

[Mr. WEBSTER remarked that he only meant to say that an attempt, at this time, to pass the Independent Treasury bill was calculated to embarras and delay resumption.]

Mr. NILES. There has been no grounds to suppose, as he had attempted to show, that there would be any change in the financial policy of the Government. The banks commenced resumption under the influence of this policy, and have experienced no inconvenience from it. They have gone on since they began steadily and successfully, and how can it now be said that an adherence to this policy is calculated to retard resumption? There was no difficulty in resumption; and he repeated that if there was a design, either here or elsewhere, to arrest it for political or other purposes, it will not succeed. The merchants and manufacturers want to return to their accustomed pursuits of making money; all classes want repose, or a short respite at least, from this war about the currency; they have suffered evils enough from the suspension for more than a year, and the general opinion is, that the banks can and ought to resume; and public opinion, and the interests of all classes, will compel them to do it.

The question was then taken and the report was ordered to be printed.

SPEECH OF MR. STRANGE,
OF NORTH CAROLINA.

In Senate, March 29, 1838—On the resolution to repeal the Specie Circular.

Mr. STRANGE addressed the Senate as follows:

I should have profited little by experience, if I did not feel conscious that I shall be in a very small minority upon this question, and I should not have troubled the Senate with any remarks, if the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER,] had not thrown out some observations which ought not, in my judgment, to go forth unanswered. That Senator could have no motive, so far as this body is concerned, in addressing us. He could entertain no doubt of his favorite measure passing by a very large majority, and I am persuaded he did not cherish the slightest hope of winning over here a single proselyte. It was far beyond these walls that he intended his remarks to take effect; it was upon the country at large he designed they should operate. I desire on my part, so far as I may, to counteract their tendency, and if any feeble voice can be heard amid the roaring of the lion, to quiet as far as possible the undue excitement they are calculated to produce.

When the Senator from Kentucky introduced his resolutions of which the present is a modification, I was absent from the Senate, and I confess myself greatly surprised when I heard it had been done. All the topics embraced in them had already been fully discussed in this body, and the country had been agitated in a degree correspondent to the warmth of that discussion, and I could not but feel surprised that a renewal thereof should be solicited. When a man is surprised at a fact, he is naturally led to the inquiry why this fact came into existence, and what consequences its authors expect to deduce from it. The acts of men often have an obvious palpable design, and another more important, hidden from the eye of the superficial observer; and it is the part of wisdom narrowly to examine the acts of others by which we are likely to be affected, and endeavor to ascertain the whole compass of their objects, whether primary or secondary, palpable or covert. With respect to the resolutions of the Senator from Kentucky, the avowed objects, so far as I understand them, from looking into the resolutions themselves, or attending to the arguments advanced in their support, were threefold. The first was relief to Government creditors—increased facility to those who directly paid in the revenues of the country. I would not deny to this consideration the respect it merits. But legislation should always be treated as a necessary evil, and ought never to be resorted to but when the demand for its use is urgent. Even the most beneficial legislation is apt to give rise to mischiefs not previously existing. It is proper, then, for us to inquire whether the payers of revenue stand in any such need of relief, as even, if we could lawfully do so, would render it expedient for us to legislate in their behalf. Where is the evidence of any such need? Where shall we look for marks of their distress? Or what cry of theirs has come to our ears? I have seen, I have heard none. There is no such need; and indeed the friends of the resolution do not seem to urge this argument with any earnestness.

The second object of the resolutions was the relief of the banks; and in this is, in fact, contained the whole pith and marrow of the proceeding. But I deny that it will prove a permanent, wholesome relief to the banks. A temporary and seemingly beneficial effect it may, and doubtless will, produce; but that it will infuse sound health into the banking system of this country, is an idea opposed alike to experience and sound philosophy. So far from the present time being favorable for the renewal of the connection between the Government and the banks, it is peculiarly inauspicious. Who would give a patient, just passing out of the cold into the hot stage of an intermittent fever, brandy, and other stimulants? Such applications, if proper at all, were so when the collapse was first coming on, with the hope of averting, or greatly mitigating it. But when reaction is commencing, and the fever beginning to rise, reason would seem to forbid their use. The banks are the habitual subjects of intermittent fever. Now the tide of circulation courses through their arteries in an impetuous current, and now it moves sluggishly along, scarcely giving impulse to the powers of life. And what is their present condition? Is it not notorious that they are passing from a state of collapse into that of increased action, which will be very soon heightened into a raging fever, to be followed, as all must foresee, by another collapse, more prostrating than any which have preceded it? It is an established maxim in philosophy, that action and reaction are equal. In proportion, then, as the excitement shall rise, so great will be the succeeding prostration. Looking to the interest of the banks alone, then, I repeat, this is no time to administer to them that strongest of stimulants, a renewed connection with the Government. They are now rising from that collapsed state in which a variety of causes had contributed to throw them; and Nature, by the application of her great law of reaction is raising them up with great rapidity, and our interference would but precipitate the operation beyond the point of safety. Confidence, that magic Being, when roused from her state of torpor, is prone, from her very nature, to run into the most extravagant excesses, and requires no encouragement. Business men, tired of the inactivity which a time of pressure produces, as soon as that pressure is removed, rush eagerly into the most extensive operations. Stockholders, anxious to be indemnified for the very small profits they have derived during the season of curtailment, press the banks to seize the favorable occasion to increase their discounts, and an abundance of money in circulation, enables every man to purchase, with a moderate premium, a credit which before he had no means of commanding. One stimulant gives an increased action to another, and the tide of events is setting in one direction. Does not prudence, then, dictate to us, that as we have no power to check it, we ought, at least, to contribute nothing to its extravagant flow, and that least of all should we embark the body politic upon its bosom? Take a single instance as a sample of the illimitable excess to which this thing is prone to run, as appearing upon the very face of the resolutions of the Senator from Kentucky. They contained a proposition not only to receive the notes of the banks in payment of the public dues, but that they should also be tendered to the public creditors, and an actual refusal to receive them by such creditors should precede their being returned upon the banks for redemption, or having any other medium of payment offered to the creditor. Thus taking a new and most extensive stride in making the Government the guarantor of all the paper circulation in the country. It is true the Senator from Kentucky has stricken out that portion of his resolution; but was that satisfactory to all? Did not the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. RIVES,] insist upon retaining it, with some trivial modifications? And does not the fact that any member (and that, too, a distinguished one of this body) could be found willing to tender to public creditors the notes of all the banks in the United States, alarmingly indicate the dangers of the system out of which the proposition springs, and furnish a striking admonition of what it is likely to bring upon the country? But, sir, the policy of connection between the Government and the banks presents a very wide field for discussion, and as I have heretofore occupied it pretty extensively, I forbear for the present to enter it farther.

The third object of introducing the resolutions seemed to be the abolition of an odious discrimination in the medium of payment for the public lands and the ordinary customs. Now, sir, I am well aware that this discrimination is odious to the people, and it is natural, and perhaps right, that it should be so; and the gentlemen in the Opposition have spared no pains in availing themselves of this circumstance to excite popular prejudice against the Administration. I wish they had been equally diligent in pointing out to them the source from whence this principle of discrimination springs. I am content that they shall address the people in the strongest terms against discrimination, if they will let them know, at the same time, in what soil this noxious plant finds its growth. The Constitution never contemplated the exercise of any such discrimination, because it contemplated but one medium—the precious metals—in the collection of its dues. If the finances of the country had always been administered in the currency recognised by the Constitution, every man would have understood at once what he had a right to receive from the Government, and in what he was bound to pay it; and there would have been no discrimination and no murmuring. The necessity for discrimination grew out of the joint resolution of 1816—the first legal authority for receiving the dues of the Government in paper money. If gentlemen really desire to abolish discrimination, let them repeal this resolution. I have voted for its repeal as the most effectual, and, indeed, the only, mode of dispensing with discrimination. So long as the Government dispenses with the constitutional currency, discrimination will, of necessity, exist; and pass what law you may to limit or prevent it, discrimination must, in spite of them, prevail in, practice. If you wish to overcome an enemy, level your blow at his real lurking place; if you intend effectually to destroy an evil, cut it up by the roots. Repeal the joint resolution of 1816, and force your public officers back upon the constitutional currency, and you will hear no more complaints about inequalities in the media of receipts and payments.

The Senator from Massachusetts has favored us with a history of the circumstances which gave rise to, and attended, the passage of the joint resolution of 1816, and with his opinion of its character and design. So far as his historical reminiscences are concerned, I am not at all disposed to question their correctness; they suit my purpose, and enable me to arrive at a very different conclusion from his as to the operation of that act. The framers of our Constitution were hard money men, and it was a hard money Constitution. It was their design that the Government should collect its dues in gold and silver, and such was the primitive practice. The practice of receiving bank paper crept in, and gradually progressed, until every thing which bore the name of money, in the form of bank notes, was accepted by the public officers, and grew into an obvious and pressing inconvenience. The current values of the notes received were exceedingly various, and grew daily more so. The nominal receipts of the Government were far beyond its real income, and the depreciated currency in which its revenue was collected forced it into acts of injustice to its creditors, as well as to be a heavy sufferer by losses to itself. The pernicious and corrupting influence of this state of things was perceived and felt by every man of the least reflection. It rendered the Government a participant in a great gambling concern, having itself the largest stake in the game. The gambling spirit was pervading the community; and of all the spirits furnished from the legions of Satan, none is more corrupting to the individual or community of whom it takes possession than the gambling spirit. The public officers, it is true, had assumed upon themselves without any authority, and as the Senator from Massachusetts justly remarked in another part of his argument, would have been liable to the Government for the amount of their receipts in specie. But this right could not be enforced without the utmost cruelty, if it could have been enforced at all to the full extent; for the difference between the real amounts in the hands of the officers and the nominal amounts received could scarcely have been realized out of the whole property of both the officers and their securities. But besides this, although the Government had not expressly authorized the receipt of bank paper, it was cognizant that it was done, and, by its silence, connived at the act; and having so long stood by without any word of disapprobation, or prescribing any limits to the exercise of this assumed power of the receiving officers, it would have been highly unjust to have held them to a strict account for doing what had not been disapproved in their predecessors. For the past, then, there was no remedy; and the question was, what should be done for the future. Must they submit to the evil, or endeavor to prevent or altogether restrain it? They might have adopted the latter course, and warned their officers that the connivance heretofore extended to them should be henceforth withheld; that a rigid account would in future be exacted, and nothing but the constitutional currency received from them; and if they received ought else, it must be at their own peril. Or, they might have gone still farther, and actually prohibited the receipt of bank paper, and made it penal in the officer to accept it from any debtor. But every one agrees they did neither of these things. And why did they not? I may be greatly mistaken in my conjecture, but I verily believe that this bold and salutary measure was prevented by the same influence which now distracts our counsels, and paralyses our energy—that of the banks, in all its subtlety and complication. It was an influence less suspected then than now; but, on that very account, nearly as potent, although much less extensive. The banks had then, as now, their stockholders, their officers, and above all, their debtors, through whom they exercised their imperceptible and magic spells on all classes of society. Now, it is true, we are conscious of the fact; but, like Gulliver, we find that while we have been sleeping, the Lilliputians have so multiplied their pigmy chains, that we strive in vain to put forth our strength: our contemptible foes have thickened around us, and now openly add to the bonds which hold us down, and mock at our exertions to break through them. Then they were exerted secretly, and almost unconsciously; but were sufficient then as they are now, to enslave the legislative will, and forbid an absolute repudiation of bank paper, and an administration of the finances in the mode prescribed by the Constitution. But this influence was not merely negative in its action. It did not stop at preventing the Legislature from prohibiting the Executive from receiving any thing but the constitutional currency. It went further, and forced it to abandon its attitude of mere connivance, and for the first time to authorize, as I say, the receipt of bank paper, and, as says the Senator from Massachusetts, to command it.

And this brings me to that question between us, whether the joint resolution of 1816 is a permission, or a command. I was somewhat surprised, but even more amused, at perceiving how the force of truth had compelled the Senator from Massachusetts, almost unconsciously, to abandon for a moment the ground so strenuously maintained by him at the extra session, in stating the object of this resolution. He said it went no further than to give the Secretary of the Treasury permission to receive the notes of specie-paying banks, and to prohibit the reception of the notes of those which did not pay specie. This is precisely my idea of its operations and I am sorry that the Senator did not rest there. But he quickly returns to his first love, and insists that it is mandatory upon the Secretary, in the first clause, to receive the notes of specie-paying banks, as well as in the second not to receive those which do not pay. The Senator commences his argument by saying, that gentlemen in this chamber had spoken of the resolution of 1816 as having created the practice of receiving bank paper for revenue. I have heard no such declaration made. I have never heard it contended that this resolution gave rise to the practice; but I have heard it insisted, and as I think properly, that it is the first legislative direct authority for so doing. What was done before was upon the private assumption of the officers themselves; the Government merely acquiesced in the practice until it became unreasonable to hold the officers' acts unwarrantable, or to visit upon them their consequences. But by the resolution of 1816 the Government was no longer a mere acquiescent stander-by, but deliberately and solemnly, by legislative action, sanctioned the proceeding. The Senator then proceeds with his argument to show that it was not merely permissive to the Secretary to receive bank notes, but that it commands him to receive those of such as pay specie; and says, in the first place, the resolution is mandatory, and prohibitory, in its very nature. This I do not question. I freely admit that the resolution commands whatever it does command, and prohibits whatever it does prohibit; and in stating the argument in this way, the Senator exhibits more adroitness as a logician than fairness as a politician. The true question is, what does the resolution command, and what does it prohibit? It commands, as I say, and nothing more, that the Secretary shall proceed as soon as possible to collect the public revenue in the constitutional currency, or &c. and prohibits, as the Senator from Massachusetts justly says, the reception of any part of it, after a given day, in the notes of unsound banks. Let any plain man read the act, and he would find no difficulty in its construction:

"That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, required and directed to adopt such measures as he may deem necessary to cause, as soon as may be, all duties, taxes, debts, or sums of money accruing or becoming payable to the United States, to be collected and paid in the legal currency of the United States, or Treasury notes, or notes of the Bank of the United States, as by law provided and declared, or of notes of banks which are payable and paid on demand in the legal currency of the United States, and that from and after the 20th day of February next, no such duties, taxes, debts, or sums of money accruing or becoming payable to the United States, as aforesaid, ought to be collected or received, otherwise than in the legal currency of the United States, or Treasury notes, or notes of the Bank of the United States, or in notes of banks, which are payable and paid on demand in the said currency of the United States.

Here, then, is the act itself, and if any man of unbiassed mind can have any doubts about its meaning, the English language is a mere snare to entrap plain men—a plaything for the amusement of logicians. To whom is the act directed in its mandatory and prohibitory character? To the public debtor or to the public officer? Does it say that the public debtors may hereafter pay their dues to the Government in such or such currency, and shall not pay it in such and such? Does it not, on the contrary, say that the Secretary of the Treasury shall collect them in such or such, &c. and that they ought not, after such a time, to be received in such and such, &c? Now, I care not what relation the person commanded may bear to the commanding power, if the command be in the alternative do this, or this, or this, the person commanded has fulfilled the command if he does either of the three, and if nothing more is said in the command, it is surely left to the person commanded to adopt either of the alternatives he may think proper. If there was no alternative expressed in the command, of course there would be no place for choice; and, if in an alternative command, the option had been intended for another than the person commanded, it would have been so expressed. Had the resolution of 1816 intended to confer the option on the debtor, it would have been so expressed. The command, however, was addressed to the public officer, and it was in substance as if the Government had said to him, I am entitled to receive from you specie for all my dues which you have collected, or ought to have collected, but I am sensible of the difficultiss which have surrounded you, and will probably continue to surround you. You have collected the revenue in all sorts of paper currency, some of which is utterly worthless. Of what is past we will say nothing, but in future you may collect the revenue in the Constitutional currency, or in the notes of specie-paying banks, and either of these will be received by me as equivalent to specie; but the worthless trash of non-specie-paying banks you ought not to receive, for that I will not take at your hands, neither do I choose to run the hazard of your being able to make it good to me in specie. Nothing is hinted in all this of the option being left with the debtor. Such is the obvious construction which a plain unsophisticated man would put upon this resolution, applying to it nothing but the simple rules of grammatical construction. But suppose the language were more ambiguous than it is, and we were driven to the application of technical rules in reaching the legislative meaning. The Senator from Massachusetts well knows that in the construction of statutes the most approved professional guides are attention to the old law—to the mischief existing under it, and to the remedy for the mischief. Let us, then, apply this rule to the case before us. What was the old law? We may take either the law of 1789, requiring the payment of the revenue in money, and the practice springing up under it of considering every thing having the name of bank paper as money; or the practice alone, as constituting the old law. What was the mischief? Obviously the throwing upon the Government a vast quantity of currency of unequal value, or of no value at all, and a consequent injustice to the public creditor and an inequality in the levy of the taxes and customs. What was the remedy? Plainly as all other remedies—a removal of the mischief. The mischief was not an oppression of the public debtors, a rigid exaction from them of the constitutional currency, a refusal to take from them the mingled currency of the country, and thus subjecting them to loss and inconvenience, but precisely the reverse—a too facile acceptance of what they might think proper to offer, to the loss of the Government and the wrong of its creditors. It would be a strange remedy of this evil to pass a law giving to these very debtors a privilege which they had not before, of offering at their own choice any and every currency, and commanding to the officer a laxity which he had already manifested himself too willing to indulge; making it imperative upon him to do that which against the law and against the interest of the Government and its creditors, whom he represented, he had already shown himself but too prompt to perform. Take, then, either the natural or artificial rules of construction, and it is equally clear that the first branch of the joint resolution of 1816 was not mandatory, but permissive; to be restricted in its exercise by the second branch, which is the really remedial branch, directed against the receipt of inconvertible paper money. But the Senator from Massachusetts says that bank paper ought to be received from the public debtor, because Congress says it ought to be received. This is a mere petitio principii, an assumption of the very position about which we dispute. I deny that Congress has said that it ought to be received. It has said no more than that it may be received, and that the paper mentioned in the second clause ought not to be received. But the Senator further urges, that if the first part of the resolution was not mandatory, the second could not be prohibitory. Now, I do not see any logic in this mode of reasoning. The deduction seems to me to be a perfect non sequitur. Such reasoning is even more inconclusive than some examples of ingenious sophism, in which is syllogistically demonstrated what every man of common sense knows to be false. Such, for instance, as this: a man is a two-legged animal, a goose is a two-legged animal; therefore, a man is a goose. But, sir, these ingenious devices will not avail. They will not serve to wrest plain English from its obvious meaning. Every rule of construction results in showing that, by the resolution of 1816, a power of discrimination is vested in the Secretary. A discrimination, then, first directly given by legislative action; and, if gentlemen wish to take it away, let them unite with me in repealing that resolution. In so doing, they will part with what has been to them a most efficient and artful electioneering topic; but will, at the same time, do much towards the restoration of a violated Constitution.

I have now commented upon the three apparent or avowed objects embraced in this measure; but I have intimated, and I now distinctly say, that its covert designs are, in my judgment, much more important, and still more objectionable. There are few books more stored with wisdom than that which is put into our hands in an early stage of our progress in the acquisition of the dead languages—a book in which, like many other ancient works, the contributions of men of different places and ages are brought together, and all attributed to one man—the book I allude to is Æsop's Fables. Among these fables is one full of useful moral, in which a cat is represented, who, having exhausted all other devices in bringing within her reach the mice whom melancholy experience had rendered wary, fell upon the expedient of covering herself copiously with meal or flour, and laying herself down in a tub where that article was went to be kept; that the cheated mice, tempted by hunger, and mistaking her for a mass of flour, might approach to eat, and be themselves eaten. The Federal party have, in like manner, been striving, from the beginning of our national existence, to devour the people, and have occasionally made upon them successful onslaughts. But the people have become so very suspicious, that not only a change of name has been found necessary, but a change in their appearance and apparent designs. They now pretend that they are the true friends of the people; that the measures of the Administration are leading them to ruin and starvation, while those proposed by them will lead to plenty and satiety; that their measures will scatter money in abundance over the land, open vast commercial facilities, people our western wilds, multiply the steam-moved palaces which float upon our waters, and, in short, present to every man in the country food and raiment, without any care or labor on his part. With this fallacious show they tempt the people as treacherous puss did the mice, to place themselves in their power, and with the same purpose of working their own will upon them to ruin and devour them. While they profess a purpose of assisting the public debtors, of aiding the local banks, and, through them, the people, scattering plenty over the land, and abolishing odious discrimination, their real design and primary object is to fix upon us a United States Bank. The measure proposed will, in two ways, tend powerfully to that result. First, by increasing bank issues to an extent so extravagant as must necessarily result in a derangement of the currency altogether insupportable, forcing many, with all their consciousness of its evils, to fly to a United States Bank as the only remedy. And, secondly, by producing so intimate a connection between the Government and the banks as to give entire effect to that specious argument, that whatever the Government treats as money is money, which it is bound to regulate; that the Government does treat the local bank notes as money, and is therefore bound to regulate them, which it can only do by a United States Bank. In this way is preparation making to subdue, imperceptibly, the public will to that which it now abhors, to lead it into difficulties, from which it is thought there will be no other mode of extrication.

The original resolutions were much more objectionable themselves than the present, but they were not so dangerous, for they did not so well disguise the ultimate tendencies of the system they were designed to advance. They required what had never been done before in this Government, that bank paper should be tendered to the public creditor, and that too in the face of the sentiment avowed by all parties, that nothing but gold or silver, or their unquestionable equivalent, ought ever to be paid to a public creditor. Acknowledged policy, and not a sense of its impropriety, induced the mover of those resolutions to part with that feature against the earnest opposition of the Senator from Virginia. But, disguise it as they may, this resolution, even as now modified, is but one of the series of untiring efforts made by the Opposition to bring the Government back to a connection with the banks, and to render that connection even more intimate than ever: the termination in a United States Bank becoming more certain in proportion to the intimacy of that connection. To promote this object, the most specious, and yet the most fallacious, appeals are made to blind prejudice. They tell us that in the receipt of bank notes the Government does nothing more than is done by every citizen of the country; that every citizen receives in his dealings the notes of solvent banks. But is it not apparent that the case of the Government and the citizen are not parallel and can not be rendered so. No law compels the private citizen to take bank notes; neither does any citizen in advance, not only for a day, but for all time, bind himself to take the notes of every bank which may happen to pay specie. It is true, if at any given time a bank note is tendered him, he receives it or not, according to circumstances; according to the ability of his debtor to give him that or any thing better; according to the hazard there may be of his losing his debt if he does not take what is now tendered; according to his present ability to make the particular money available to him as so much specie; according to his knowledge of the actual present value of the note, or his judgment of the substantial soundness of the bank issuing it. By the joint resolution of 1816, if bank notes were to be received at all, the public officers were very wisely left in all these respects in a situation very similar to that of the private citizen, and acted upon his official responsibility. But by this resolution you, as it were, "bind him fast in fate." You chain up all his faculties, and if a certain state of facts exist at the moment, his action is fixed. The slightest pervision of coming events is forbidden him; none of that clairvoyance by which a sagacious man may look through the brick walls and iron grates of banks into those vaults which are often hollow and empty enough when the bank wears a very fair exterior, is allowed him. Whatever losses he may see in futuro for the Government, he must yet take the paper. Besides this, does not every one know how readily this legislative declaration will be seized upon by the banks and their friends as an agreement or contract on the part of the Government to take their notes, and how embarrassing it may prove to the Government in its future movements? How widely in this does the Government differ from the private individual who keeps his purposes in his own bosom, and acts upon them, nay, forms them as circumstances arise, and is in no danger of having demanded of him as a right what he merely yields as a favor, or in simple reference to his own convenience? From all these difficulties we were measurably free under the joint resolution of 1816. And here I will frankly confess (for I have no political secrets) that I was much surprised that many of my political friends should have been dissatisfied with the Independent Treasury bill as sent from this body to the other House. In connection with the joint resolution of 1816, I consider it stronger than the bill as amended by the Senator from South Carolina. I voted for that amendment, it is true, because I discovered that, with such an amendment, it would command some support which it would not without it; but, for myself, I, in truth, preferred the bill as it passed this body. As the bill stands, we are free from any compacts or entangling alliances with the banks, while the amendment contains provisions which, whether so designed or not, will be construed into stipulations on the part of the Government, which the banks will insist upon enforcing, and make the pretext for demanding other concessions. If we have any thing to do with banks at all, I wish to be perfectly free from permanent contracts with them. I wish to be free as air—free as the Constitution made us. I wish the Government to be as the individual is, at liberty to make use of banks or let them alone, according to its own convenience or exigencies. With the bill as it passed this body, had I the administration of this Government, (as I never expect to have,) I would, under the joint resolution of 1816, have received the notes of such banks as I considered perfectly safe, and following the example of the United States Bank, I would have made short settlements with the banks, and demanded specie for their notes. I would not have done so from any disposition to make war upon the banks, as is erroneously attributed to the friends of the Administration by its enemies. I am certain no such feeling exists in my bosom, and I am well convinced it exists in the bosom of very few of the friends of the Administration. My object in making these settlements, would be to render the Government in practice what even the gentlemen on the other side say it is in theory—a hard money Government. But gentlemen say it is in practice a hard money Government, while it takes only convertible paper; that there is no real difference between specie and paper convertible at pleasure into specie. Now it is not necessary for us to inquire into the truth of this proposition until a state of facts arises in which it may be brought into practical action. The paper which is called convertible, is not so in fact. There is, in truth, little or no really convertible bank paper in the country, and never will be while the present banking system continues. This fact has not been sufficiently pressed upon public attention, and the delusion produced by the talk of the gentleman on the other side has been suffered to take quiet possession of the public mind. Gentlemen practice a sort of legerdemain upon us: they say convertible paper is equal to gold and silver, and they hold up to us something which they tell us is convertible paper, and is, therefore, as good as gold and silver; but they take care to divert our attention from the inquiry whether what they thus hold up to us be in truth convertible paper? They know very well it will not bear this investigation, and, therefore, resort to all sorts of contrivances to prevent us from making it; they even represent it as the height of oppression and unjust cruelty to do so. Do not gentlemen now directly say, that they are doubtful whether the Government can be trusted to carry out this resolution in its spirit, and whether some further guards ought not to be thrown around the banks. They are apprehensive that the Government will not play into the hands of the banks, and circulate their paper, but will return their notes upon them, when received, and demand specie. And why are they apprehensive? It is the conviction that such a test might expose the jugglers, and discover the mystic secret. They say to the Government in one breath—"You ought surely to take this, for it is convertible into gold and silver—you have only to ask at the bank for the gold and silver, and you will be certain to obtain it;" but in the next they say—"It would be exceedingly ungenerous in you to ask the banks for the specie; this would be making war upon them, and through them upon the people: for you would be certain to break the banks, and force them to grind the people." Such is the boasted convertibility. It amounts to this: Only believe this to be equal to gold and silver, and it will be just as good as if it were so. It is true, I tell you, if you make the experiment you will be sure to find it otherwise; but still it will be generous and patriotic in you to believe it, and, therefore, you must do so, although the evidence is all against it. It is astonishing to me that so large a portion of the people should be gulled by this everlasting din about convertibility, when the very priests themselves tell them that their god will not bear examination; when they tell them in one breath that the bank notes are convertible, but that it would ruin the banks to ask them to convert them. It is amazing that gentlemen should attempt such impositions upon popular credulity. If the banks are able to redeem their paper, it cannot ruin them to do so; and if they cannot, why then it is obviously not convertible. I know well the deceitfulness and flexibility of the human mind—that predisposition is every thing—that "trifles light as air, are to the jealous confirmation strong as proof from holy writ"—that, to the credulous, the most absurd propositions may be made to wear the show of probability; but that such absurdities as those on which I am remarking should be swallowed by a whole people, fills me with wonder inexpressible. I sincerely wish the people would look into this system of hocus-pocus, by which they have been so long deluded.

Gentlemen spoke of the present low state of our Treasury as presenting an occasion most advantageous for the renewal of our connection with the banks. This topic was an important one, but it looked in precisely the opposite direction from that suggested by the other side. A small revenue—one not exceeding the wants of the Government—was, on many accounts, highly desirable. Many of our troubles had grown out of an expanded revenue; and our connection with the banks has been the main cause of that expansion. Our disconnection with the banks, and a reduction of our revenue, have been nearly coincident events; and a continuance and completion of the disconnection will ensure us a moderate revenue, and a consequent economical expenditure. A renewal of that connection will be a renewal of surpluses and of all the troubles incident to them. No man, who is not wilfully blind, can fail to perceive the overpowering influence of banks over public affairs. It is obvious that, while the connection exists between the Government and the banks, the larger the revenue of the one, the greater the trading credit of the other. The interest of the banks, then, would be to increase the revenues of the Government; and there are a thousand disguised modes in which schemes might be brought forward to effect their object. This object being accomplished, it would naturally lead on to a great pecuniary catastrophe, and, in alarm and desperation, even constitutional doubts would be yielded by many to the supposed necessity of the times, and a United States Bank be chartered.

But why do certain policians press the recharter of a United States Bank with so much zeal upon the country? Is it from any particular regard to the thing itself, or a belief that is for the real good of the country? No, sir, no! Some may so believe, but my charity does not extend so far in favor of those who are most clamorous for this measure. It is a convenient hobby for riding into the Presidency, which gentlemen are anxious to mount. It is a mistake that this is a hobby which will not carry double. It is one large enough and staunch enough for many to ride; and he who rides it successfully, may take a whole army of friends behind him. Sir, we shall never have quiet in this country, while this chamber is made the arena of Presidential strife—the theatre on which is to be decided who shall be elevated to the Chief Magistracy of this land. As long as this continues to be the case, no question will be discussed with reference merely to the public welfare, but in relation to whose Presidential prospects it will be likely to advance. I wish I could see the Constitution so amended, and I yet hope to see it, as to exclude from the Presidential canvass every man who is, or has been, within three years, a member of either house of Congress. When that shall be the case, we may hope to see questions discussed in this body exclusively upon their merits, and speeches published to inform, and not to mislead, the people. Yes, sir, the United States Bank is used, like the elephants in ancient warfare, as a most powerful auxiliary, and destructive to any foe against which its fury can be successfully directed. But I warn the gentlemen on the other side that they may be exposed to the same danger that, they will remember, sometimes overtook those of ancient times who used elephants in battle—the ponderous allies occasionally turned upon their friends, and trampled in the earth those who trusted in them for victory. I rejoice, Mr. President, that the elephant to be used in the coming war has been so early paraded before us; that we have had time allowed us to examine his structure and appearance, and become accustomed to his roar, so that we may not be overcome with surprise at the one, or alarm at the other. I am happy to say that he is likely to prove a very harmless creature—that he is so miserably put together as to be very deficient in strength, as well as in tractability. He is so wretchedly misshapen, that even his own friends are ashamed of him, and will not, I think, venture to trust themselves with him in the day of battle. None, I am persuaded, but the fearless rider who has brought him upon the field would venture to mount so unpromising a brute, and I doubt not even he will find reason to repent his rashness.

Mr. President, two great political parties have ever divided this country; and the leaders of each should openly and fairly set forth their principles, and leave it to the people, the only true and legitimate arbiter, to decide between them. Let things be presented to the people in their true character; let them see things as they really are; and let us have no more cats in the meal tub. I, for one, support the present Administration, because I think I understand its general principles, and approve them. I have nothing else to bind me to it but the promotion of those great Democratic principles which are identified, in my judgment, with the true interests of this nation; and those very measures which the Opposition are now denouncing, they will find themselves compelled, should they ever get into power, to adopt, or they will soon be hurled by the people from the places they shall have obtained. These principles are too dear to the people of the United States ever to be abandoned by them; and no Administration which does not adopt them for its government, can maintain its place any longer than it can succeed in deceiving and gulling the people, by the same acts which gets it into power. One of these principles is economy in public expenditure; a principle without which Republican purity and simplicity cannot exist. Conscious of this, the Opposition are constantly charging the Administration with profligacy, and taunting them with the vast amount of their expenditures. But what are the facts, so far as this body is concerned? The members of this body are but men, and are subject to all the frailties of men. It is declared of the Divine Saviour of our race, that he was a man of like passions with ourselves, conscious of our frailties, and touched with our infirmities. It is surely, then, no disparagement to this body to say that its members are but fair specimens of human nature; perhaps no worse, and certainly not much better, than other men, or more exempt from the ordinary effects of human weakness. Our judgments are as liable to be warped by the peculiar position in which we stand to any given subject, and, with the most honest purposes, to have our views of things obscured when the interests of ourselves or our friends are interposed. The Administration party here is, in truth, as it professes to be, opposed to an expensive administration of the General Government. They are the advocates of low taxation and economy in disbursements. But when we come to apply our principles in practice, almost every proposal for expenditure addresses itself to the local interests of some few members of the Administration party. Affected by the frailty of our natures, we see in such case some feature pecuilar to itself, which excepts it from the general rule; we discover in it some extraordinary claim to public favor, and are persuaded that we may well vote for it without running counter to our principles, or bringing our consistency into the slightest suspicion. On these occasions, the almost unanimous vote of the Opposition united to our own, and that of a few looking at the subject in the same light with ourselves, insures the passage of the measure against the vain resistance of the mass of the Republican party. In this way, most of the schemes for the expenditure of public money are carried. But Opposition gentlemen go home to their constituents and make speeches, or scatter publications among them, imputing all the extravagancies to the Administration and its friends. They say, plausibly enough, "it is well known that the Administration has a majority in both Houses of Congress; if, therefore, they were not in favor of these appropriations, they could not have been made." It is seldom that any friend of the Administration is by to put the subject on its proper footing, and when it does so happen, "it is like the voice of one crying in the wilderness;" the answer falls upon very few ears. The accusation is caught up and circulated widely and loudly; the thousands of newspapers (nearly all of which depend upon mercantile patronage) echo it and re-echo it; while the few Administration papers say but little about it, or if they do say much, are seen comparatively by very few.

With similar fairness is the Administration party called the party of office holders and office seekers. This imputation has been, in the hands of the Opposition, a spell far more potent than that of the wizard Owen Glendower; he could call spirits from the vasty deep, but we have no assurance that they ever came when he did call for them; but the Opposition, with this cry of office holders and office seekers, have operated powerfully upon public opinion, and waked up a spirit of indignation in many an honest bosom. But it is a most deceptive cry. Sir, I very believe, if all the officers of this Government could pass in review before us, fully two to one would be found openly opposed to the Administration; and of the balance, I will not undertake to hazard a guess at the number who secretly nourish discontent, and are just ready to break out with avowed disapprobation, because their own supposed merits are not more adequately rewarded. So much for office holders; and the cry of office seekers is, if possible, still more unjust. With regard to appetite for office, I will do the gentlemen in the Opposition the justice to say that I do not suppose theirs is naturally more keen than that of persons of opposite politics. Either will take office where a suitable one presents itself, if they believe, upon the whole, they can do better in the office than out of it; and if the office is not thought eligible, it will be rejected. Such is the general principle of action with both. But with the Opposition that expectation is more general, and desire more whetted by the hope of gratification, I think is abundantly evident. Under the present Administration the offices are all filled; and it is only now and then that a vacancy occurs which may possibly be supplied by one of the many deserving friends of the Administration. No general turnout can be by them expected, and a change of Administration could promise them nothing, for it would bring in those whose success they had opposed. In this state of things, with most, hope must sicken and expectation die. They live only with the very few, who are, from circumstances, placed, as it were, very near some office on which some fair promise of vacancy is written. But how is it with the Opposition? One hope inspires every bosom. They are striving for victory, and in their sanguine zeal success is, in their estimation, but waiting to crown them. When this is accomplished, the spoils are to be distributed, and each man feels that he has a ticket in this mighty lottery which may not prove a blank. Every bed will be open in this great caravansary where their political journey is to terminnte, and no one knows whether he may not be the fortunate man who will be allowed to repose himself in one of the best. From persons thus situated, then, how illy comes forth the cry against office seekers! The people, when they have a little more time to think upon the subject, will be struck with its audacity—will perceive that it is not the honest note of warning from the public watchman, but the cry of the conscience-stricken and designing, who strive to cover their own guilty purposes by unfounded and ungenerous imputations upon others.

Mr. President, I have trespassed longer than I had intended on the patience of the Senate; but in addition to the motive stated in the commencement of this address, I wished to vindicate, as far as possible, my voting on the present question in so hopeless a minority.

REMARKS OF MR. BUCHANAN, OF PENNSYLVANIA,

In the Senate of the United States, Monday, June 18, 1838—On the motion of Mr. WILLIAMS of Me. for leave to bring in "a bill to provide for surveying the Northeastern boundary line of the United States, according to the provisions of the treaty of peace, of seventeen hundred and eighty-three."

Mr. BUCHANAN addressed the Senate as follows:

This bill, said Mr. B. in effect, proposes that the Congress of the United States shall, without fur ther delay, wrest from the Executive the control of the disputed question concerning our Northeastern boundary, and assume the responsibility of terminating the negotiation now pending between this country and Great Britain. Should it pass, it will probably cut the gordian knot, and involve the two nations in all the calamities of war. Under the circumstances of the case, the proceeding which it proposes can never be considered as a peaceful and friendly measure. For a period of fifty years, our boundary has been a subject of dispute between the two nations. This portion of it has been referred to commissioners; and they have failed to agree. Afterwards it was submitted to the King of the Netherlands; and the United States rejected his award, because it was made in violation of the terms of submission. Negotiations have been pending ever since. Meanwhile the jealousies and the angry passions of the people on both sides of the border have been excited in the highest degree; contests have arisen about the exercise of jurisdiction over the disputed territory; crimination and recrimination have followed in rapid succession; and in this state of the question, we now propose to run and mark the boundary line between the two countries, and erect monuments upon it, without the consent, and in defiance of the will, of Great Britain. This, I fear, will prove in effect an appeal from negotiation to arms. There is at least so much danger of this result, that a wise and firm nation ought to be prepared to carry this law into execution by a military force. Let the die once be cast—let us once determine that the line must be run—the national honor will thus become involved in the controversy, and then no American can ever think of receding. Cost what it may, the line must then be run. It is the part of wisdom first to calculate the danger; and after you have once determined to encounter it, then to proceed with energy and determination.

There is another consideration which ought not, in the present crisis, to be disregarded by wise and prudent statesmen. The revolt in Canada has produced bad and dangerous feelings, on both sides of the line, all along our Northern frontier. It is now with the utmost difficulty that the two Governments can prevent actual hostilities between the lawless people which infest both sides of the border. There is another circumstance deeply to be regretted. Although it is well known to every Senator within the sound of my voice that the Executive Government and people of the United States are anxious to perform, and have in good faith endeavored to perform, all their neutral obligations to Great Britain, yet neither our intentions nor our actions have been justly appreciated in Canada. To say nothing of the public press in that province, which has been exceedingly violent and unjust towards our country, high public functionaries, in solemn public acts, have been actuated by a similar spirit. Even in England, a distinguished press, which is the principal organ of a powerful party now struggling for victory, and in the highest hopes of obtaining it, is pursuing a course which may eventually lead to war between the two countries. I refer to the Times newspaper, which probably exercises more influence than any public journal in the world. Our Government and our people are denounced in that press, and other kindred journals, as faithless and insincere in their conduct towards Canada; and we are accused of a disposition to wrest it from Great Britain, and annex it to the United States. Here, we all know these accusations to be unjust and unfounded; but still they are calculated to produce a powerful impression on the public mind of Great Britain. The old prejudices which were so strong in this country against Great Britain after the Revolution, and after the late war, though now they have happily almost subsided, may be easily revived by such unfounded accusations, and the people of the two free and kindred nations may again become exasperated against each other, and prepared for hostilities.

It is true, that a war between the two nations would be the most foolish as well as the most ruinous contest for both, in which two free and enlightened nations ever engaged; but that man knows little of human nature or of history, who considers such a war either impossible, or, I fear I may add, improbable.

Let no one suppose that I should dread the result of a just war with Great Britain. I have the most abiding confidence in the bravery, energy, and resources of my country. But a war, to be well sustained by the people, must be just and necessary. We must be able to appeal to Heaven, and to all nations, for the justice of our cause; and then victory, sooner or later, will perch upon our banners. I go further, sir, and state, that if we cannot obtain our rights by negotiation; if there should be no alternative left but that of surrendering up a portion of the territory of Maine, or an appeal to arms, I should not hesitate one moment in the choice. If the Government of the United States be not both able and willing to protect the territory of each State inviolate, then it will have proved itself incapable of performing one of its highest duties. An invasion of any part of our territory is an injury and an insult to the whole nation, and would be felt as such at the remotest extremities of the Union.

The question still recurs, whether, under all these exciting and dangerous circumstances, the Senate of the United States ought to arrest the pending negotiation, and assume the responsibility of running and marking the boundary. I think not. Negotiation has not yet been exhausted. I feel the most confident reliance in the justice of our cause; and sooner or later the sober and reflecting portion of the British people will, I trust, arrive at the same conclusion.

It is not my intention to examine in detail our title to the disputed territory. If I ever had intended it, I should have abandoned the intention after hearing the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER.] For clearness of statement and accuracy of detail, I have rarely heard any thing superior to his speech. I feel confident that every Senator who attended to it, must have been convinced, not only of the justice, but the clearness of our title, to the territory in dispute. To that argument I shall add but a few remarks.

Where is the northwest angle of Nova Scotia, the place of beginniug mentioned in the treaty of 1783? The treaty itself answers that question. It is "that angle which is formed by a line drawn due north from the source of the Saint Croix river to the highlands; along the said highlands which divide those rivers that empty themselves into the River St. Lawrence, from those which fall into the Atlantic ocean, to the northwesternmost head of Connecticut river." This angle then is formed by the intersection of two lines, at the point where the one running due north from the head of the St. Croix, meets the line of highlands which run southwest from that point to the northwest head of the Connecticut river; and these highlands are identified as those from which, on the north side, the rivers flow which empty themselves into the St. Lawrence, and on the south, those which empty themselves into the Atlantic ocean. Was ever description more clear and accurate? Whether these highlands be high or low, whether they be mountains or table land, can make no difference in the question. That they do exist and may be found is certain as the laws of nature. Just as certain as the Rimousky flows into the St. Lawrence, and the St. Johns into the Atlantic ocean, so true is it, that there must be a ridge which divides the head waters of the one from those of the other. There never was any dispute for more than thirty years after the date of the treaty, in regard to the location of these highlands; and it may not be too much to say, that there never would have been any such dispute, did not the northern part of the State of Maine intercept a direct communication between Nova Scotia, now New Brunswick, and Quebec. Can there be any serious difficulty in tracing this line or discovering this angle on the ground? Certainly not. And in what manner ought it to be done?

In ascertaining the true boundary of territory, whether claimed by an individual or a nation, the important point is to fix with precision the place of beginning. This is peculiarly the case, in relation to the present question. Let the place of beginning be clearly ascertained, and all difficulty in regard to the true boundary of the disputed territory will at once vanish. Where is "the northwest angle of Nova Scotia," to be found on the face of the earth? To answer this question is to settle the whole controversy.

The commissioners, who concluded the treaty of 1783, had Mitchell's map before them. This map, upon its face, appears to have been undertaken with the approbation, and at the request of the "Lords Commissioners for Trade and Plantations," and may, therefore, be fairly considered as official. It was first published in 1755. At that period, the northwest angle of Nova Scotia was that point on the river St. Lawrence, intersected by a line running due north from the source of the St. Croix. This line is distinctly marked upon the map. On the east of it appears Nova Scotia; and on the west, New England. In what manner, and to what distance, was this northwest angle of Nova Scotia, on the St. Lawrence, brought further south? In 1763, Great Britain acquired Canada from France, under the treaty of Paris. Being then the sovereign of Canada, Nova Scotia, and New England, she thought proper, in creating the province of Quebec, to extend the line of this new province to a certain distance south of the St. Lawrence; and, to this extent, to deprive New England, and Nova Scotia, of a portion of their former territory. Accordingly the king, by his proclamation, in October, 1763, describes the southern line of the province of Quebec as "passing along the highlands which divide the rivers that empty themselves into the said river St. Lawrence, from those which fall into the sea; and also along the north coast of the Bay des Chaleurs, and the coast of the Gulf of St. Lawrence to Cape Rosiers." This boundary was often afterwards recognised by the most solemn acts of the British Government, between the year 1763, and the date of the treaty. Where then did this southern line of the province of Quebec cross a line running due north from the source of the St. Croix to the St. Lawrence. This point of intersection is, and necessarily must be, "the northwest angle of Nova Scotia," described in the treaty. It is as plain, and as clear, as demonstration can make it. The description of the southern line of the province of Quebec, is identical, in this particular, with our northern line contained in the treaty, except that in the latter "the Atlantic ocean" is substituted for "the sea." This change is wholly immaterial, as both were evidently intended to convey the same meaning.

In ascertaining the northwest angle of Nova Scotia, our first duty then is to trace the southern line of the province of Quebec. I would first look for those highlands which formed the southern boundary of that province. Find them, and you necessarily find the northwest angle of Nova Scotia. Now, let any man of plain understanding look upon Mitchell's Map, and he will at once perceive how absurd the attempt is to bring these highlands so far South as Mars Hill, according to the present claim of the British Government. He will there find, distinctly marked, a range of highlands, or table land, running in a northwest direction from the head of Connecticut river, nearly parallel with the St. Lawrence, and along the North coast of the Bay of Chaleurs, which separate the numerous streams flowing into the St. Lawrence from those which flow into "the sea," or "the Atlantic Ocean." This dividing range of the sources of these streams intersects the Northern line from the head of the St. Croix, about the forty-eighth degree of North latitude; whilst Mars Hill, which the British Government now claim to be the northwest angle of Nova Scotia, is in latitude about forty-six and a half. Thus they attempt to bring the Southern line of the province of Quebec one hundred miles south of the line clearly designated by the treaty, and to wrest from us that extent of our territory. Can any human being, endowed with common understanding, looking upon this map with the eyes of the commissioners who formed the treaty, and seeing the tributary streams of the St. Lawrence flowing in one direction, and those of the Atlantic river St. Johns flowing in another, doubt that the ridge, whether of mountains or table land, which separates them, is the highlands described in the treaty?

Now, sir, what is the pretext on which the British Government assert their claim to the disputed territory? After all the negotiations upon the subject, it is confined to a single particular; and I shall endeavor to state their position fairly. They allege, truly, that the treaty description is highlands dividing the rivers which empty themselves into the St. Lawrence from those which fall into "the Atlantic ocean." They then contend that the river St. Johns is not a river which falls into the Atlantic ocean, according to the description of the treaty, because it has its mouth in the Bay of Fundy; and that, therefore, you must look for highlands south of the St. Johns which answer this description. This brings them down to Mars Hill.

Now, sir, let me state one or two of the objections to this extraordinary claim. It is founded upon the presumption that a river does not fall into the Atlantic ocean, because, in arriving at the ocean, it may pass through a bay. For example, the Delaware does not fall into the Atlantic, because it flows into it through the Delaware bay; and the St. Johns, for the same reason, does not fall into the Atlantic, because it flows into it through the Bay of Fundy. Is not this the merest special pleading ever resorted to in a solemn negotiation between nations? But to proceed further. What is a bay but a part of the ocean itself? It is a mere opening of the ocean into the land—a mere breaking of the uniformity of the sea coast by an indentation of water. These portions of the ocean have received the name of bays, merely to distinguish them from other portions of the vast deep to which they belong. And this is the nature of the argument by which the British Government expect to deprive Maine of one-third of her territory.

Again: should this construction prevail, you render the treaty of 1783 the most arrant nonsense in the world, and the wise and distinguished statesmen by whom it was framed the merest children ever entrusted with the management of a solemn and important negotiation. Although they established the boundary between two great nations to be the range of highlands separating the waters of the St. Lawrence from those which flow into the Atlantic, there is not a single river in that whole region of country which, according to the British construction, answers this latter description. The Ristigouche does not fall into the Atlantic, because it empties itself into the Bay of Chaleur. Neither does the Penobscot, because it empties itself into the Bay of Penobscot; nor do the Kennebec and Amariscoggin; because, after their junction, they fall into the Bay of Sagadahock. The same is true even of the Connecticut, because it empties itself into Long Island sound. And thus, with Mitchell's map before them, the commissioners have concluded a treaty, and described highlands as a portion of the boundary of the United States, whence streams proceed which fall into the Atlantic ocean, when, from the very face of this map, no such streams exist in that region of our territory. The description of the treaty is thus to be rendered utterly void; and the British Government expect thus to establish the position that its lines cannot be found upon the face of the earth, and that, therefore, the only mode of settling the dispute is to establish a conventional line.

But the British Government have also themselves contended that the treaty line can be found. And where do you think, Mr. President, they find it? Wherever it exists, it must be that ridge from the northern side of which streams proceed, emptying into the St. Lawrence. They abandon this portion of the treaty description altogether. They come far south of that ridge whence the northern tributaries of the St. Johns flow; they pass the main stream of that river; they arrive at the heads of its southern tributaries, and then they fix upon the highlands which divide the sources of these southern tributaries of the St. Johns from the head waters of the Penobscot. The treaty line, instead of being highlands which separate the sources of streams flowing in opposite directions into the St. Lawrence and the Atlantic ocean, becomes highlands, dividing the southern branches of the St. Johns from the northern branches of the Penobscot. The highlands claimed by Great Britain as the treaty boundary, are nearly two degrees south of the highlands specially described in the treaty, whence the streams flow which empty themselves into the St. Lawrence. This is the British pretension. What are the consequences which flow from such an absurd construction of the treaty? You interpose a great river, the St. Johns, with all its tributaries north and south between you and the highlands from whence the tributaries of the St. Lawrence proceed. You go south to Mars Hill to find another range of highlands between the sources of the Penobscot and the St. Johns, entirely different from those described in the treaty; and when you have gotten there, according to the British construction, you find highlands dividing streams, not one of which falls into the Atlantic Ocean; because they all empty themselves into bays of that ocean. You make the treaty itself sheer nonsense; and you bring the province of Quebec as far south as Mars Hill. Ingenuity can accomplish much. There is one fact, however, to which no ingenuity can give even a plausible coloring. You cannot, by human argument, remove the highlands along the northern shore of the Bay of Chaleur, which is a part of the continuous range mentioned in the treaty, in the latitude of forty-eight and a half degrees, so as to connect them in the same range with Mars Hill, in the latitude of forty-six and a half. Unless you can do this, you can accomplish nothing; because the southern line of the province of Quebec is these very highlands, extending themselves along the northern coast of the Bay of Chaleur, and throughout their whole chain dividing the rivers flowing into the St. Lawrence from those falling into the sea. It is in these highlands, and not at Mars Hill, that the northwest angle of Nova Scotia is to be found, by running a line due north from the head of the St. Croix to the point where they are intersected. Instead of Mars Hill being a part of this continuous range, in order to reach them from that point, you would have to cross the St. Johns and the Ristigouche, and travel a distance of more than a hundred miles northerly in order to reach the highlands on the northern coast of the Bay of Chaleur. Such absurdities and such contradictions flow from the British claim that it cannot endure the light of reason for a moment.

The Bay of Fundy has been twice incidentally mentioned in the treaty; and upon this foundation the whole of the British superstructure has been erected. Now, sir, can any person who reads the treaty, suppose that it was mentioned to specify a third class of rivers flowing into it, as distinct from the rivers flowing into the St. Lawrence, and those which empty themselves into the Atlantic ocean? The object of mentioning the Bay of Fundy at all is palpable from the face of the treaty. After starting at the Northwest angle of Nova Scotia, and from thence sweeping round the boundaries of the United States, it was necessary to fix precisely the point at which our eastern boundary commenced. This was essential for a double purpose. In the first place, it was the extreme northern point from which the line was to be run due east into the ocean for twenty leagues, according to the treaty; and within which we were entitled to all the islands along our coast, except those which were within the limits of Nova Scotia. And in the second place, it was the point from which our eastern line was to commence and to run until it arrived at the northwest angle of Nova Scotia. It was obviously proper to fix this point with the greatest precision in the treaty; and in order to effect this purpose, it is described as the mouth of the Saint Croix, in the Bay of Fundy. This was evidently done not for the purpose of destroying the treaty, as the British Government contend, but for that of marking this important point with greater precision. And here it may be proper to observe that the river St. Johns is no where described in the treaty as a river flowing into the Bay of Fundy, nor is it even mentioned in that instrument. The following is the language of that part of the treaty:

"East by a line to be drawn along the middle of the river St. Croix, from its mouth in the Bay of Fundy, to its source, and from its source directly north, to the aforesaid highlands, which divide the rivers that fall into the Atlantic ocean from those which fall into the river St. Lawrence, comprehending all islands within twenty leagues of any part of the shores of the United States, and lying between lines to be drawn due east from the points where the aforesaid boundaries between Nova Scotia on the one part, and East Florida on the other, shall respectively touch the Bay of Fundy, and the Atlantic ocean, excepting such islands as now are, or heretofore have been, within the limits of said province of Nova Scotia."

Another reason suggests itself to my mind, for mentioning not only the mouth of the St. Croix, but its mouth in the Bay of Fundy. Properly speaking, the mouth of this river is not in the Bay of Fundy, but in the bay of Passamaquoddy. After entering the latter bay, and passing through it, its current, as I am informed, enters the Bay of Fundy between Quoddy Head and the island of Grand Manan; and this would appear to be the case, from a view of Mitchell's map. We have every reason, therefore, to believe that the commissioners who framed the treaty, when they introduced into it the mouth of the St. Croix, in the Bay of Fundy, did it to distinguish it from the mouth of the same river in the bay of Passamaquoddy. These two mouths are some twenty or thirty miles distant from each other. This is, I believe, a new idea; but it is one which struck me with great force the first time I read the treaty, and compared it with Mitchell's map.

The remarks which I have made on the question of our title to the disputed territory, are intended by me merely as a supplement to the speech of the Senator from Massachusetts. They present some different views of the subject, and enlarge upon other views of it, which he merely touched. Upon the whole, I solemnly declare, after having divested my mind of all partiality in favor of my country, so far as that was possible, that I never have examined any disputed question in which the right appeared to me to be more clear and plain than it does in favor of the United States in the present controversy. Every new effort to escape from the obvious meaning of the treaty, only involves those who make it in still greater absurdity.

Notwithstanding these are my opinions in regard to our title, I am, nevertheless, decidedly opposed to the passage of any bill, under existing circumstances, directing the President to run and mark the lines of the disputed territory. In order to justify this opposition, it is only necessary for me to present to the Senate, not a history of this everlasting negotiation with Great Britain, but its present condition. This, of itself, will be sufficient to prove that Congress ought not, at the present moment, to arrest its progress, and take the subject out of the hands of the Executive.

Ever since the award of the King of the Netherlands was rejected by the United States, it has been the constant policy of the British Government to urge that it was impossible to find the lines of the treaty upon the ground, from the vagueness of its description. Astonishing as it may appear, they seem to have satisfied themselves that neither the northwest angle of Nova Scotia, nor the highlands dividing the fountains which flow into the St. Lawrence from those which flow into the Atlantic, can any where be found upon the face of the earth. Assuming, then, that the treaty line is void for uncertainty, the British Government have proposed a conventional boundary instead of this line, and offered to make an equal division of the disputed territory with the American Government. This proposition, for any conventional line whatever, has been rejected by the American Government; it has been rejected by the Government of Maine, and I hope we may never again hear it mentioned. The treaty is the foundation of our rights. To that, and to that alone, we ought to cling, until it shall be found, which I deem impossible, from the nature of things, that the northwest angle of Nova Scotia cannot be found, and that the idea of a dividing ridge between waters which flow in different directions on the face of the earth, is a mere delusive fancy. Then, and not till then, ought we again to discuss the question of a conventional line.

This conventional line being disposed of, and the State of Maine being thus secured against dismemberment, I hold that she has no more right to control the negotiation in regard to our Northeastern boundary, than Pennsylvania, or any other State of the Confederacy. It is natural that her citizens should be more irritated at the delay, and feel a deeper interest in the event, than those of any other State; but still it is a question to be settled between the Government of the United States and that of Great Britain. It is a question which regards the fair and just execution of a treaty between these two Governments, in the settlement of which Maine cannot directly interfere. Her representations on the subject ought to be fairly considered and justly appreciated by the authorities of the United States; but the true treaty line must be settled, not by the Government of Maine, but that of the twenty-six States of this Confederacy, which are all deeply interested in the result. And what cause has she for alarm? Justice may be slow, but it will be sure. When have the United States ever abandoned any of their rights? When have we failed to assert them at the proper moment against any power, no matter how formidable? I hold, therefore, that the Legislature of Maine has transcended its legitimate power in adopting a resolution, in March last, declaring, that "if the Government of the United States, either alone or in conjunction with Great Britain or the State of Maine, shall not, on or before the first day of September next, establish and appoint a commission for a survey of said boundary line, it shall then be the imperative duty of the Governor, without further delay, to appoint forthwith suitable commissioners and surveyors for ascertaining, running, and locating the northeastern boundary line of this State, and to cause the same to be carried into operation." Maine has thus allowed to the Government of all the States only six months to create this commission for a survey of the boundary line; and if we should not be able to accomplish it within this brief period, then she proposes to withdraw the question from us, and settle it for herself. In this particular, I fear she has manifested more of passion than of policy. I feel confident, however, that the good sense and the ardent patriotism which so strongly characterize her people, will induce them to pause and reflect long before they carry this determination into effect. If they should thus proceed, I venture to say it will be a course eminently calculated not only to embarrass the Government of the United States, but to jeopard their own rights. The time may come—although I trust the justice of the British Government will prevent it—when it may be the imperative duty of the United States to run and mark the line, and assume jurisdiction over the disputed territory. If ever that period should arrive, we must then be prepared, as a nation, to meet the consequences, whatever they may be. It must then be the act, not of one State, but of all. In the mean time, it is the policy, it is the interest, of Maine to act in such a manner as to carry with her the united sympathies of the American people.

But what cause has Maine for complaint in the present state of the negotiation? Have we not got clear of the question of dividing the disputed territory between the two countries, or of establishing any other conventional line—a consummation which she so much desired? Are we not now in pursuit of the old line of the treaty? Maine will not deny that this is the proper course. Under all the circumstances, the Administration have, in my opinion, adopted the only means within their reach calculated to attain this end.

The late President of the United States had proposed to Great Britain to create a joint commission to run, mark, and establish the Northeastern Boundary, according to the treaty of 1783, whose decision should be final. After long delay, and after many attempts to avoid a direct answer to this proposition, the British Government, finally, on the 10th January last, through their Minister, Mr. Fox, has given such an answer; and that too in an amicable and friendly spirit. Still clinging to the hope of a conventional line, he professes little expectation that such a commission could lead to any useful result; yet he declares that her Majesty's Government "are so unwilling to reject the only plan now left, which seems to afford a chance of making any further advance in this long pending matter, that they will not withhold their consent to such a commission, if the principle upon which it is to be formed, and the manner in which it is to proceed, can be satisfactorily settled." Here then is a distinct proposition on the one part, and an equally distinct acceptance of it on the other, with modifications which I need not now specially mention. It being almost impossible that the principle upon which the commission is to to be formed, or the manner of its proceeding, could be satisfactorily arranged, by diplomatic notes, Mr. Fox very properly proposes a convention for that purpose. As the British Government had previously rejected that portion of the American proposition which offered to make the award of the commissioners final, the commission will be one merely of exploration and survey, if that Government should still adhere to its first determination. But even this question may probably be open for discussion in the formation of the convention; because throughout the note of Mr. Fox there is no direct declaration that his Government will not consent to make the decision of the commissioners final. Then the whole substance of the matter is, that the two Governments have agreed to create a joint commission, by means of a convention, for the purpose of exploring and surveying the disputed lines of the treaty. It may be asked for what purpose shall such a commission be established? Let Mr. Fox himself answer this question.

"The object of this commission," says he, "as understood by her Majesty's Government, would be, to explore the disputed territory in order to find, within its limits, dividing highlands, which may answer the description of the treaty; the search being first to be made in the due north line from the monument at the head of the St. Croix; and if no such highlands should be found in that meridian, the search to be then continued to the westward thereof; and her Majesty's Government have stated their opinion, that, in order to avoid all fruitless dispute as to the character of the highlands, the commissioners should be instructed to look for highlands which both parties might acknowledge as fulfilling the conditions of the treaty."

Now, sir, does not the State of Maine believe that, in running a due north line from the monument at the head of the St. Croix, such a line will meet highlands answering the description of the treaty? For my own part, I have not a doubt upon the subject. This is the line first to be run and explored; and yet, because a mere suggestion has been subsequently made, that it is the opinion of the British Government that "the commissioners should be instructed to look for highlands which both parties might acknowledge as the highlands of the treaty," a clamor has been raised as if this expression must necessarily render the whole proceeding void and nugatory. Undoubtedly it would be desirable to find such highlands, because that would at once terminate the controversy. I scarcely expect it; but I do expect that an accurate survey and exploration of the treaty lines will produce such information; that the British Government, if actuated by a spirit of justice, which I do not doubt, will abandon their pretensions.

This question has been treated as if the two Governments, after having discussed elaborately the mode of constituting the Board of Commissioners, should enter into a solemn treaty, that these commissioners must be restricted in their search for highlands, to such alone, as both parties might acknowledge to be the highlands of the treaty. This would indeed be a solemn farce. It is what, judging from the note of Mr. Fox, the British Government never intended. This observation is merely thrown in as a suggestion; the first object of the commission, as stated by himself, being a search for the highlands of the treaty in a due north line from the monument at the source of the St. Croix. No plenipotentiary of that Government—unless indeed he should adopt the reasoning furnished to him by Maine, that the true meaning of the British proposition was only to appoint commissioners to look for highlands on which both parties might agree—will ever contend for such a proposition. The commission would in itself not only be useless, but absurd, if both parties must first agree upon the highlands. No, sir, no, sir: the creation of the commission for the purpose of exploring and surveying the disputed lines, is the substance, and the only material part, of the agreement between the two nations. How this commission is to be formed; whether it is to consist of equal numbers appointed by each Government, with an umpire to be selected by some friendly European power, or by the commissioners themselves; or whether the commissioners shall be altogether selected by a friendly sovereign; and in what manner they are to explore the disputed lines; are all matters of detail to be settled by the convention. The British Minister, it is true, expresses opinions upon these subjects, but no absolute determination. The difference between a suggestion, or an opinion, and a sine qua non, is distinctly understood in diplomatic language. Mr. Forsyth is, therefore, completely justified in stating to Mr. Williams, in his letter of the 26th May last:

"That, from the negotiation to which the British Government has been invited, the President anticipates the establishment of a joint commission, with an umpire, whose power will be restricted to the purposes of exploration and survey only; without authority, finally, to decide on the rights of the parties, as contemplated in the original American proposition. The suggestions that have been made, on either side, with respect to the mode of constituting that commission, the principles upon which it is to act, and the instructions to be given to it, are all to be discussed and decided as justice between the parties and their respective rights shall be deemed to require. The object of the President in offering to make such an arrangement, as you will see by my note to Mr. Fox of the 27th April last, is to test the correctness of the opinion of the State of Maine, that the line described in the treaty of 1783 can be found and traced whenever the Governments of the United States and Great Britain shall proceed to make the requisite investigations, with a predisposition to effect the desired object."

Mr. Fox, in his note of the 10th of January last, states that "it would obviously be indispensable that the State of Maine should be an assenting party to the arrangement." In my opinion, no such necessity existed. Were it our purpose to dismember that State, or to deprive her of any portion of her territory, such a necessity would have been obvious. But when nothing is proposed, except to survey and explore the lines of the treaty of 1783, this is the performance of a duty which devolves exclusively upon the General Government. Maine would have no right to interfere with it, even if she felt the inclination, which certainly she does not feel. But I admit it was highly proper and respectful to that State to submit to her the modified proposition of the British Government, and ascertain her opinion on the subject; and this, not that the United States would be bound by it, but that it should receive the most respectful consideration. Accordingly, before this proposition was accepted, the Secretary of State, on the first day of March last, in a communication to the Governor of Maine, which does him great honor, laid the whole subject before that State. In the concluding sentence, he observes:

"Should the State of Maine be of opinion that additional surveys and explorations might be useful, either in leading to a satisfactory adjustment of the controversy, according to the terms of the treaty, or in enabling the parties to decide more understandingly upon the expediency of opening a negotiation for the establishment of a line that would suit their mutual convenience, and be reconcilable to their conflicting interests, and desire the creation, for that purpose, of a commission, upon the principles, and with the limited powers described, in the letter of Mr. Fox, the President will, without hesitation, open a negotiation with Great Britain for the accomplishment of that object."

In what manner did the State of Maine respond to this communication? The Governor, on the 14th March last, in a message, with the general tone and character of which I am much pleased, presented the whole subject to the Legislature. To show he was satisfied that such a commission of exploration and survey should be established as that assented to by the British Government, for the purpose of adjusting the controversy, according to the terms of the treaty, I shall read a short paragraph from his message. He says:

"In respect to the proposition for additional surveys, it seems to me inexpedient for this State to acquiesce in the proposed negotiation for a conventional line, until it is demonstrated that the treaty line is utterly impracticable and void for uncertainty. I can have no doubt that the line ought to be run, either by a joint commission of exploration and survey, or independently by our General Government by its own surveyors. It is evident to me that Great Britain is determined to avoid, if possible, such an examination, and exploration, and establishment of the line, and such proof of the real facts of the case."

I trust that the Governor judges too harshly of the intentions of Great Britain. Whether he be correct or not, the event of the negotiation can alone determine.

That the Legislature of Maine were also satisfied that this joint commission should be created, provided Congress, during its present session, should not pass this bill for the survey of the northeastern boundary, independently of the consent of Great Britain, appears manifest from their resolutions. On the 23d March last, they resolved against any conventional line, and insisted on the line established by the treaty; they also resolved against the appointment of any new arbiter under the treaty of Ghent; and their third resolution declares:

"That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be requested to urge the passage of the bill for the survey of the northeastern boundary of the United States, &c. now pending in Congress and that if said bill shall not become a law during the present session of Congress, and if the Government of the United States, either alone or in conjunction with Great Britain or the State of Maine, shall not, on or before the first day of September next, establish and appoint a commission for a survey of said boundary line, it shall then be the imperative duty of the Governor, without further delay, to appoint forthwith suitable commissioners and surveyors for ascertaining, running and locating the northeastern boundary line of this State, and to cause the same to be carried into operation."

The message of the Governor of Maine, accompanied by these resolutions of the Legislature, was transmitted by him to the President of the United States, on the 28th day of March last.

Now, I ask, what could the President have inferred from these proceedings of the State of Maine? The whole question was submitted to the Legislature. They had the proposition of the British Government before them, contained in the note of Mr. Fox of the 10th of January last. They had, likewise, before them the answer of Mr. Forsyth to Mr. Fox of the 7th of February, stating strong objections to that proposition, and the determination of the President to transmit it to Governor Kent, for the purpose of ascertaining the sense of Maine upon the subject. And what has the Legislature of Maine done? They have firmly, decidedly, and, in my opinion, properly, expressed their opinion against a conventional line, and against the appointment of a new arbiter; but have they said one word against the proposed commission for exploration and survey, according to the terms of the treaty? On this point of the question they are not even silent; though silence, under such circumstances, might fairly be construed to give consent. Both the message, and resolutions of the Legislature, speak with approbation of the proposed joint commission to run the disputed line, according to the treaty. It is true, their consent was not necessary to enable the President to pursue this course; but if it had been, it was obtained.

Let us for a few moments consider this point. The question propounded to the State of Maine in the concluding sentence of Mr. Forsyth's proposition was, do you desire the creation of a joint commission of exploration and survey, upon the principles stated in the letter of Mr. Fox, either for the purpose of adjusting the controversy, according to the terms of the treaty, or for the purpose of enabling the parties to agree upon a conventional line? These two purposes are distintly and plainly stated. Now what is the answer of Maine? She responds clearly and explicitly to one branch of the alternative," that it is not expedient to give the assent of this State to the Federal Government to treat with that of Great Britain for a conventional line for our Northeastern Boundary, but that this State will insist on the line established by the treaty of seventeen hundred and eighty-three."

Why then did she not respond to the other branch of the alternative, and resolve also that it was not expedient to give the assent of the State to the proposed convention between the two Governments, for exploring and surveying the boundary line under the treaty? Had she been hostile to this measure, can any man doubt but that she would thus have expressed her opinion boldly and unequivocally, as she had done in regard to the conventional line? When the Governor declares that he has no doubt the treaty line ought to be run, either by a joint commission of exploration and survey, or independently by the General Government, what does he mean? Was there any proposition before him, but one for such a joint commission of exploration and survey as had been agreed to by Mr. Fox? Certainly not: and he gives his assent to it in the strongest terms.

Again: what is the palpable meaning of the third resolution of the Legislature? Is it not this? In the first place, they prefer that the present bill now before the Senate should pass. In the event of its failure to become a law during the present session—which I consider certain—their next preference is in favor of the establishment of a commission by the Government of the United States, either alone or in conjunction with Great Britain or the State of Maine, for a survey of the Northeastern boundary line: and in order to hasten this commission as rapidly as possible, they declare, that if it shall not be established on or before the first day of September next, they will run the line themselves. To what possibly could the Legislature have referred, when they speak of the appointment of a commission "in conjunction with Great Britain," if it were not to the proposition of Mr. Fox, which had been submitted to them by Mr. Forsyth? They had no other proposed commission before them; and they could not have supposed that a negotiation for another and distinct commission could have been entered upon and completed with the British Government before the first of September. I appeal, therefore, to the Senate; I appeal to the people of Maine themselves, notwithstanding all that has been said to the contrary by their representatives in Congress, whether the President had not a right to believe that Maine at least acquiesced in the proposed convention with the British Government. Convinced of this fact, Mr. Forsyth, the Secretary of State, on the 27th April last, addressed the following note to Mr. Fox:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, April 27, 1838.

The undersigned, Secretary of State of the United States, has the honor, by the direction of the President, to communicate to Mr. Fox, her Britannic Majesty's Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary, the result of the application of the General Government to the State of Maine, on the subject of the Northeastern boundary line, and the resolution which the President has formed upon a careful consideration thereof. By the accompanying papers, received from the Executive of Maine, Mr. Fox will perceive that Maine declines to give a consent to the negotiation for a conventional boundary; is disinclined to the reference of the points in dispute to a new arbitration; but is yet firmly persuaded that the line described in the treaty of 1783 can be found and traced whenever the Governments of the United States and Great Britain shall proceed to make the requisite investigations, with a predisposition to effect that very desirable object. Confidently relying, as the President does, upon the assurances frequently repeated by the British Government, of the earnest desire to reach that result, if it is practicable, he has instructed the undersigned to announce to Mr. Fox the willingness of this Government to enter into an arrangement with Great Britain for the establishment of a joint commission of survey and exploration, upon the basis of the original American proposition, and the modifications offered by her Majesty's Government.

The Secretary of State is, therefore, authorized to invite Mr. Fox to a conference upon the subject at as early a day as his convenience will permit; and the undersigned will be immediately furnished with a requisite full power by the President, to conclude a convention embracing that object, if her Majesty's minister is duly empowered to proceed to the negotiation of it on the part of Great Britain.

The undersigned avails himself of this occasion to renew to Mr. Fox the expression of his distinguished consideration.

JOHN FORSYTH.

HENRY S. FOX, esq. &c.

Mr. FOX, in his answer of the 1st of May to this note, informed the Secretary of State that he was not then provided with full powers for negotiating the proposed convention, but that he would forthwith write to his Government for the purpose of obtaining them.

On the 8th of May, Mr. Forsyth addressed the Governor of Maine in the following language:

I am instructed to announce to your excellency, that, by direction of the President, upon due consideration of the result of the late application of the General Government to the State of Maine on the subject of the Northeastern boundary, and in accordance with the expressed wishes of her Legislature, I have informed Mr. Fox of the willingness of this Government to enter into an arrangement with that of Great Britain for the establishment of a joint commission of survey and exploration upon the basis of the original American proposition and the modifications offered by her Majesty's Government; and to apprise you that Mr. Fox, being, at present, unprovided with full powers for negotiating the proposed convention, has transmitted my communication to his Government, in order that such fresh instructions may be furnished to him, or such other steps taken, as may be deemed expedient on its part.

It is in this state of the negotiation, the important preliminaries having all been settled, that the Senator from Maine [Mr. WILLIAMS] proposes to arrest its progress; to take the question out of the hands of the Executive, to whom it constitutionally belongs, and, by act of Congress, to run, and mark, and establish this line against the consent of Great Britain. Such a course, if adopted, might prove fatal to the interests of Maine, and would be an open, palpable violation of the public faith. Let us wait until the negotiation shall terminate. Should it ever become necessary, Maine will find me as firmly resolved to maintain her just rights, to any extremity, as any other individual in the nation. I trust that hour may never arrive.

It has been contended that to run this line could not be construed into an unfriendly measure by Great Britain. Even if the bill proposed nothing but an experimental survey for the purpose of obtaining information, this proposition could not be stated with justice, in the present posture of the negotiation. But this bill contemplates no such measure. By its express terms the President is directed to cause the disputed boundary line "to be accurately surveyed and marked, and suitable monuments to be erected thereon a such points as may be deemed necessary and important." It proposes not merely an experimental survey, but an absolute determination where the treaty line is, and to have it fixed and perpetuated by the erection of monuments. It breaks off the negotiation, assumes the fact that the British Government are wrong and we are right, and declares, in effect, that we will agree to no convention with them to ascertain this treaty boundary, in a manner satisfactory to both parties. Would the spirit of the British nation brook such a violent proceeding, in the face of the pending negotiations between the two countries? Would we ourselves, of kindred blood as we are, tamely submit to a similar proceeding? Suppose the British Parliament, at this moment, and whilst negotiations on the subject are still pending, were to direct her Majesty to survey and mark the line from Mars Hill, and erect permanent monuments along it, which they claim to be the treaty line, would we tamely acquiesce in such an act? No, sir: for one I should resist the execution of such a law of the British Parliament, by the whole power of the United States. Let us then do unto others as we would they should do unto us.

It has been suggested that this bill might be amended, so as to direct the line to be run and marked only in case the pending negotiation should fail, in consequence of the refusal of the British Government to bring it to a satisfactory and speedy conclusion. But does not every one perceive that this would be holding out a threat in advance? It would be an open declaration that if they will not negotiate in a manner agreeable to us, the consequence shall be, that we will establish the disputed line for ourselves. Sufficient for the day is the evil thereof. Let us wait. It cannot be long until the result of the negotiation shall be ascertained. Should it fail, we shall then have all the facts before us; and it will then be time enough to determine what course the interest and the honor of the country require that we should pursue.

Again: It has been insisted that this bill might pass with a clause conferring a discretionary power upon the President to run and mark the line or not, as he may deem most expedient. To this I am utterly opposed. In the first place, it would impose a responsibility upon him which properly belongs to Congress; and in the second place, it would confer a power upon him which I shall never entrust to any Executive. On the performance of this act might, and probably would, depend peace or war, although the power to declare war belongs exclusively to Congress. If ever the time shall arrive when it will become necessary to run and mark this line in defiance of the power of Great Britain, Congress ought to direct the performance of the act; and we ought to be prepared to carry it into execution by the whole power of the country.

Before I resume my seat, I desire to express my hearty concurrence in a suggestion made by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER.] Let Great Britain surrender her claims to the territory in dispute, and recognise our right to it under the treaty, as we have every reason to expect she will do eventually, from her justice and magnanimity; and then the General Government ought to use all its influence with Maine, if indeed that should be necessary, to induce that State to consent to a cession of all her territory north of the St. Johns, upon receiving an equivalent to the south of that river. In this manner, the British provinces would be rendered compact, and a direct communication between New Brunswick and Quebec would not be intercepted by the intervention of our territory. Indeed, nature herself seems to dictate this exchange. A river boundary between the two nations would be much more convenient than any other; and the territory of Maine north of the St. Johns, judging from the map, seems to be about equal in extent to the British territory south of that river. If there be a d fference in value between the two, this difference could be easily adjusted. In the relative position of the adjacent territory of both parties, it would be a circumstance ever to be lamented, if any serious misunderstanding should arise between the two nations out of the present controversy. It would be a contest comparatively about nothing.

In conclusion, I scarcely know what disposition the Senate ought to make of this bill. It would not be treating a sovereign State with proper respect to vote against its introduction. After it shall have been received, should it be referred to the Committee of Foreign Relations, as one member of that committee, I shall be in favor of letting it sleep there, or of reporting it back to the Senate, with a recommendation that it be indefinitely postponed.

NORTHEASTERN BOUNDARY.

REMARKS OF MR. HOWARD, OF MARYLAND.

In the House of Representatives, May 29, 1838—

On the proposition of Mr. EVANS, to refer so much of the Message of the President on the subject of the Northeastern Boundary, as related to the remuneration of certain individuals, to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and that the residue thereof be, for the present, laid on the table.

Mr. HOWARD (chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs) said that this debate, like one which had occurred a short time ago upon the subject of the territory to the westward of the Rocky Mountains, contemplated no vote by the House upon any controverted point, and was, therefore, important only as far as the expression of opinion by members of the House might breate an influence upon the public mind. In the course of the debate, some things had been said which seemed to him to require such comments as he might be enabled to make from his general recollection; for, being entirely ignorant until that morning of the reasons which induced the gentleman from Maine [Mr. EVANS] to make the motion which he had made, or of the train of argument which he meant to pursue in support of that motion, he was obliged to throw himself upon his remembrance of the multitudinous documents relating to the Northeastern Boundary, without having an opportunity of inspecting them minutely. Whilst the gentlemen who had preceded him were addressing the House, he had referred to some of these papers, and felt a sufficient justification for the dissent which he intended to express from some of the opinions advanced by those gentlemen. The motion was twofold: to refer that portion of the Message which related to the claims of certain persons for compensation to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and to lay upon the table the residue of the Message. Upon each of these points he proposed to say a few words.

The Governor of Maine had addressed a letter to the President of the United States, enclosing several resolves of the Legislature of that State, and claiming reimbursement from the General Government, of certain moneys paid to Ebenezer S. Greely, John Baker, and others, in compensation for losses and sufferings experienced by them respectively, which letter had been transmitted by the President to the House of Representatives; and it was now proposed to refer it to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. To this reference he had not the slightest objection. On the contrary, it would give him, individually, and, he was sure, the committee, collectively, great pleasure to re-examine the subject, and review the opinion which they had expressed in a report at the last session of Congress. The demand now made by the Governor, in the same form as before, which did not receive the sanction of the committee, and its repetition, under circumstances which manifested an entire disregard of the principle which had governed the committee in coming to the conclusion which they reached, must be construed into an implied but strong censure of that report; and he (Mr. H.) felt himself called upon to vindicate it. He did not know whether the persons for whom compensation was now asked were, or were not, the same whose cases had been the subject of that report, as, in 1837, one of them is called John Harford, and, in 1838, John Harford, jr.; and the name of Phineas R. Harford, which was before the committee last year, nowhere appears in the documents now before the House. But the principle is the same upon which all the claims rest, as will be evident from a comparison of the report of 1837 with the papers now before us.

On the first of February, 1837, the President, by message, communicated to the House of Representatives a letter from the Governor of the State of Maine, with sundry resolutions of the Legislature of that State, stating that there had been paid from the State Treasury to John and Phineas R. Harford the sum of one hundred dollars each, as a compensation for losses and expenses incurred by them in 1831, and claiming to be reimbursed from the Treasury of the United States. On the 22d of February, 1837, the Committee on Foreign Affairs made a report, from which the following is an extract:

"The uncertainty of the principle upon which the claim rests, shows the propriety of having this, like every other case involving an expenditure from the National Treasury, submitted to an examination by a committee of Congress, upon a direct claim by the individuals interested. Where a State Legislature interposes its decision, and asks that the money paid by it should be refunded, a committee of the House is placed in the embarrassing condition of reviewing the facts and principles alleged to be settled by the vote of the Legislature, or of sanctioning the inadmissible pretension, that the opinion of any one State is a sufficient warrant for a charge upon the Federal Treasury. There are cases where an expenditure by a State should be promptly and liberally refunded; such, for example, as those in which she steps forward to defend herself from a sudden invasion by an enemy, or to ward off danger from any quarter. Taking upon herself the performance of a duty which the Constitution has devolved upon the Union, it is highly proper that the Union should acknowledge the service; but, even in these cases, the practice of the Government has been to subject the claim to a rigorous scrutiny by the officers of the Federal Government."

It might be [Mr. HOWARD continued] that these principles were unsound; and the Governor of Maine appeared to think so, because, in his letter to the President, after asking reimbursement by the Government of the United States of the several sums paid out of the Treasury of the State, he says:

"The justice and propriety of granting this request, I can have no doubt, will be apparent to you and to Congress, when the circumstances under which the allowances were made are called to mind."

It appeared somewhat extraordinary that the Governor of Maine should repeat his demand upon the President, without taking the slightest notice of the fate of a preceding demand, or thinking the doctrines laid down by the committee worthy of a passing comment. So far from being shaken in his belief of their correctness, he [Mr. H.] himself was confirmed in his opinion of their soundness, and their conformity with the settled practice of the House, although he was perfectly willing, as he had said before, to have them strictly and dispassionately reviewed by the Committee on Foreign Affairs, now composed, in part, of different persons from those who constituted it when the report was made. He begged leave to test them by their application to the case before the House. On the 12th of March, 1838, the Legislature of Maine passed the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That there be allowed and paid out of the Treasury of this State to Ebenezer S. Greely, five hundred dollars; which sum is in full for all sufferings and losses attendant upon his arrest and imprisonment in the jail at Frekerickton, N. B. in consequence of taking the census of Madawaska.

"Resolved, That the Governor of this State be requested to ask and receive from the Government of the United States a reimbursement of the sum hereby allowed to the said Greely, after the same shall have been paid to him out of the Treasury of this State."

On the 19th of March the Legislature passed resolutions similar to the above, allowing to John Baker, Walter Powers, Nathaniel Bartlett, Augustine Webster, Isaac Yearington, and John Harford, jr. various sums of money in full compensation for all sufferings and losses in consequence of organizing the town of Madawaska.

Before any compensation for losses ought to be taken out of the Federal Treasury, it became those who were the only constitutional guardians of the public money, viz: the Government of the United States, in all its branches, to see that the losses were of such a nature as to furnish a proper claim upon that Government, and that the compensation allowed was of a proper amount. But if a State undertakes to decide both these questions, and leaves to Congress nothing but the subordinate duty of providing an appropriation of the amount which another tribunal has determined to be the just debt, where is the security for the public money, which is the property of all the people of the United States? What is the right of one State must be equally the right of all; and we should have in existence twenty-six keys to the National Treasury, the possessor of each of which could enter at his or their pleasure. Again: the remuneration provided by Maine, is, in part, for sufferings sustained. What were these sufferings? How much will compensate them? These are questions to be answered only by a committee of the House of Representatives, or some officer of the Federal Government, if Congress choose to vest him with the power, but by no means to be liquidated by any State Government, whose opinion is to be held as final. This is the practice of the Government, and has been so as long back as he had been able to trace it.

After the late war with Great Britain, large claims were presented by many of the States for money advanced under an urgent necessity to resist actual invasion by the enemy, and amongst these States was the one which he had the honor in part to represent. Maryland was obliged, from her geographical position, to call out her militia almost continually, and so promptly that there was no time to apply to the Federal Government; the consequence of which was that, when the war was terminated, she had expended all that constituted her capital. In obtaining the reimbursement, to which every principle of honor, gratitude, or policy entitled her, at the hands of the Federal Government, she was nevertheless obliged to pass her accounts through the ordeal of an Auditor's office, where none were admitted unless they were in conformity with the acts of Congress, and practice of the Executive Departments; and he believed that, up to this day, she was largely a creditor of the United States for sums which she had spent in the defence of the country, without stopping to look always at the receipts to see whether or not they were in proper form to pass the Auditor's inspection. A gentleman of talents and industry, afterwards a member of this House, had been appointed an agent on behalf of the State, and he had bestowed upon his duty that care, zeal, and ability, which might have been expected from his well-established character; but, still, speaking from general recollection, Mr. H. thought there were large sums expended by the State in the desultory militia warfare which she was obliged to carry on, for which no sufficient vouchers ever could be obtained, and they were, consequently, lost. But if the doctrine which is now contended for by the Governor of Maine be correct, it would only have been necessary for Maryland to assert that she had incurred these expenses, which ought properly to have been borne by the Federal Government, and from her decision there would have been no appeal. Cases might be cited, even at the present Congress, where the claims of a State for militia services in repressing Indian hostilities are passed upon by a committee of the House of Representatives, but it was not necessary to go further into the examination of this point. In all this, he did not mean to be understood as expressing any opinion as to the merits of the claims which the sufferers in Maine might have upon the Federal Government. They might be perfectly just; and, if so, he would be amongst the first to reimburse them cheerfully. All he meant to contend for was, that he might be allowed to make up an opinion for himself upon the evidence in the case; and not be bound down by the opinion even of the Legislature of a State, which, although entitled to great weight and respect, ought not to be considered obligatory. But he wished again to say that he should make no opposition to the reference of this part of the message of the President to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The other subject of the message consisted of some documents relating to the Northeastern boundary—a topic of the deepest interest. The question had been so long discussed that the papers connected with it had grown to a great bulk. The proceedings before the arbiter, of themselves, constituted a large folio volume, and this was only a part of the entire mass which it was proper to read, in order to arrive at a thorough knowledge of all the points in controversy. The gentlemen from Maine, [Mr. EVANS and Mr. FAIRFIELD,] and the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. CUSHING,] had very properly avoided a general discussion of the question, and confined their attention to a few points which were more especially brought to the notice of the House by the recent correspondence between Mr. Forsyth and Mr. Fox, now communicated to us by the President, and to those few points he would also restrict himself, digressing only to some collateral subjects upon which those gentlemen had expressed opinions from which he dissented. The first error into which they had fallen was in considering this a question appertaining to the State of Maine, almost to the exclusion of the Federal Government, in feeling and interest. He did not so estimate it. It was the boundary of the United States which was in controversy, as well as the boundary of the State of Maine; it was with the United States that the treaty of 1783 was made; it was upon the Government and people of the United States that the responsibility rested of conducting the negotiation to adjust the limits, and of bearing the consequences, if all friendly negotiation should fail, and the two nations be unhappily involved in a war on account of it. For one, [Mr. H. said,] he did not fear a war with Great Britain or any other power; and if such should unfortunately be the result of this long dispute, he had an unwavering confidence that the people of the United States would do their duty to themselves, their ancestors, and their posterity. But he desired to say to those gentlemen whose feelings were necessarily more deeply interested in the controversy than his own, because they came from States whose pride was deeply roused, that their sister States and the National Government must be permitted to pursue such course as they might deem advisable, and exhaust every possible mode of amicable arrangement, before plunging into an alternative so much to be deprecated. It was easy to account for and excuse the great anxiety of Maine upon this subject. Her territorial extent and valuable possessions were drawn into question; her frontier population were so much excited that the peace of the country, often seriously menaced, had been hitherto preserved only by the exercise of great and praiseworthy prudence. As for himself, although coming from a part of the Union which was many hundred, perhaps nearly a thousand, miles distant from the land in dispute, he nevertheless felt all that interest in the question which its nationality was calculated to inspire; and, unless he greatly mistook the character of the American people, they would stand by their brethren even in the distant regions of Maine or Arkansas, whenever the Union was called upon to fulfil its duties to its members.

But he must say, in all kindness to the gentlemen who had spoken, that they must not run ahead of the feeling of their sister States, and take upon themselves the decision of questions which the Government of the United States was alone competent to adjust. He viewed the resolution passed by the Legislature of Maine, directing the Governor to run out the boundary line, as a step of questionable propriety. If it were intended as a mere survey for the gratification of curiosity, unattended by any practical consequences, it would be unnecessary and harmless, except for the danger of being misconstrued. But he did not so consider it. It was not probable that such a step would be taken for such a purpose, nor was it looked upon as an idle, unproductive, running of the line. If it was intended to accompany or follow the survey by taking possession of the territory in dispute, he protested most solemnly against this transfer of one of the most important powers of the Federal Government to any State whatever. It was impossible to permit the peace of the Union to be put in jeopardy by any frontier State along our border which might choose to assume to itself the responsibility of settling, by a summary process, a dispute between the United States and an adjacent foreign power. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. EVANS] had spoken of the present as a "crisis" in this affair, and said that, upon the action of this House at the present session the whole future condition of this dispute depended. He has read to us the resolution as passed by Maine, upon the construction of which he [Mr. H.] wished to say a word or two. It is as follows:

"Resolved, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be requested to urge the passage of the bill for the survey of the Northeastern boundary of the United States, etc. now pending in Congress; and that if said bill shall not become a law during the present session of Congress, and if the Government of the United States, either alone or in conjunction with Great Britain or the State of Maine, shall not, on or before the first day of September next, establish and appoint a commission for a survey of said boundary line, it shall then be the imperative duty of the Governor, without further delay, to appoint, forthwith, suitable commissioners and surveyors for ascertaining, running, and locating the Northeastern boundary line of this State, and to cause the same to be carried into operation."

This resolution was passed on the 23d of March, 1838.

It appears, from the documents before us, that on the 27th of April, 1838, Mr. Forsyth addressed a note to Mr. Fox, in which he refers to the opinion expressed by the Legislature of Maine upon some other points, and then says:

"Confidently relying, as the President does, upon the assurances frequently repeated by the British Government, of the earnest desire to reach that result (finding and tracing the line described in the treaty of 1783) if it is practicable, he has instructed the undersigned to announce to Mr Fox the willingness of this Government to enter into an arrangement with Great Britain for the establishment of a joint commission of survey and exploration, upon the basis of the original American proposition, and the modifications offered by her Majesty's Government."

He concludes the note by inviting Mr. Fox to a conference for the purpose of concluding a convention embracing that object. Mr. Fox, on the 1st May, replies that, at present, he has no power to conclude such a convention, but will transmit the note of Mr. Forsyth to his Government.

This is the state of the case which has been denominated by the gentleman from Maine a crisis. He thinks that the Governor of Maine will proceed, on the 1st of September, to execute the resolution of the Legislature, and "ascertain, run, and locate the boundary." It might be so. The gentleman from Maine, no doubt, knew more of the purposes of the Governor of his State than he [Mr. H.] could possibly do; but he must be allowed to say that, if the Governor did take that course, it would not be justified by his obligations to the Federal Government, nor a fair construction of the resolution of the Legislature itself. That resolution contemplated the probability of a survey made by the United States in conjunction with Great Britain; and this was one of the cases in which the Governor was instructed to omit the survey under the authority of the State. We have then a proposition on the part of the Secretary of State to institute a survey "in conjunction," and early in May the note of Mr. Forsyth is transmitted to England for the necessary instructions of powers to Mr. Fox. The course pursued by the President is, in the highest degree, respectful and conciliating to the State of Maine, and ought to receive her cordial approbation She thinks that the line of the treaty can be traced and found upon the surface of the earth. Very well. The President acquiesces, and takes the necessary steps for obtaining the gratification of her wishes, by proposing to the British Government to run the line "in conjunction." And yet the gentleman from Maine says that, with all this effort to carry her desires into effect, without waiting for the result, she is determined to run riot, and put the peace of the nation in jeopardy. It cannot be. Suppose that, when the first of September shall arrive, the contemplated convention should not have been finally concluded, owing to whatever cause of delay or difficulty may have intervened, will it be said that Maine, like a rigorous task master, will hold the Governments of both the United States and Great Britain to the very letter and hour of her requisition? Such was not the course of reasonable men. It would be assuming a tone so unbecoming, that the great object which Maine ought to have in view—of carrying with her the sympathy and feelings of the people of the United States—would be entirely frustrated.

But it had been said that the proposition made by Mr. Forsyth is not in conformity with the wishes of Maine, because he aims at a joint commission of survey and exploration, upon the basis of the original American proposition, and the modifications offered by her Majesty's Government; and it is further said that neither that basis nor those modifications are acceptable to Maine. Let us consider this.

The first reflection which arises in the mind is the strange existence of such a debate upon such a topic in the House of Representatives. A proposal is made by the agent of one Government to that of another to form a convention or treaty; and, whilst the subject is pending, this House, which is excluded by the Constitution from all share in the treaty-making power, rushes into the discussion, criticises the negotiation, finds fault with the terms, and condems the course of the agent of its own Government; or, rather, some members of the House, for no vote is asked or desired upon the subject. But still the matter is publicly debated, and the unprosperous issue of the negotiation predicted. Would it not have been well to have permitted the constitutional functionaries of the Government to have formed the convention before thus censuring them for it in its inchoate state? Does not every negotiation, as it proceeds, vary its aspect, the two parties mutually receding from or changing their ground as the stages advance? And have gentlemen ever reflected upon the injurious consequences of debating propositions in their unsettled form? In Louisiana there is a practice of relinquishing the dower of a wife upon a general family consultation. If all the assembled branches of her family agree to the renunciation, it is valid in law. So he was informed. But a family consultation of all the branches of the Government was not the most expedient mode of carrying on a negotiation, particularly when their arguments were given to the public, and, of course, to the adverse party. In the convention, if one should be formed, the basis and modifications would, of course, be clearly set forth. Now, it is difficult to understand what they were. Mr. Fox's own understanding is this, as expressed in his note of 10th January, 1838:

"The object of this commission, as understood by her Majesty's Government, would be to explore the disputed territory in order to find, within its limits, dividing highlands which may answer the description of the treaty, the search being first to be made in the due north line from the monument at the head of the St. Croix; and if no such highlands should be found in that meridian, the search to be then continued to the westward thereof; and her Majesty's Government have stated their opinion, that, in order to avoid all fruitless disputes as to the character of such highlands, the commissioners should be instructed to look for highlands which both parties might acknowledge as fulfilling the conditions of the treaty."

The first thing to be done by the commisioners, therefore, will be to find "within the limits of the disputed territory dividing highlands which may answer the description of the treaty?" Is not this exactly what the State of Maine desires? "the search being first made in the due north line from the monument of the St. Croix." This is exactly the line claimed by the United States and Maine. Is there any doubt of the existence of such highlands in the spot where they are alleged by us to exist? There can be none. Mr. H. said that he had personal knowledge of their existence. Whilst walking upon the ramparts of Quebec, in the year 1828, in company with an officer in the civil employment of the Canadian Government, a range of distant hills to the south was pointed out to him by this officer as the highlands to which our line was claimed to run. Their distance from Quebec he did not know, but they were distinctly visible. Whether th ir vicinity to Quebec constitutes any part of the objection of the British Government to permit the people of Maine to be such near neighbors to that important citadel, he did not know; he believed that such an objection had never been expressed. But there are highlands there. If Maine is sure of this, why object to the search?

But the utility of the joint commission is further commented on by Mr. Fox, in the same note of the 10th of January, in the following extract:

"But with respect to the way in which the report of the commission might be likely to lead to an ultimate settlement of the question, her Majesty's Government, in the first place, conceive that it was meant by the Government of the United States, that if the commission should discover highlands answering to the description of the treaty, a connecting line drawn from these highlands to the head of the St. Croix should be deemed to be a portion of the boundary line between the two countries. But her Majesty's Government would further beg to refer the United States Secretary of State to the notes of Mr. McLane, of the 5th of June, 1833, and of the 11th and 28th of March, 1834, on this subject; in which it will be seen that the Government of the United States appears to have contemplated, as one of the possible results of the proposed commission of exploration, that such additional information might possibly be obtained, respecting the features of the country in the district to which the treaty relates, as might remove all doubt as to the impracticability of laying down a boundary in accordance with the letter of the treaty."

What is here said to be the understanding of the British Government as to the "basis" and "modifications" so much complained of? It is, that if the commission should discover highlands answering to the description of the treaty, "a connecting line drawn from these highlands to the head of the St. Croix should be deemed to be a portion of the boundary line between the two countries." There can be nothing in this unsatisfactory to Maine. On the contrary, it is precisely what she has always contended for, and she cannot hesitate to risk the case upon the discovery of such highlands as answer the description of the treaty. If doubts existed whether the commissioners would agree in a report, Mr. H. said he shared in those doubts. The argument was already strong enough to carry conviction of our title to this disputed territory to every unprejudiced mind; and if the King of the Netherlands had decided the case which was submitted to him, instead of going in search of a fancy of his own, he felt strong confidence that the decision could not have been against us.

But the gentleman from Maine [Mr. EVANS] complained that in the basis and modifications nothing was said about the northwest angle of Nova Scotia, which was the hinge upon which the whole dispute turned; and thought that Mr. Forsyth was yielding up an important point when he left that out o view. This complaint seemed to be entirely unfounded. The northwest angle of Nova Scotia could not be found, without first finding the highlands. The early calls for the boundary lines of Nova Scotia, before the Revolution, are for the "highlands," and the call is repeated in the treaty of 1783. It is called "that angle which is formed by a line drawn due north from the source of St. Croix river to the highlands." Starting from the source of the St. Croix, and running due north, where do you run to, in order to find the northwest angle? To the highlands. And where are they? You must find them in the first instance, and, when you have done so, you then ascertain this angle. The objection is, therefore, ill founded. The Government of the United States gives up nothing. They are in quest of the highlands, which is the very first step in the investigation. Without knowing whese these highlands are, you cannot move an inch. Unfortunately there are too many highlands, or hills which are made to pass for such, and the problem to be solved is, which are the highlands which best answer the description of the treaty of 1783? If none such can be found, then the suggestion made by Mr. Livingston, which is so much reprobated by the gentleman from Maine, may perhaps come in as a last resort for solving the difficulty. That suggestion is nothing more than an application to the case of a rule which prevails in the municipal law of England, and most, if not all, of the States, being founded upon the plain dictates of common sense. Every lawyer in the House must understand and agree that, in the trial of ejectment suits between rival claimants for land, where the course and calls for natural boundaries cannot both be gratified, the former yields to the latter. It is founded upon the obvious consideration that the compass may vary, but natural boundaries, such as a tree, a hill, or a rock, cannot change their position; and Mr. Livingston proposed that, if they could find no highlands by running a due north course, they should adopt such a course as would bring them to the highlands at such place as would best gratify the requisitions of the treaty, and consider that line as the boundary. It is true that Sir Charles Vaughn inquired from Mr. Livingston whether his idea was to run to the east as well as the west of a due north course, and that Mr. Livingston answered that the United States claimed nothing to the eastward of such a line. But this proposition was not accepted by the British Government. Its acceptance was clogged with inadmissible preliminary stipulations; and the basis and modifications upon which it is proposed to conclude the convention, must be found in some subsequent part of the correspondence. They are thus described by Mr. Forsyth in a note to Mr. Fox, dated February 7, 1838:

"The American proposition is intended, and, if agreed to, would doubtless be successful, to decide the question of boundary definitively, by the adoption of the highlands reported by the commissioners of survey, and would thus secure the treaty line."

Whatever may be thought of the proposition of Mr. Livingston, it seemed to have passed away from the view of both parties. The circumstances under which the suggestion was made ought not to be overlooked. The President had previously submitted the decision of the King of the Netherlands to the judgment of the Senate, who refused to ratify it, and passed a resolution requesting the President to open a new negotiation with Great Britain. No basis was mentioned, no clew to their opinion given as to the terms of that negotiation; no indication afforded of the ground upon which the President should place it. But he was requested again to renew a negotiation which had ended in a fruitless arbitration, and he was left to extricate himself from the difficulty, with perhaps a secret satisfaction in the minds of some persons at the extent of the embarrassment. In this state of the case, Mr. Livingston threw out the suggestion complained of, with a view, perhaps, of presenting something to the British Government which had not previously been brought before them, and avoiding the repetition of the same arguments which had been unavailingly employed for fifteen years. At any rate, the proposition was not considered in the same light in which the gentleman from Maine [Mr. EVANS] now views it, for they rejected it.

But, it was asked, of what use a survey would be? This question ought to be answered, instead of being propounded, by the gentleman from Maine, since that State appeared so much to desire one, as to be ready to undertake it at its own expense and responsibility. The note of Mr. Forsyth, read by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. FAIRFIELD,] shows that this survey is only to collect information, and that the commissioners are not to be clothed with the power of deciding the question. This was the modification of the basis of the American proposition, which it was much to be regretted that the British Government persevered in urging. A survey would illustrate one point in the controversy, which would strengthen the American argument very much. The second line of the boundary had never yet been run officially, and he was satisfied that when it came to be so, the claim of the British would be much weakened. In the course of his reading upon this subject during the winter, it had occurred to him as strange why the commissioners under the treaty of Ghent did not make the entire survey, instead of stopping short at the termination of the first line, or that which runs north from the head of the St. Croix. Finding no satisfactory reason in the printed documents, he had referred to the manuscript report of Mr. Van Ness, the American commissioner, on file in the State Department, but found no reason given there. It seemed to be the most natural course, when two different terminations were proposed of the first line, to continue the survey all round, in order to see which termination would best gratify the subsequent calls of the treaty. This was the course always in disputes about land between individuals. Who ever heard of submitting an ejectment case to a jury with only one line run out upon the plat? The first line was required to run north to certain highlands, and the second along said highlands, &c. Now, if it should be found that, according to the American location, the call for highlands in the second line would be gratified fully by finding a range of highlands exactly responding to the call, and, according to the British location, the second line would pursue a sinuous course, running round the head of some little stream, and then striking across a country nearly level, to the distance of twenty or thirty miles, in order to reach another spring, and thus making a crooked line, as serpentine as the course of the Mississippi in its most crooked parts, it would require great imagination to denominate such a line as a line running along highlands." Ranges of mountains or hills, and particularly those which divide waters flowing in different directions, are usually straight, or nearly so, and when laid down upon the map, are traced by a line nearly straight. Upon recent maps the pretensions of the British Government are laid down, he did not know by whom or when surveyed; but if there are "highlands," in the natural acceptation of the term, where their line is made to run, it is the only such range of highlands to be found upon any map of any country in the world. He did not believe that there were any highlands there, and an official survey would settle this point.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CUSHING] had expressed great but unnecessary alarm at the doctrine maintained in some of the British State Papers, that we in the United States derived our title to our country by grant in the treaty of 1783, and that, if we could not show that the territory in question was included in the grant, it belonged of course to the British. The apprehension expressed by that gentleman seemed to him entirely unnecessary, because nothing upon the American side of the correspondence had been, or could be found, which tolerated the pretension for a moment. The venerable colleague of that gentleman [Mr. ADAMS] had settled the doctrine upon this point many years ago, in an argument, which was one of the most logical and irresistible which he [Mr. H.] had ever read upon any subject. And no American statesman would ever think of adopting any other than the law thus thoroughly settled. For this essay, establishing that the treaty of 1783 was a severance of joint property, instead of being a grant from a superior to an inferior power, that honorable gentleman was entitled to the thanks of his country; and he took pleasure in expressing this opinion, although the commendation of such an humble individual as himself might not be esteemed as of much account. He thought that the anxiety expressed by the gentleman [Mr. CUSHING] was entirely superfluous. When the Secretary of State should be found to admit the validity of this British doctrine, there would be cause of alarm; and he [Mr. H.] would be ready to concur in the most effectual method of expressing the opinion of the House of Representatives upon a point so deeply involving both the interests and honor of the nation. But the accomplished statesman at the head of the State Department was too well acquainted with the history of the nation, and too much alive to whatever might touch its honor, ever to listen to or countenance such an inadmissible pretension on the part of the British Government.

INDEPENDENT TREASURY.

REMARKS OF MR. CHAPMAN,
OF ALABAMA,

In the House of Representatives, June 13, 1838—In Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, on a bill to grant pre-emption rights to the settlers on the public lands.

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I congratulate the citizens of those States and Territories in which public lands are situated, that, after three years' struggle and vigilant watchfulness on the part of their representatives, they have a prospect now of some action by Congress on a bill that is so essential to their prosperity. Representing a district so deeply concerned in this measure, I should be unfaithful to those constituents who have chosen me mainly because they had confidence in my zeal in effecting the passage of this bill, if I were not to express the views I entertain on the subject here, that I have so often declared to them. But, thankful to the members of this body for their aid in taking the bill up at this time, I shall not longer trespass on their patience than will be required to present, as briefly as possible, the most prominent arguments that occur to my mind in favor of this important measure.

Mr. Chairman, I am pleased to find from the indications we have had since the subject has been before the committee, that it is not made a party question. I hope it will not be so considered by any. Although it has been strongly recommended by the President of the United States in his late Message, and sanctioned and approved by his predecessor, yet I flatter myself that none of those who oppose the present or late Administrations will, on that account alone, refuse their support to this bill. Nor, Mr. Chairman, is this a mere local question, effecting only the interests of the new States. It addresses itself to every member, of whatever party, whether he comes from the North or the South, the East or the West, as a subject calling for his impartial and serious consideration. The disposition of the public lands among the citizens in the way best calculated to advance the interests and prosperity of our common country, must be the earnest desire of every patriot: the only disagreement is, as to the proper manner of obtaining these ends.

Having resided for some years in Alabama, and witnessed the practical operation of the various acts of Congress on the subject of the public lands, without ever having been in the slightest degree a participant in the benefits of any, I am prepared to say, that the measure now proposed is the best that can be devised for the disposition of the public domain, whether it be regarded in its effect on the revenue, the rights of those citizens immediately interested, or the application of those lands to agricultural purposes, for which they were designed.

This, sir, is no new proposition, now for the first time brought forward for the consideration of Congress. If it were an original measure, it might still be sustained on grounds that could not be shaken; but we are now enabled to bring to our aid, in supporting it, the practical lessons of experience for many years past, to show the wisdom of this policy when first adopted.

It would scarcely seem necessary to discuss the merits of the pre-emption system at this day, after it has so often received the sanction of Congress. I have, however, as a matter of curiosity, looked somewhat into the history of it, and find, that it commenced by special acts, affecting particular classes of individuals, at a very early period of our Government. Of these special acts, besides a great many others for the benefit of particular individuals, there have been, perhaps, fifty, embracing almost every description of settlers, although limited in their application. It is a strange fact, too, that many of those acts were passed for the benefit of foreigners, when our own citizens were denied the advantages. I have ascertained further, that before the passage of the first general pre-emption law, as well as since, but when no such law was in operation, the principle was not only recognised by the special acts referred to, but that, in various others, granting lands for particular objects, the rights of all occupants thereon were protected by express provisions.

On the 29th of May, 1830, Congress, for the first time, passed a general law for the benefit of all occupants on the public lands, as had been done repeatedly before, as I have stated, for particular classes of citizens, by special acts. Although that act was limited as to time, it has been revived at different periods since, until it is now considered as the settled policy of the country—as a pledge that, in all future time, those who settle down in the wilderness, and encounter the privations, dangers, and difficulties incident to an early settlement—who not only improve the land they take possession of, by their own labor and expense, but give additional value to the surrounding lands by the public improvements they make, and the conveniences they afford to other settlers—shall, in the purchase thereof, be preferred.

If, in the origin of this system, the considerations, some of which I have suggested, influenced, as it certainly should have done, a grant of the right of pre-emption to the then settlers, how much stronger must be the claims of the occupants since?

In reference to all law, it is well said, that the uniformity of it is of the utmost importance to the happiness and prosperity of the people; and in the administration of any Government, nothing is of more importance than the observance of good faith, not only towards other Governments, but the citizens of our own country. The practice of good faith, in the sense I intend the application of the term, requires, that when a system has been adopted, under which any interest or employment has sprung up depending on it, great injustice would be done to such interest or business by a sudden abandonment. When a course of policy has been pursued calculated to inspire expectations among the people, subsequent legislation ought not to defeat them. Upon this principle it was that all parties in this country, a few years ago, acquiesced in a gradual, instead of a sudden, reduction of the tariff. Great and important interests had grown up under that policy, admitted to be unequal, and by many believed to be unconstitutional, that could not have been suddenly abandoned without great injustice towards the owners, and perhaps bad faith, added to unwise policy, by the Government. The same reasoning may be applied with still greater force to the settlers on the public lands now. They, seeing the policy of the Government to protect those who had settled heretofore under circumstances less calculated to create such expectations, so frequently carried out, have been thereby induced to take possession of the waste lands, and improve them to an extent beyond those who preceded them, as much as their confidence in the further protection of Congress has been increased by repeated legislation on the subject.

The most prominent argument in favor of the right of occupancy arises from the fact of the improvement made by the first settler. At this day, for the reasons stated, such improvements are much more valuable than formerly. Consequently, the argument in favor of that class of persons has strengthened in proportion to the increase of their improvements

But the advocates of the pre-emption policy are told that every settler on the public lands is a trespasser, the act of settlement itself a violation of law, &c. and the statute of 1807 to prevent persons from taking possession of the lands of the United States, is the authority for these charges. I deny that the act alluded to has any application to the settlers on the public lands who set up no claim adverse to the title of the Government. It was intended only for those who set up adverse claims, and not for the bona fide occupant for cultivation, claiming no title against the United States. By an examination of the history of this act, (which I leave for those gentlemen who will follow me on the same side of the question,) it will sufficiently appear that it was never designed to prevent the settlement of the public lands by persons setting up no title.

But admitting it to be true that the act of 1807 embraced in its terms all occupants, it is now in effect, if not by legal construction, inoperative—a dead letter. It cannot be denied but that it was suspended while the several occupant laws referred to were in force, and that all offences (if offences they could be called) committed under it were legalized by those laws; will it be pretended, then, that a statute so highly penal could be revived by mere implication and construction? It is one rule of construction, I believe, of such laws as are not penal in their character, that an act repealing another, being itself repealed, revives the first. But this rule does not apply in the construction of penal statutes; nor would it sustain the proposition that the act of 1807 is in force, even if it were not a penal statute; for the several occupant laws that in effect, as I contend, repealed that act, were not repealed, but expired by their own limitation.

I trust I have shown that the act of 1807 is not, by a fair construction, in operation; but surely this was unnecessary, since no attempt has been made, at least for many years, to execute it. I am certain that in the State I in part represent, no instance can be given of an effort to enforce it. Indeed public opinion would not countenance a prosecution of that sort, admitting it susceptible of a construction such as has been contended for. The law of 1807, then, out of the way, those for whose protection this bill is intended present themselves as the occupants of the public land for cultivation, invited to locate upon it by the long settled policy of the Government, and they have, by that continued policy, been encouraged to make improvements of great value to themselves, and important in developing the advantages and resources of the country in which they live. The Government lands are for sale, and if you choose to have it so, I will add that they are offered for the best price that can be obtained.

This leads us to an inquiry into the operation of the pre-emption system when compared with the auction plan, in the sale of the public lands, so far as it affects the revenue of the country.

Until 1820, most of the public lands that had then been sold, were sold under the hammer; but little had then been taken by private entry. Before that, the minimum price was two dollars an acre, and on a credit for the balance, after paying one-fourth cash, of one, two, and three years. No other mode of disposing of the lands had been adopted by Congress, except in particular instances, as I have before remarked, until 1830. Under the credit system, the prices were so high that purchasers would have been utterly unable to complete payments; and therefore various relief laws were passed, granting further time, authorizing relinquishment, and reducing the amount in cash payment, &c.; and finally, the credit system was abandoned, and the minimum reduced to the present price of one dollar and a quarter. From 1820, when the cash system was adopted, to the present time, or to the last returns, the average price of all the lands sold is only one dollar twenty-seven and four-fifths cents per acre; only two cents and four-fifths over the minimum.

The highest average any one year since 1821, is only one dollar and thirty-three cents; and in 1836, when upwards of twenty millions of acres were sold, the average price was only one dollar and twenty-five cents. Since the cash system commenced, more than half the quantity of lands sold, have only brought an average of about one and a third cents above the minimum price.

All these facts appear in the late report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office in answer to a resolution adopted at the late called session of Congress. Thus it will be seen that, although the pre-emption laws of general operation have only been in force for three years, (the act of 29th May, 1830, was limited to one year, and that of 19th June, 1834, to two years,) during the eighteen since the cash system was adopted, and during the whole period the auction system has been going on, yet the average price has been less than three cents above the minimum. It will be seen further that, during the last years, the average has been only about one and a third cent above.

The additional expense to the Government attending the sale at auction, over that by pre-emption, (saying nothing of the increased inconvenience and expense to the people,) greatly exceeds the highest excess that has been obtained over the minimum, even when it was at two dollars per acre. Since the cash system, and especially for the last ten or twelve years, combinations at public sales have been so completely organized, and reduced to such a system, that the nominal amount is little or nothing above Government price, and the nett proceeds considerably less.

From these facts, the conclusion is irresistible, that, every other consideration aside, and looking at the question only as one of dollars and cents, the pre-emption policy ought to be preferred.

I have taken it for granted that it is the policy of the Government to dispose of all the public lands; and although this is the only Government that ever has exacted from the citizens more for the lands than a sum sufficient for the expense of surveys and sale, yet I have, for the purposes of the present inquiry, admitted that the object is to obtain the best price. Our past experience, as I have shown, proves that, in protecting the claims of occupants, prices as high, and after deducting expenses, even above that received for the like quantity by auction, have been realized. The next inquiry is, whether the pre-emption or the auction system is most likely to increase sales. For the facts on this point, I beg leave again to refer to the same report of the Commissioner.

The estimated quantity of public lands to which the Indian title had been extinguished was, at the date of that report, three hundred and thirteen millions six hundred thousand acres and upwards, lying within the several States and Territories. Up to that time, one hundred and eighty-nine millions six hundred and eighty-six thousand had been surveyed; of which, one hundred and seventy-two millions and upwards had been offered at public sale, and seventy-five millions and twenty-five thousand had been sold.

Since the passage of the first pre-emption law in 1830, including the whole of that year, there had been sold at the time of said report, about fifty-four millions of acres; being considerably over two-thirds of the whole quantity sold from the commencement of the sales of public lands. Thus within a period of less than eight years, and only a portion of that time the pre-emption laws were in force, more than double the quantity was sold, that had been before, from the earliest period of the sales of public lands. Admitting then, to the fullest extent, that many other causes have operated to increase the sale of the public lands within the period mentioned, still the facts stated sufficiently show, that the pre-emption acts have been the principal means of producing this heavy increase; for, on examination of the report, it will be perceived that in the years when these laws were in force, the quantity of land sold was greater than in any others.

Mr. Chairman, it has been objected by some gentlemen to this system, that it gives improper advantages to one class of citizens over another; that some are permitted to go upon the public lands and take possession of the best, while the inferior and refused only, is left for those more high-toned gentlemen, who scruple at going in the face of the law of 1807, upon the public lands, until after they have purchased. In answer to this, it would be sufficient to point to the proof adduced to show that no more than the minimum price is obtained for any land—the rich as well as the poor yields no more. It becomes, then, a question, who shall be permitted to purchase; the man who has mixed the value of his labor with the price of the land, and uses it for cultivation; or the other, who desires it either because it is rendered more immediately profitable by the labor of the original settler, and therefore better suited for the purposes of cultivation; or because he perceives that by this increased value he can realize a larger pre-emption by the operation, if he intends it for purposes of speculation? Is it the business of Congress, in disposing of the Government lands, to transfer the labor of one man to another more wealthy, and especially without bringing one cent more into the public Treasury? Or is it the policy of this country to evict from the land the industrious husbandman, who has overcome by his labor all the difficulties of early settlement—the productive cultivator of the soil, who stands ready to defend his country in the hour of peril, and turn his family from their happy home, and transfer all to the heartless, cold-blooded speculator, who offers no more? I hope such will not be the opinion of a majority of this committee.

But, sir, it is not true that the choice lands are taken by the first settlers, as gentlemen have supposed. Those who remove, are much more careful to locate upon a healthy place, having the advantage of pure water, and easily cleared to make the first crop, than they are in selecting a rich tract of land. The most valuable lands are not those that emigrants take possession of. That description of land requires more force in the preparation for cultivation, than the class of persons referred to have it in their power to obtain. Nor is it a profitable business, as has been said by gentlemen, to make improvements on the public lands, and sell them to others. The original settler rarely gets the value of his labor in the operation, and he who buys an improved place, instead of making an improvement, is always benefitted.

From the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, it appears that lands have sold more freely during the existence of the pre-emption laws. Those who have observed the operation of that system, know also that more of the inferior quality sells to the cultivators of the soil than to those who buy for speculation. When the speculator comes into the market he selects none but the most valuable—that on which he can make the greatest profit from his capital; and while it continues in his hands, the more inferior lands adjoining remain unsold. But the occupant, after he gets the quarter section by pre-emption, finds it necessary, in making out a compact farm for cultivation, to enter poor lands convenient; and as his means increase, continues to extend his settlement. By this way most of the lands of inferior quality are taken up, that would never have sold while the fertile lands in their neighborhood were in the hands of the speculators.

It is good policy, especially in a Republican Government, to encourage the distribution of lands among the citizens in small tracts, and not to favor the accumulation of a great quantity in the hands of a few individuals. particularly those who do not intend it for cultivation. By the auction system, the lands are bought up by speculators, who hold them up in large tracts, not for cultivation, but to sell out to the productive class at high prices. The speculators, not the Government, are benefitted by the public sales. They form a monopoly among themselves, to the exclusion of the settlers, who are unable to come in competition with them at a public sale. Those who want the land for cultivation can only get it by paying a high bounty to the capitalist, either by an agreement before the sale, in the way of "hush money," or a high advance on cost after. By this means the improvement and prosperity of the country are retarded, and the military power weakened. The pre-emption principle tends to make every industrious citizen a freeholder; a more independent, a more patriotic citizen. I have in my immediate district the best practical proof of this. That portion of it benefitted by former pre-emption laws, has sent out more volunteers since the commencement of the late hostilities with the Seminole and Creeks, than any other country of the same extent. By becoming the owners of the soil they feel a stronger love of country; and having received the favor of the Government by pre-emption right to their improvements, they are grateful, and ready to take up arms in their country's defence. I believe that one half of those capable of bearing arms in the section of the country referred to, have volunteered. That they were true and gallant soldiers, the officers under whom they served, have given ample testimony.

Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to examine, at this time, into the question how far, under the compacts between the United States and the several new States, there is an obligation on the part of the former to divest themselves of the lands within the limits of the latter, and in a manner best calculated to promote early improvement and cultivation. Those States are evidently much crippled by the policy of continuing the lands in the hands of the General Government, and their prosperity thereby greatly postponed. I consider the claims of the new States to have the title of the United States divested of the lands within their limits, much stronger than to extinguish the Indian title; because, in one case, it depends alone on the action of this Government, but in the other, it requires the consent of the Indians also.

It has been said by some that it is the interest of the old States to prevent the rapid settlement of the younger members of the Confederacy, and thereby prevent the heavy drafts on their population and wealth. I trust, Mr. Chairman, that such contracted and narrow policy will find but few advocates on this floor. We are one people; and what advances the interest of one section of the country, reflects corresponding benefits to another. Our citizens were once your citizens, and, I trust, still deserve justice at your hands; we ask nothing more. The improvement of the new States adds wealth and strength to the Union, lightens taxation, increases our national resources, and creates a new and extensive market for the trade of the old. We all advocate free trade: let us not, then, by a narrow policy, restrain our people from following the dictates of their own judgment in pursuit of wealth, honor, and happiness.

Mr. Chairman, having thus presented some of the arguments in favor of the general principles of this bill, I will notice very briefly the specific proposition now submitted, and a few of the objections that have been urged.

In all the former laws on this subject, provision was made, that when two were settled on the same quarter section, one or both should be entitled under certain restrictions to select other lands not particularly designated. This right is familiarly called a "floating" privilege. To equalize the benefits of such a law among those who fall within its provisions, some such advantage it would seem ought to be given. But the great clamor raised of late years about frauds committed under the pre-emption laws, especially under this floating provision, (the accounts of which, however, have been much exaggerated,) brought the system itself somewhat into disrepute, and rendered the floating principle so odious, that the friends of the measure thought it best to guard this bill as strongly as possible against any attempt at fraud or evasion, and to yield up altogether the floating feature. In drawing up the bill now under consideration, the defects in former laws, in this particular, have been, as far as experience in their operation would enable us, corrected; every avenue of fraud has been closed. It provides for those only who have a personal residence on the land; and, as the floating right for the reasons stated has been left out, all those who reside on the same quarter section are to have it in common. Other laws required cultivation; and what constituted cultivation was a question of much doubt and difficulty; and therefore that requisition was omitted, and habitation substituted; about which there can be no difference of opinion. Thus we think the bill now under consideration will not be subjected to doubt or misconstruction; and, while we have retained the main principle of the former laws, we have guarded this so, that none who do not come within the reason, can obtain the benefits.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LINCOLN] objected to that part of the bill, as it came from the Senate, requiring a residence on the 1st December last, as being indefinite and uncertain. Although I could not perceive the grounds for his doubts, yet, as it might have been misconstrued, I am perfectly agreed to accept the amendment he proposed as a remedy; that is, to require a residence at the passage of the bill, and for four months previous.

I cannot, however, consider as favorably the other amendment offered by that gentleman, proposing to exclude all from the benefits of this bill who have taken land under any former pre-emption law. This amendment strikes at the very fundamental principles of the system; and I cannot see how any of those who favor the right of pre-emption, can support it. We have shown you by the printed documents that as much is obtained for the public land by this system as any other. Where, then, is the loss to the Government by permitting more than one pre-emption? All the arguments that have been urged in favor of the right, apply to him who made the second with as much force as to him who had made the first improvement. The labor bestowed, which is the basis of the claim, is the same in both cases; and in neither does he get it without payment. My colleague, [Mr. LYON,] who is well informed as to the operation of this system, has shown most conclusively the injustice of this amendment, especially in the general terms in which it is proposed. We know that many of those embraced in former bills were allowed so small a quantity of land, that they were obliged to look out elsewhere. Others, finding their places unhealthy, had to remove.

The gentleman from Massachusetts, in advocating this amendment, which was offered by him in the Committee on Public Lands, and rejected at my instance by a majority, has thought proper to remark on the organization of that committee, too favorable, as he thinks, to the interests of the new States. In reply to that charge, I have only to say that, in the appointment of committees, it is usual, and, indeed, necessary, to select those who are most familiar with the questions they have to consider. The committees of this House on other subjects will be found to have been organized on the same principle.

The gentleman himself is from an old State, and yet I have found him generally liberal in his views of policy in relation to the public lands. He professes, however, to be an advocate of the right of pre-emption, under proper restrictions; but really I am obliged to conclude, from the character of the amendment he has now proposed, and his remarks in support of it, that his restrictions would lead to the destruction of the principle itself.

The gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. UNDERWOOD,] too, comes forward with another proposition of the same fatal character; and, after some controversy between himself and the gentleman from Massachusetts, they make terms, and both amendments are now insisted on, each fatal to the measure.

Mr. Chairman, the bill before us has, for three years, been a favorite measure with the members from the new States; they have, with fear and anxiety, watched this little bantling with a mother's care and tenderness. For months and years, indeed, we had the mortification to see it pale and sickly; languishing in disease, until we were almost in despair. By unceasing and patient attention, however, the vital spark continued to cheer us, and at last signs of recovery became manifest. It strengthened and revived; and now, when we have the heartfelt gratification of once again beholding it in full vigor and life, beautiful as the morning rose, ready to take its flight with healing on its wings, angel-like, to carry the welcome news to our humble cottages, to dispel the gloom and cheer the inmates, the gentleman from Massachusetts, and the gentleman from Kentucky, who have shown themselves hostile to its existence, come forward and propose to take upon themselves the responsible office of family physicians. They consult together and prescribe, each his dose—one an emetic, and the other a cathartic, either of which would prove fatal, but finally conclude to give both, and render its destruction beyond doubt.

The gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. WILLIAMS,] still more inimical to the family to which it belongs, proposes to become consulting physician, and advises more desperate drugs still. Under such circumstances, these gentlemen must excuse us for refusing their aid. We ask them to permit us, who feel so much solicitude, to make our own selection of doctors. They must pardon us for our want of confidence in either their skill, or their good intentions in this matter. They profess opposition to untried experiments. We will profit by their example, and rather leave the patient to take care of itself, than risk so much by a dangerous experiment.

Mr. Chairman, we are indebted to the same gentleman from Kentucky for a novel project on the subject of disposing of the public lands. He paused and hesitated, however, before he favored us with it, as if he himself wanted confidence in the practicability of the plan, as, I trust, every other member on this floor does in the justice of it. He proposes that all the Government lands (that occupied and all) shall be by proclamation open for entry at the several land offices, for the first four months, at five dollars per acre, and gradually reducing for a year, until it gets to the present Government price, without giving to those who have improvements any better claim than the speculating capitalist.

Now, sir, I was not prepared to hear a scheme so iniquitous from that gentleman, who is, I believe, a native of Kentucky, where the claims of settlers have ever been regarded, even when coming in conflict with the individual owners of the soil. But that gentleman, who claims to know much of the practical operation of the occupant system from what he has seen in his own State, has ascertained that the settler is never benefitted by it; but that the more sharp and shrewd members of society always swindle them out of such rights when allowed. The gentleman says you cannot make one of that class rich by legislation, etc.

I hope the gentleman does not favor the doctrine, that the poor are to be kept poor, and the rich are to be made richer. I am no "Loco Foco," sir; but still I beg leave to differ from the gentleman from Kentucky, when he lays it down that the situation of the class of men who emigrate to a new country, cannot be improved by a proper system of legislation." I can tell that gentleman, and the committee, that I have seen innumerable instances to the contrary. I will venture to say that many a family have removed from the old States, where they were on the parish register, to the new, and by the recuperative energies and improved habits of industry, which the products of a more fertile soil encouraged, not only become wealthy and respectable in a few years, but some have been seen participating in the legislative councils of their adopted States. If the gentleman from Kentucky despairs of making the poor man rich by legislation, I trust he has not fallen into the unjust policy of taking the little that he has, and putting it into the pockets of the waelthy. His plan evidently leads to this result, if carried out. Permit entries to be made of the Government lands, without regard to the improvements of settlers, and I will venture to predict that the case would rarely occur, that the labor of the most virtuous and industrious did not fall into the hands of the more indolent and vicious. Does the gentleman recommend a policy so fatal to the rights of the honest and useful portion of the community? There is scarcely a doubt, but that if his scheme is adopted, the poor man will not only fail to get in a better condition, but grow poorer, and the little substance he has will go to fatten the rich and the cunning.

The gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. RANDOLPH,] in a labored speech yesterday, in opposition to this bill, evinced so little knowledge of the grounds on which it is based, or the real provisions it contains, that I do not deem it necessary to reply to all the remarks he submitted. He has followed in the wake of some distinguished politicians of the present day, in denouncing the settlers on the public lands as a lawless band of desperate adventurers, etc.; the system of granting pre-emptions as encouraging vice and immorality, and irreligious in its tendency. Now, sir, I am not informed in what school of morals and religion that gentleman was reared up, or what opinion he entertains of ours, further than as he has expressed himself. Possibly he comes from the part of the country where, I understand, they take up collections in order to raise a fund to "convert the heathens in the Valley of the Mississippi." As far as my information on the subject enables me to judge, I should conclude, that we are as religious in the new States as in the old, and practise morality as much. If he is ready to take from us our homes, for which we have labored, and give them to those at the same price we offer, who contributed nothing to the improvements, I must, in behalf of my constituents, reject him as a teacher of religion and morals.

Mr. Chairman, it does seem to me, from the general course of the debate, in opposition to this measure, that gentlemen have fallen into one palpable error, at least in this: they reason on the subject, as if the bill before us proposed a donation of land to the settlers, instead of what is really asked—the poor privilege of buying the place we have improved by your implied invitation, at a price as high as any other will give. This is the simple question presented. When gentlemen can discover the mistake into which they have fallen on this subject, I trust we shall have but little difference of opinion as to the justice of the measure.

Mr. Chairman, those who have settled on the public lands, as far as concerns my own district, although in moderate circumstances in life, yet they scorn the idea of coming here in the character of supplicants at the throne of wealth and power. They are not rich, but independent. If they are not polished, according to your city notions, they are generous, hospitable, and virtuous. They have encountered dangers, hardships, and privations in making their settlements, and preparing the country for the more timid; and they now stand ready to endure others in defence of it against the common foe. Just themselves, they claim justice at your hands. Jealous of their own rights, they ask nothing of you that will prejudice those of others. Faithful and brave in discharging every duty that devolves on them as true and patriotic citizens; prompt and willing to discharge, according to the "letter of the bond," every obligation that devolves upon them, they claim of you the exercise of good faith towards them, according to your promises. They expect from you that protection in their rights against encroachment by the vicious, that, as good and virtuous citizens, they deserve. All this they justly merit; they disdain to ask more.

SPEECH OF MR. HARRISON, OF MISSOURI,

In the House of Representatives, June 12, 1838—In Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, on the bill to grant pre-emption to settlers.

Mr. HARRISON addressed the committee as follows:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I was not at all surprised to hear the remarks of the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. RANDOLPH.] I anticipated something of the kind. I was prepared to hear not only the principles of the bill, the whole system denounced, but also reproachful language used towards the settler. I am not disappointed. What but a moment ago was anticipation, is now reality. Frauds are charged as growing out of the system; and not only is it alleged that the principles of the measure lead directly to frauds and perjuries, but that those who are to enjoy its benefits, are the ready instruments of all the mischiefs with which it is fraught. And to prove the charge of fraud, certain reports of Mr. Brown, who was Commissioner of the General Land Office, are brought forward.

Sir, I do not hesitate to say that the reports alluded to, of that officer, are altogether incorrect. I know all about them. If gentlemen will turn to them again, they will see that the main one was in answer to a communication of my own as a member of the Committee on Public Lands. Knowing that many charges of fraud had been brought against the pre-emption system, and being very desirous to do all in my power to prevent the evils complained of, I wrote to the Commissioner, calling his attention to this point, and enclosed him the bill which I had the honor of reporting at the first session of the last Congress, in order that every avenue to fraud might be closed. The report just read by the gentleman from New Jersey, he will find was directed to me through the Secretary of the Treasury, in answer to a letter of mine, which I had addressed that officer, calling for all the information in his possession in relation to the frauds that had been committed under the pre-emption system. And, sir, what sort of a document is this report? Instead of being a cool and temperate document, founded upon known facts, and relying upon figures and calculations which could not deceive or mislead, it resembles more the heated effervescence of an interested advocate. I would sooner have taken it as the effusion of some of the frothy declaimers of this House, than as a grave document emanating from an officer of this vernment. The whole of it is incorrect; and what makes it worse, it bears upon its face self-conviction of the truth of the charge.

Let me read what he says. It is astonishing that any man having a standing worth the preserving, should make such thoughtless charges. "It is confidently believed that these privileges, covering at least four millions of acres of land, joined with outrageous combinations to intimidate purchasers and other unjustifiable confederacies, have diminished the receipts of the public lands in the year 1835, full three millions of dollars, at a moderate estimate below what they would have brought in fair competition." Now, sir, in this short extract, there are not less than two egregious and shameful mistakes. And I will bring this same Commissioner upon the stand as a witness against himself. By reference to Senate document No. 402, you will find this remarkable language: "By Senate document No. 376, printed May 19, 1836, it appears that the number of acres taken by pre-emptions from the adoption of the cash system to the present period, is TWO MILLIONS three hundred and eighty-seven thousand six hundred and fifty acres, for all which the pre-emptioners paid the Government the price of $1 25 per acre. Now, by the documents from the Land Office before referred to, it appears that the average price obtained for all the public lands sold since the cash system, is less than $1 31 per acre, being an excess of less than six cents over the minimum price. Now multiply the total number of acres procured by pre-emptions, as before given, by six cents, and the result is $143,259, being the highest estimate of loss arising from the pre-emption system, instead of the millions upon millions so frequently proclaimed by the enemies of the system." Here, sir, are two extracts from documents coming from the same office, which not only contradict each other, but directly disprove the charge of this sapient officer. At one time, he tells us that "at least four millions of acres" have been covered by pre-emptions; but afterwards informs us that there are but little over two millions and a half, and furnishes figures to show the fact.

What reliance can be placed in the statements of such an officer? He either does not understand what he is talking about, or purposely misstates the fact.

The second mistake made by this officer, is so palpable from his own data, that I wonder it did not occur to him as he was penning it. He says there are "at least four millions of acres covered by pre-emptions," and that the Government lost in 1835, "full three millions" by the system. How is it possible? A loss of three millions of dollars upon four millions of acres of land bought at the Government price! The idea is preposterous. I should be glad if the gentleman from New Jersey, who has dwelt so long and so feelingly on this point, would make the calculation, Let him try it, and see if he can make out a loss of three millions of dollars upon the purchase of four millions of acres at $1 25 per acre.

Sir, I assert it to be true, and the documents now before me will show it to be so, that up to this period there have not been more than about three millions of acres of land taken up by pre-emptions; and that the loss to the Government—if it can be called a loss—scarcely exceeds two hundred thousand dollars! Documents from the Land Office, laid upon our tables this session, will demonstrate what I have said; and in the face of these facts, we have it constantly wrung in our ears that millions have been lost by the system. Sir, wishing to observe some system in my remarks, I will not now dwell longer on this point; but, after touching upon other topics, will again call your attention to it before I take my seat.

It has been the policy, Mr. Chairman, of all Governments, to encourage the system of settling its waste lands. The wisdom of such a course has been abundantly established by the fruits of the measure. Spain, France, and England, pursued this policy with all the lands which they owned on our continent. Nor were they satisfied with making mere donations; for they not only gave away the lands gratuitously, but rewards were offered, and indulgences extended, to those who would go upon the lands, settle, and improve them. They justly measured the value of land by the labor and improvements put upon it, and the strength and power of a country by the population it contains. To accomplish purposes of so important a character, they wisely pursued the course I have mentioned.

If a system, sir, so universally adopted, is right with respect to other Governments, is it not also right with regard to our own? Indeed, it should be a favorite measure with us; for never, in the history of the world, was there a Government that should so perseveringly pursue and carry out the system. It peculiarly becomes us; it comports with all the principles upon which our Government is established, and recognises the importance of the station of being a citizen of the country. I go farther: I maintain that—each individual of our country being a constituent member of the Government—an integral portion of the sovereign power—it is our high and solemn duty, as legislators, to adopt such legislation as will make every citizen a freeman indeed, by making him independent—by extending to him those facilities which will place him beyond the power of want, and enable him to live as becomes one invested with a portion of the sovereign power, having high and important duties to discharge to himself and his country. It is not the number, but the condition, the comfortable condition, of the number, that constitutes the real wealth and true greatness of a people. Paupers and vagabonds may fill up a country, but they neither add to its wealth, nor do they contribute to its strength. The rays which illuminate the path of a nation to greatness and glory, can only issue from a people blessed with the comforts of life, and above the necessities which lead to vice. Let them be independent, and they are virtuous; let them be independent, and they are soon well informed; for they have then the time to spare, and the pride to stimulate them, to devote their attention to the great cause of education. Are not these considerations worthy of the profound regard of the American legislator? What possible mode could you adopt so well calculated to develope all that is great and noble in the character of a people, as that of making every citizen of the country a freeholder—the lord of the soil on which he lives?

That the pre-emption system is right—although not as liberal as I could wish it—and no innovation, is proven from the fact that not only has the Federal Government, but every State in the Union having public lands, adopted it.

[Here Mr. LINCOLN rose and said he would beg leave to say to the gentleman from Missouri that he was mistaken; that Massachusetts never had any such laws; and hoped that the gentleman would make the necessary correction in his printed speech.]

Mr. H. continued: Mr. Chairman, if I am in an error, I will correct it. But I do not think I have committed any error on the subject. I made a particular examination of the laws of all the States on this head; and found that every one owning public lands, without exception, had either passed pre-emption laws to protect the settler, or had adopted principles of a similar character.

I have references to those laws, and among them to the laws of Massachusetts and to the page, which I will re-examine when I close. But, sir, I call upon other gentlemen from the old States to notice the references which I shall give, and to deny, if they can, the policy which I say has been pursued by their States. Gentlemen can readily see what application I mean to make of these facts.

The States that I am alluding to not only passed laws of the kind I am speaking of, but their legislation on the subject was of the most liberal character; much more so than the legislation of Congress.

Virginia, for more than a hundred years back, adopted and pursued this policy; in some cases giving to the settler two hundred acres, and exempting him from taxes for twenty years.

New York, also, had her pre-emption laws; and so particular was she to protect the settler, that she passed a law compelling any person who might buy over his head to pay him for his improvements.

Maryland had her pre-emption laws, certainly as far back as 1788, and perhaps much earlier.

South Carolina also; and in the preamble to the law which she enacted, the reasons for such a measure are forcibly and most eloquently set forth.

Georgia, too, is found among the number. She went farther than the granting of pre-emptions—she allowed head rights; and so extremely anxious was she to have her waste lands settled and cultivated, that the Governor was authorized and required by act of her General Assembly to invite settlers to the State by proclamation.

North Carolina is also found sustaining the good cause. And so particular was this State on the subject, that she made it one of the conditions, expressly, in her deed of cession, that the Federal Government should protect settlers in their pre-emption rights.

Quite sure that I am not mistaken in my reference to Massachusetts, I will speak of what she has done, and correct it hereafter, if in an error. Her laws were of the most liberal character, giving to each settler a lot of one hundred acres for five dollars, requiring him to erect a house within one year, and to have ten acres in cultivation within five years.

[Here Mr. LINCOLN again rose and remarked: If the gentleman will permit me, I will show that he is under an entire mistake. He has gone and got this old book, containing our colonial laws two hundred years old, to prove that Massachusetts had pre-emption laws. I protest against those laws being brought here to prove the point the gentleman is aiming to prove.]

Mr. HARRISON continued. Mr. Chairman, I do not now recollect, and cannot say, what book it was, from which I got the extract I have quoted. I still think I am right; but if wrong, will do as I have promised.*

Pennsylvania, too, adopted a liberal policy with her public lands. And as late as last year, there was a meeting of a portion of her citizens, who avowed the same principle that I am now contending for, in a matter which related to their personal interest; and for the benefit of the members from that State, I ask that it may be read.

"LAND MEETING.—At a very numerous meeting of the citizens of Bradford co. Pa. held on Saturday, the 7th day of October, 1837, at the house of Dr. Theodore Wilder, in Springfield township, Elam Bennet, esq. was called to the Chair, and John L. Webb and Zeno Remington chosen Secretaries.

The object of the meeting having been stated, the following preamble and resolutions were unanimously adopted.

Whereas, a large portion of the settlers in Northern Pennsylvania entered upon the lands, then a wild and rugged forest, with the full belief that the legislative enactments of the Commonwealth guarantied to them the quiet enjoyment of their domiciles when rendered valuable by the labor of their own hands, at the prices for which the State sold her lands:

And whereas, their just hopes have been prostrated by the judicial decisions of our higher courts, which have confirmed the claims of an European aristocracy to large bodies of these lands, contrary to the primary intention of the Legislature, by reason whereof the hardy yeomanry of the country, after years of toil and privations, find themselves unable to meet the demands made upon them, and are liable to be cast in destitution upon the world, (many of them at an advanced age,) without the means of support; thereupon,

Resolved, That the Legislature, as the guardians of the rights of all the citizens of the Commonwealth, are confidently looked to as the tribunal from which a just remedy in behalf of the just rights of the settlers is to emanate.

Resolved, That the lands in Northern Pennsylvania having been rendered valuable by the labor of the settlers, it is unjust that they should be ejected therefrom without an equivalent for their labors; and that the Legislature be earnestly and respectfully memorialized to pass a law providing for the payment of a just compensation for their betterments, before they are allowed to be dispossessed.

I come now to Kentucky, the land of my nativity, and I am indeed gratified to have it in my power to show the noble stand which she took in her earliest legislation, and has ever since maintained, to protect the hardy settler, who, in spite of difficulties and dangers, sought a home in the solitude of the wilderness. No State has been more liberal. Every indulgence was granted that was asked for. And it is with no less pride than pleasure that I mention the remarkable fact, that her legislation on this subject increased in liberality from the time it was commenced. At first, settlers were allowed so much land for a certain sum, which was to be paid down. Afterwards they were indulged with a short credit. In a short time, a longer credit was given, and the price reduced. Again, the credit was still further extended, and the price reduced to a trifle. It is now almost nothing, being but ten cents the acre; and the proceeds go to the counties, in which the land lies, to make bridges, and other works of internal improvement. Here is a worthy example. Not only are pre-emptions allowed, but pre-emption and graduation go together hand in hand, to aid the bold and hardy pioneer to procure a home, and the State to get a useful and independent citizen.

Such, sir, has been the legislation of the different States of the Union on the subject. And, now, I would ask why has it been done! Say, what motive prompted such legislation? What influence stimulated to the adoption of such a policy? Is it wrong?—wrong in theory, wrong in practice? Why then have so many States, without any connection in their legislation, without any connection in interest, adopted and carried on and sustained it for such a series of years? Answer me. What inducement led to the system? Will any gentleman here undertake to deny the justice of the principle? Sir, a measure which has received the sanction of so many different Governments—has been so often and so long favored by their legislation—that has been asked for and sustained by so many different people, must not only be right in policy, but right within itself, founded upon the eternal and immutable principles of justice, and resting upon that consciousness within, which not only enables us to see, but to feel, the righteousness of the act we perform. All that ever stimulated a people to seek a high and noble destiny, was the salient and originating principle that prompted the different States to adopt the system. And now, sir, that the States have no more public lands, has the principle changed? What spirit of evil has come over us, that it is now less applicable to our people, our country, and institutions, than when this mighty domain was held by the States?

* The day after I delivered my speech, I made a particular examination into the laws of Massachusetts, and found that, by a law passed in 1815, commissioners were appointed, who were to lay off the public lands in a given number of lots, each lot containing 100 acres. Each alternate lot was to be sold for $5, to such as would settle upon the same, and give bond to erect a house within one year, and have ten acres in cultivation in five years. I gave the book to Mr. PRENTISS of Mississippi, as he was speaking, who read the section referred to, and sustained me in my position. In my opinion, it is of a more liberal character than the laws of Congress allowing pre-emptions. What Western man is there, desirous of getting a farm, that would not give a similar bond?

I can add to the proof already advanced of the justice of the principle, the weight of that of the General Government. From the time that these lands were ceded up to the present period, the General Government adopted and continued the system. Why should we abandon it now? What reason operates now, which never existed before, that should induce us to give it up? None whatever. For more than forty years, Congress has passed pre-emption laws; and it is now too late to object. You have, in fact, invited men to become settlers; you have virtually told them to go upon the public lands and improve them. Supposing you sincere, they had no hesitation in going upon the lands, and there bestowing their labor, believing that you would do for them what you had done for others. If they have done wrong, you have done worse, because it was your uninterrupted policy on this subject that led them into the error.

I know full well, Mr. Chairman, what has been said of the settlers of the new States. I know how they have been denounced and abused. I know the reproachful epithets that have been heaped upon them. I know that they have been called "plunderers," "lawless depredators,"&c. but, sir, no man knows better than I do how unjust and inapplicable are all these harsh epithets. It is at all times painful to hear any class of the citizens of our country denounced by any reproachful language, or brought within the scope of any general charges; but it has been done—most unjustly done; and I am determined to vindicate them as they deserve.

Sir, it is in my power to vindicate them. My personal intercourse and personal acquaintance with these men, enables me to speak what I know to be facts. It is utterly false that they are obnoxious to the epithets which have so wantonly been lavished upon them; and the man, whoever he be, that here or elsewhere, in or out of this House, chooses to apply such epithets to these men, I pronounce to be guilty of a foul and wilful calumny. I know them well. I have eaten at their board, slept under their roof, and mingled with them in their intercourse with the world; and a more kind, hospitable, brave and generous people I defy the world to produce. They, in truth, are the fathers of the country. Every State in this Union has had its settlers—men, brave and daring, who went into the wilderness as pioneers, opening and preparing it for the more timid who were to follow. It is these men who give character and tone to the generation that follows them; and it is to such men that the West owes its character for bravery and chivalry. Sir, men who go into the deep solitudes of the wilderness, seeking a home for themselves and their families, risking their lives at every step, ready for any danger, and prepared for every difficulty, giving up most of the comforts of life, and subjecting themselves to hardships, which you and I would consider the heaviest punishment that could be inflicted upon us, are not the men to be guilty of the foul charges that have been alleged against them. The God of Heaven never ordained that the noble qualities of virtue, patriotism, courage, and noble daring, should be found in the same bosom with treachery and baseness. No, sir. The high tone of character of the Western settler is far above that deep abyss of vice to which some seem so willing to consign them. They are the best blood of the country; and, if they are deficient in those accomplishments which a liberal education affords to others, they make up for the loss in the possession of qualities of a sterner cast, which belong only to them. And it affords me a self-gratification, which none but he who is acquainted with them can experience, to say that I am proud of being the representative of such men. Others may affect to be ashamed of representing such a class of men; but I am not, and nothing shall deter me from doing them the fullest justice. I am no more ashamed of the settlers of the West—ay, squatters, if you will have it—than should the proud and lofty-toned "old Virginia" be that her first mothers were women who were brought from England, put up at public auction, and bought by the planters for a few pounds of tobacco.

Strangers might well suppose, from the denunciations employed against these men, that they were as low and degraded in intellect as they are charged to be abandoned in moral principle. I am truly happy that I have the opportunity of furnishing you with a specimen of their intellectual powers. The paper which I ask to be read, is a memorial of a portion of the settlers of Illinois, asking Congress to pass the pre-emption bill.

"In the further execution of what we conceive to be duties devolving upon us, in virtue of our appointment, we are constrained to say, that it is not without feelings of surprise and regret we have heard, especially within the last year, that unfounded reports are put in circulation, impugning, in general and no very measured terms, the character, motives, and objects of the settlers upon the public lands, representing them (in the use of epithets which neither a just self-respect, nor a due regard for dignity of your honorable body, will permit us in this place to repeat) as men without character and without rights. We are pained to observe that many of these fallacious reports are gaining credence, and, becoming the theme of conversation in the older States, have found their way into the public prints, and have even been echoed from the walls of the Capitol.

"As settlers on a portion of the public lands not in market, we feel it incumbent on us to assume a portion of the responsibility and odium (if such it is) of these attacks; and knowing that falsehood, often and confidently repeated, sometimes gains the credit due only to truth; and believing that these fabrications are, in their tendency and design, directly subversive of the just rights of those whom we represent, we could not pass them in silence, without a gross dereliction of duty.

"If you ask, then, 'who are the settlers on the unsurveyed public lands?' we answer for the northern section of the State of Illinois, we are your brethren. Our number includes natives of all the eastern, middle, southern, and older western States of this great confederacy; whose character for intelligence, industry, and moral worth, would not (we venture to assert) be disparaged by a fair comparison with the communities which they have left.

"Invited hither by repeated acts of our own Government; from time to time extending protection to the hardy pioneer, who bears the heat and burden of the day in reclaiming the wilderness; converting the haunts of the prowling wolf, and the roaming savage, to the delightful abodes of civilized man; we were impelled to accept the invitation, by that spirit of enterprise which constitutes the distinctive feature and the peculiar boast of the American character.

"We are engaged in the quiet pursuits of agriculture and its kindred employments; and in a country which, three years ago, was little better than a desolate waste, are now to be seen comfortable dwellings surrounded by valuable improvements. Water power is being improved; and saw and grist mills are built or rising in every direction.

"We have churches—not stately temples, but bands of devout worshippers, who, prizing above all price their personal interest in the Christian religion, and regarding it as the surest basis of individual happiness and of general prosperity, feel bound, as parents and as citizens, to provide for the early establishment of its institutions amongst us.

"We have ministers of the Gospel: men respectable for talents and estimable for piety, whose cheerful diligence in the duties of their calling, under severe hardships and privations, has won for them our confidence and affection, and will cause them to live long in the grateful remembrance of our children.

"Thus, while struggling with the difficulties ever incident to new and frontier settlements, we have not lost our regard for the maintenance of good order, nor our respect for the laws of our beloved country. And we are at the same time making, as we think, large sacrifices and strenuous exertions to uphold the standard of a pure and elevated morality amongst ourselves, and to provide for the intellectual and moral improvement of the rising generation.

"If such is the general character of the body we have been appointed to represent, (and we rest all claims to your favorable regard upon the correctness of the foregoing statements,) are we then to be considered lawless depredators on the public property? Are we to be regarded as mere trespassers, already beyond the pale of a liberal protection? Are we not, in fact, located on the public lands under circumstances precisely similar with those who have settled a large portion of them heretofore, and who have been repeatedly confirmed and protected in their possessions by the legislation of Congress?

If a different policy were now to be adopted; if, regardless of the value which the toils and expenditures of actual settlers have conferred on the public lands around them, their own improvements were to be set up for sale to the highest bidder; nay, more, if by some new regulation the present inhabitants on the unsold land were to be placed completely within the grasp of the wealthy speculator—what, we ask, would be the consequence? Would the great and paramount interests of the Union be benefitted? It is barely possible that our overflowing Treasury might receive a temporary accession, while thousands of worthy citizens, with rising families, would be beggared. The prosperity of our rising State would suffer a withering blight, and (we must be permitted to add) our nation's honor would contract an indelible stain."

Does this show any thing like a degraded ignorance? The vainest of this body might well be proud to be the author of such a piece. It contains an eloquence which burns upon the lip, because it comes warm from the heart.

It is a very common opinion, I know, that the General Government has done much for the West; and the gentleman from New Jersey took occasion to allude to it. I do not mean, by any thing I may say, to excite sectional feelings; nor do I desire to offend the sensibilities of any gentleman by my remarks on this head. A careful examination of this point will show the contrary. Those who so flippantly speak of this, by way of showing the many obligations of the West to the old States, do not know the ground they stand on, and take a leap in the dark, when they make the assertion. The fact is, there has been something of a feeling of opposition to the West, from the first deeds of cession to the present hour. How else can we account for many strange acts of legislation on this subject? After the cession of the lands to the General Government, the attempt was made that every previous township should be sold out complete, before another should be offered for sale. Then the proposition was submitted, that 640 acres should be the smallest tract sold. If these propositions had been carried, what would have been the present condition of the West? A wilderness, with prowling beasts roaming where now are towns and villages, and cultivated fields.

Is it the result of accident that the resources of the West have been locked up? Look at the mineral lands, the saline lands, and salt springs, so abundant in the new States, and tell me what it was that induced you to reserve them from sale? What but a sordid feeling, which led you to believe that, by withholding them from private enterprise, you could suddenly amass immense wealth by monopolizing them, in spite of the experience of every day, which taught you that at best you was but a bungling operator. Look at the private land claims that yet cover the territories of Missouri, Arkansas, Mississippi, and Louisiana, in the face of that treaty in which you solemnly plighted your faith that those who were transferred to our Government, should be protected in their private rights. More than the third of a century has elapsed since the date of the treaty, and these rights not yet protected! But the injury to private individuals is not all that has been done. The States in which these claims are to be found, are to be harassed for years to come with lawsuits, growing out of the course that has been pursued; and many portions of them are doomed to be a wilderness, because you will not take the necessary steps to have them finally settled.

I will now reverse the picture. What has the West done for the General Government? Western enterprise has made you rich. It is the labor of the Western man that has given value to your lands. It was Western bravery that redeemed them from the hands of the savages; and what was the assistance of the Government to the West in thus redeeming the country from the possession of the savages? None. Tennessee fought through a twelve years' war without any. Kentucky, in her fifteen years' war, received none until about the close of it. Your lands have been redeemed by the sweat and the labor and the sufferings of the Western pioneer, and made valuable by the price of his blood. But, sir, if the labor we have bestowed, the improvements we have made, and the blood we have spilt in acquiring the country, will not entitle us to consideration, then I would ask you to look to the revenues you have derived from that quarter. Go to the city of New Orleans, and examine the amount of her exports and imports; and after you have made a calculation of the revenues that have been derived from that single port, then deny, if you can, that you have not long since received an equivalent for your lands. You have been more than paid in hard dollars.

We are a neglected people. Ours is a farming interest; you have done nothing to aid it. But year after year, you make appropriations, and millions upon millions you spend, to protect commerce—to assist and extend facilities to the mercantile interest. At this time, every sea on the globe is whitened with the sails of our navy, which has been distributed throughout the earth to give protection to our commerce. I do not complain of this; I only complain of the exclusiveness of your fostering care. It was but the other day that hundreds of thousands of dollars were appropriated to fit out an exploring expedition; an expedition expressly designed to advance, assist, and give further advantages to commerce. This is not all. I address myself to certain gentlemen of this House, and ask them to turn their attention to the fisheries, and to see that here, we not only give all the protection which they could ask, but that, in addition to this, we give bounties to vessels engaged in the trade. Yes, sir, bounties in the nature of a reward to carry on a certain branch of industry! Are gentlemen coming from the section of the Union where these bounties are allowed, prepared to vote against the pre-emption bill?—a bill which does not merely give a home to those entitled to its benefits, but which adds to the permanent wealth of the country by enlarging its producing means. The great wealth of a nation consists in its agricultural and planting interests. It is these that give an impetus to, and feed, commercial pursuits. They are the fountain that waters and fertilizes every department of industry; the life spring that sets in motion, and sustains in their movements, all the various branches of business that lead to a nation's prosperity. And there is no branch of trade in the whole department of political economy that is so peculiarly proper for our Government to foster and cherish as the agricultural interest. It is not only compatible with, but exactly suits, the genius and spirit of our Government. Rural pursuits withdraw us from the scenes of vice and crime. The life of the farmer is the life of virtue, of peace, and contentment. As an index to the condition of the country populated with these "plunderers" and "depredators" of the public lands, and as a further specimen of their character, I gladly seize upon this occasion to read from the Columbia Patriot of the 12th of January, 1836—a paper printed in the town of Colnmbia, in the State of Missouri—a statistical account of crimes that had been committed in that county from the time it had been organized up to the time of the issuing of the paper.

STATISTICS FOR BOONE COUNTY.

Boone county is supposed to contain at the present time about 13,000 inhabitants. As an index to the moral condition and character of the people, we offer the following table, which exhibits accurate statistical results upon the subject of crime committed within i s limits since it was organized as a county, embracing a period of nearly sixteen years:

Crimes.	Number of trials as shown by the records of the Court.
Murder,	none.
Manslaughter,	none.
Robbery,	none.
Duelling,	none.
Burglary,	none.
Arson,	none.
Perjury,	none.
Forgery,	none.
Rape,	none.
Seduction,	none.
Bigamy,	none.
Adultery,	none.
Larceny,	Three convictions, (two white men and one negro.)

Here, sir, is a display of virtue and moral rectitude which you cannot show me in the States of those who are so ready to cast reproaches upon us; and I feel proud of the honor of being the representative of such a people.

It is the farming interest that constitutes the solid wealth and real glory of a Government. A man who is a freeholder has the means of educating his children; and the very fact that he is so, infuses into him a feeling of pride which prompts him to give that attention to this great subject which otherwise might never have engaged his mind.

Let me, then, entreat you to relax your grasp. Our land system is the most rigorous of any on earth. We are the only people who have ever attempted to speculate upon our public lands. The whole system is at war with nature. The earth was given to man to cultivate and to live upon it; and it was a high command, which we cannot question, that directed us to replenish it.

But gentlemen express a fear that these laws will soon consume the public lands, and that the Government will lose millions by them. Never was there a greater fallacy. The Government loses nothing by pre-emption laws. By an examination of a document, from the Land Office, which I hold in my hand, laid upon our tables this session, it will be seen that the average excess over the minimun price, from 1st July, 1820, when the cash sales commenced, to the 30th September, 1837, is but two cents and four-fifths of a cent per acre. About three millions of acres only have been taken up by pre-emptions. Now, if any one will make the estimate, it will be found that the amount which it is said the Government loses by the pre-emption system, does not amount to the incidental expenses attending the auction system, which, by reference to another document now before me, will be found to be $362,957 17. Sir, is this worth quarrelling for? Is it worth the grave discussion we are now carrying on? It is humiliating to think that we are consuming the valuable time of this House about so miserable and paltry a matter.

The true secret of the opposition of some is, that the system drains the old States of their population. This is a sordid and seifish consideration, which I fain would hope is not seriously entertained by many. What of it, if population does go from the old to the new States? It is all one common country, having one common destiny; and whether in weal or in wo, we shall all be equally the common recipients of the cup that may be offered us. We should think and act upon more expanded views. There are some, east of the mountains, who have taken a wider range, a more comprehensive scope, of the effects of this measure; and, taking a survey of the whole as one people, have, as liberal and high-minded statesmen, given it the strength of their talents and influence. Time will not obliterate the deed from the memory of a grate ful people. Long, long, will it be remembered; and many will they be whose hearts will beat high at the mention of those distant friends of the East, who came to their relief in the time of need, and assisted in furnishing them a home.

The true policy of the Government is, to sell these lands as soon as possible; to get rid of the whole system, as not only vexatious to itself, but as cramping the energies of a vigorous people, and blighting their fairest prospects. The speedier it is done, the better; for, in doing it, you increase the number of those who will by the policy become independent and happy, and then you make the States in which the lands lie, what they should be, really free and sovereign.

I have here touched a theme that should enlist the attention of States Right men. This I consider the most prominent point in our whole land system. Will any gentleman here say that we are free, sovereign, and independent States? I mean as free, sovereign, and independent as the old States? I know that we are said to be such; but it is a mockery—a vile mockery as was ever uttered. How are we as free, sovereign, and independent as the old States, when you hold within our limits upwards of three hundred millions of acres of land, over which we have no control, and can exercise none; we cannot tax it, nor indeed can we tax it after the General Government has parted with its interest in it, until five years shall have elapsed from the day of sale. More than all this, the State tribunals cannot make an order for the establishment of a road, without becoming trespassers, and yet we are called free and sovereign! It is out of courtesy, I presume, that we have the privilege of applying to ourselves these high-sounding words; for were it done in sincerity and in good faith, according to the spirit of the Constitution and the literal meaning of the resolutions of Congress in 1780, your land system would vanish in an instant before the real and omnipotent presence of sovereignty.

But the system is liable to other objections. It operates most oppressively upon us. Having no lands of our own from which to raise taxes, we are necessarily compelled, for the purpose of carrying on our Governments, to levy a heavy poll tax, and a heavy tax upon personal property; such a tax as the people of the old States would not bear with. But we bear them without complaining, because we know how unavailing would be our murmuring, although free, sovereign, and independent.

Sir, no people ever attained the pitch of power, of wealth, and of influence, that the West has done, who had to contend against so many difficulties and obstacles as we have found in our path wherever we travelled, and around us in whatever direction we turned.

We are constantly drained of our money by the system. We have paid more than one hundred millions for the lands that we have purchased of you, and that money has gone to the sea board, and there been expended upon fortifications, light houses, and other works of the kind. In this silver stream that has been running and rushing from the West to the East, ever since the existence of the land system, there is no ebb to throw back the mighty current from whence it issues. We have no trade with the East by which we can get back the money that is sent across the mountains. And yet, sir, we have not only lived in spite of this eternal exhaustion, but we have grown, and strengthened, and flourished under it, arising from that indomitable spirit of enterprise which so peculiarly characterizes the western man. Our difficulties have been many, our trials severe, and we consider that we are entitled to the favorable consideration of the General Government.

The rejection of this bill will not profit you a farthing: in no way can you gain by it. But pass it, and you will make thousands happy. It will give a home to thousands, who, relying upon your policy, and confiding in your justice, have sought the solitude of the wilderness, and made it resound with the busy hum of civilized man, engaged in the various arts of peaceful industry. Cultivated fields and blooming gardens now greet the eye in every direction where but a short time back was to be seen naught but the deep gloom of the heavy forest. By passing this bill, you give a guaranty to those who are to be the recipients of its benefits, which, through all time, will redound to the honor and prosperity of the country. You will give to the poor man the opportunity of getting a home that will make him independent; that will render him a useful citizen, and enable him to educate and bring up his children in the paths of virtue, and make them ornaments of society. You indissolubly tie him to his country, because he has a home—a country to defend and a home to love. It is this—the consciousness of having a home and a comfortable independence—that nerves the arm in battle, and makes the citizen soldier so ready to pour out his blood like water for the liberties of his country. It was this proud and independent feeling that roused up the spirit of the West in the late war, and made them carry in their hearts what they uttered from their lips, the battle-cry of liberty, "Free trade and sailor's rights." It was this that prompted the citizen soldiers of the West to seek the enemy of their country in every clime where he dared to pollute the soil of our country, whether in the frozen regions of the North, or on the burning sands of a Southern sun—on the bloody plains of the river Raisin, or the glorious field of New Orleans. Can you expect such devotion to the cause of the country from men who have not these ties to bind them? From men of whom it may be said they have no country, because they have no homes? Now is a time when you may give birth to such attachments as these. The occasion is at hand when you may perform one of the noblest offices that falls to the lot of man: that of providing the means, without injury or loss to yourselves, by which thousands may acquire homes for themselves and their families.

There is something dear and sacred in that word; it thrills the heart with fond associations, and many a cherished recollection. Home is the abode of virtue; and say what we may, talk as we will, it is at last the only altar of patriotism. It is here that the germ of virtue buds forth and blossoms; here, that the purest affections of the heart—the best and warmest feelings of patriotism—the holies: impulses of religion, spring forth, and are cherished. It is here, around the fireside, in the family circle, that all the great guaranties of a nation's liberty have their origin. This is the altar from whence shall emanate that spirit of independence, and that deep, abiding, love of liberty, which, as a wall of fire, shall guard and protect the country in its heaviest trials. It is in vain that you look for it elsewhere. It is "the cloud by day and the pillar of fire by night," that shall conduct us unerringly to greatness and to glory, and perpetuate the liberties we enjoy. Let us do, then, at once, and without further hesitation, what interest dictates, what duty demands, what patriotism requires—pass this bill, that we may help the settler.

NOTE.—I observe it has been stated that those living upon unsurveyed lands will not be benefitted by the pre-emption bill which came from the Senate. This is altogether incorrect. Such as live upon unsurveyed lands will be included within the provisions of the bill, as well as those residing upon lands that are surveyed. The bill, so far as this point is concerned, is in exact conformity with the instructions of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, under date of the 11th October last.

NORTHEASTERN BOUNDARY.

SPEECH OF MR. WILLIAMS, OF MAINE,

In the Senate of the United States, Monday, June 18, 1838—In reply to Mr. BUCHANAN, on the motion of Mr. WILLIAMS for leave to bring in "a bill to provide for surveying the Northeastern boundary line of the United States, according to the provisions of the treaty of peace, of seventeen hundred and eighty-three."

Mr. WILLIAMS addressed the Senate as follows:

Mr. PRESIDENT: For the able and unanswerable argument of the Senator from Pennsylvania, in support of the right of Maine and of the United States to hold the disputed territory according to the line claimed by us, and exhibiting the unsoundness of the argument of the British Government in opposition to it, I return to him my sincere thanks. But when that Senator supposes that Maine wishes to take the law into her own hands, and in the measures she has adopted appears to have been governed more by passion than by policy, I feel bound, as a native citizen of that State, and as one of her representatives, to say that this depends more upon the facts of the case, than upon his, or my own, conclusions from those facts. While I would not deny to that honorable Senator the right to form his own opinions, I must be permitted to dissent from them, and to state facts as they exist, from which Senators will be enabled to determine for themselves, whether or not the State of Maine ought to be regarded as acting from passion, or from a just regard to her important rights, and the proper maintenance of them, in the measures she has adopted.

It is admitted on all hands, that the right to the territory in dispute is in Maine, and that the pretence of claim by the Government of Great Britain, is without foundation. This right was recognised and established by the treaty of 1783; and Massachusetts, as early as 1802, granted lands up to the line now claimed by Maine. The grantees were suffered to enjoy their lands without objection from any quarter, till after the treaty of Ghent. These lands are now claimed to be within the disputed territory, the settlers upon them are claimed as British subjects, and the territory put under wardenship by the Governor of New Brunswick. However ready Senators may be to admit and maintain the perfect right of Maine, and of the United States, to the disputed territory, it is true, and to be borne in mind, that in 1827 certain American citizens, settlers thereon, were arrested by the authorities of New Brunswick, for attempting to prevent the passage of the British mail across and over this territory, were torn from their homes and their families, dragged to Fredericton, and there required to recognise, with sureties for their appearance at court, to answer to high crimes and misdemeanors, alleged to be committed against the sovereignty and laws of New Brunswick. Some of them were able to find sureties, and thereby obtained their release, and returned to their families. Another (John Baker) could not, or did not, find sureties; in consequence of which, he was thrown into prison at Fredericton, and there detained until he was tried; and although he claimed his rights as a citizen of the United States, and insisted that he was not subject to the jurisdiction of the courts of New Brunswick for any act done within the limits of the United States, yet he was convicted, and condemned to pay a large fine to the Government of New Brunswick, as the penalty for his supppsed offence; and not complying therewith, was remanded to prison, and there kept a long time, until the Government of the United States remonstrated to the Government of Great Britain, and finally procured his release, upon the gracious pardon of the British authorities; and to this day no satisfaction has been made by the British Government for this outrage.

In 1831, certain inhabitants of Madawaska, west of the line running north from the monument, and within the disputed territory, acting under a warrant from a magistrate of the State of Maine, undertook to organize a town which had been incorporated by the Legislature of that State, and were arrested as offenders against the laws of New Brunswick, tried and convicted by the courts of New Brunswick, sentenced to pay fines for their supposed offences, and imprisoned for the non-payment of them. Afterward, upon the representations of this Government to that of Great Britain, these persons were released and permitted to return to their homes, and the fines imposed upon them were graciously remitted. In 1837, the Legislature of Maine passed a law to deposite with the towns and plantations within that State the proportion of surplus revenue assigned to Maine by the United States, according to the number of inhabitants in each town and plantation. Under this law, a Mr. Greeley was appointed to ascertain the number of inhabitants in the unincorporated places in the county of Penobscot, and while performing this service within the disputed territory, he was arrested, carried to Fredericton, and there imprisoned as an offender against the laws of New Brunswick. He was detained a short time, and upon the application of this Government was set at liberty. Soon after this he recommenced the business of enumerating the inhabitants of that territory, and was again arrested and thrown into prison at Frederickton, and there detained several months, until the authorities of Maine appealed to this Government, and this Government to that of Great Britain, when his release was procured; and thus ended the efforts of Maine to obtain the information necessary for carrying into effect her laws respecting the surplus revenue, so far as respected the disputed territory. Not the least apology or satisfaction has ever been obtained from the British Government, or the Government of New Brunswick, for these outrages upon the just rights of Maine, and upon the persons of her citizens, who had been guilty of no crime other than attempting to execute the laws of their State within her rightful limits. Add to this the fact that the Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick, in an official communication to the Governor of Maine, in 1837, says:

"That he holds positive instructions from his Government not to suffer any act of sovereignty or jurisdiction to be exercised by any foreign power within the territory in dispute betwixt Great Britain and the United States, until the right to that territory shall have been determined by negotiation betwixt the two Governments; and that if the whole military force of British America should be necessary to enable him to give effect to those instructions, that force would be placed at his disposal."

Thus, sir, we have a foreign power claiming and exercising jurisdiction over one-third of the territory of Maine, arresting, imprisoning and punishing our citizens for no crime against that Government, with notice that that Government will not suffer any act of sovereignty or jurisdiction to be exercised by us within the disputed territory until the right shall have been determined by negotiation; and if necessary, the whole military force of British America will be exerted to give effect to that determination. Can it be expected by any free born American that Maine or the United States are to submit quietly to such outrages upon their property, and upon the persons of their citizens? Would any Senator feel justified by his vote to give countenance to such acts? Can it be expected that Maine will longer remain quiet, and permit a foreign Government to usurp so large a portion of her territory, and to arrest and imprison, in a foreign jail, her citizens for no other crime than that of yielding obedience to her own laws?

Now, sir, let us inquire what Maine has done to subject herself to the charge of being governed more by passion than by policy. After Maine had suffered all the indignities which have been enumerated, and without the least promise of redress from any quarter, her Governor was informed by the letter of 1st March, 1838, from the Secretary of State of the United States, of the various attempts which had been made by the Government of the United States to settle the question of boundary with the Government of Great Britain; detailing the propositions which had been made since the rejection of the advice of the King of Holland in 1832, and the answers which had been given thereto by the British Government; and inviting the Governor of Maine to adopt such measures as he might deem necessary to ascertain the sense of the State, with respect to the expediency of attempting to establish a conventional line of boundary betwixt that State and the British possessions, by direct negotiations between the Governments of the United States and Great Britain; and whether the State of Maine will agree, and upon what conditions, if she elects to prescribe any, to abide by such settlement, if the same be made? Should the State of Maine be of opinion that additional surveys and explorations might be useful, either in leading to a satisfactory adjustment of the controversy, according to the terms of the treaty, or in enabling the parties to decide more understandingly upon the expediency of opening a negotiation for the establishment of a line that would suit their mutual convenience, and be reconcilable to their conflicting interests, and desire the creation for that purpose, of a commission upon the principles, and with the limited powers described in the letter of Mr. Fox to the President will, without hesitation, open a negotiation, with Great Britain, for the accomplishment of that object.

This letter was communicated by the Governor of Maine to the Legislature, then in session; and it may be proper here to remind the Senate that in Mr. Forsyth's reply of 7th February to Mr. Fox's note of the 10th of January, 1838, he concludes by saying:

"That he is instructed to inform Mr. Fox, that if a negotiation be entertained at all upon the inconclusive and unsatisfactory basis afforded by the British counter proposition or substitute, which possesses hardly a feature in common with the American proposition, the President will not venture to invite it, unless the authorities of Maine shall think it more likely to lead to a final adjustment of the question of boundary than the General Government deems it to be, though predisposed to see it in the most favorable light."

All the papers, with the Governor's message, were referred to a committee, who made a report thereon, from which the following is an extract:

"To such a conventional line, or to such a commission of survey, we believe the people of this State are not prepared to assent. They ask, and they think they have a right to demand, that after the lapse of more than half a century, the eastern line of our State, in its whole extent, shall be run and established according to the treaty of 1783."

Upon which report the following resolutions were adopted nearly unanimously:

"Resolved, That it is not expedient to give the assent of this State to the Federal Government to treat with Great Britain for the establishment of a conventional line for our northeastern boundary, but that this State will insist on the line established by the treaty of 1783.

"Resolved, That as this State has never heretofore given her consent to the appointment of an umpire under the treaty of Ghent, in 1814, but has protested against the same, and as she believes it to be a grave question whether the provision in the treaty for this purpose has not done its office, and is therefore no longer in force, she is not now prepared to give her assent to the appointment of a new arbiter.

"Resolved, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be requested to urge the passage of the bill for the survey of the northeastern boundary of the United States, now pending in Congress; and that if said bill shall not become a law during the present session of Congress, and if the Government of the United States, either alone or in conjunction with Great Britain, or the State of Maine, shall not, on or before the 1st day of September next, establish and appoint a commission for a survey of the boundary line, it shall then be the duty of the Governor, without further delay, to appoint forthwith suitable commissioners and surveyors for ascertaining, running, and locating the northeastern boundary of this State, and to cause the same to be carried into operation."

Now, Mr President, being well satisfied from a careful examination of all the correspondence between the two Governments on the subject of the boundary, that Great Britain is determined not even to open a negotiation with this Government for the establishment of the boundary line upon the basis of the treaty of 1783, or to agree to any mode for establishing the treaty line, unless this Government will first agree to some modification or instruction which shall secure to her a line different from that prescribed in and by the treaty, how can it be said that the resolutions before recited are the result of passion, or different from what the exigency of the case demands?

It is to be remembered that the resolutions were adopted by the Legislature in March last, when all attempts to settle the boundary had failed, and when the Legislature were informed by this Go vernment, "that if a negotiation be entertained at all, upon the unsatisfactory basis afforded by the British counter proposition or substitute, the President will not invite it, unless the authorities of Maine shall think it more likely to lead to an adjustment of the question of boundary than the General Government deemed it to be, although predisposed to see it in the most favorable light." What should Maine do under such circumstances? She had already repeatedly seen her citizens arrested, imprisoned, and punished unjustly by a foreign Government. She had been admonished and entreated by the General Government to desist from doing any act upon the disputed territory that might be inconsistent with the understanding that was said to be had between the two Governments as to the territory during the pending of the question; and while endeavoring to conform thereto, she found the claims of New Brunswick enlarged and extended until they covered one-third of her whole territory, and that a warden was commissioned by a foreign power to watch over, and ostensibly to protect the territory from depredation, and at the same time the valuable timber upon it was fast disappearing.

Maine had often remonstrated to this Government against these violations of her rights and territory, and entreated the aid of this Government to settle the line of boundary and to obtain redress for the many wrongs done to her. All had failed, and no hope was left, as she was informed, of settling the question upon terms which the General Government would "venture to invite," unless Maine should desire it. To such terms she could not agree, and hence resolved to request her Senators and Representatives in Congress to procure, if possible, the passage of the bill now under consideration, authorizing the President to run and mark the line according to the treaty of peace; and if that fail, and the Government of the United States, either alone or in conjunction with Great Britain or the State of Maine, shall not, by the 1st of September, establish and appoint a commission for a survey of said boundary line, then it shall be the duty of the Governor to appoint surveyors and to run and locate the boundary. What is there rash or impolitic in this measure? What other mode is left for Maine to obtain her rights? If the General Government, after having made at the last session an appropriation for this object, will not now direct the line to be run, will they ever do it? If ever, when? The Senator from Pennsylvania says after we shall have waited the result of the pending negotiation! But recollect that when this resolution of Maine was passed there was no negotiation pending, nor any reason to expect that it would be renewed unless Maine should desire it; and she knew, if she did not make herself so understood, that she did not desire it upon the inconclusive and unsatisfactory basis proposed.

Then I would again ask, What should Maine do to obtain her right, and a boundary line according to the treaty? Was any other mode left to her than those contemplated by the resolve, viz: first, to get Congress to authorize the President to run and mark the line: if that fail, then to get the President, with the aid of the former appropriation for this object, either alone, or in conjunction with Great Britain if she will, or with Maine, to establish a commission for the survey of the boundary line, by the 1st of September; and the other mode failing, thirdly, that the Governor should forthwith cause the line to be ascertained, run, and located. If the line be ever run, it must be done in some of these modes. If Congress will not authorize it, and the President will not do it, either alone or with Great Britain, or with Maine, then Maine must do it, or it will not be done. Then shall Maine be considered to have acted rashly in adopting her resolutions? Do they propose any thing beyond what the exigency of the case demands? If not, then the Senator from Pennsylvania was wrong in supposing that her acts were more the effects of passion than of policy?

It has been further said that Maine acts inconsistently in finding fault with the late proposition of the President to the British minister; that her Government and Legislature invited the measure, and when adopted, it is complained of. Whether or not Maine be liable to this charge, depends upon her acts, and a just construction of her resolutions. It may be, and probably is true, that her acts and resolutions have been considered by the President as indicating her desire for the establishment of a commission of exploration and survey; but knowing, as I do, the feelings of the people of Maine upon this question, and having examined the report of the committee to whom Mr. Forsyth's letter, and the messsge of the Governor, were referred, I am well satisfied that it was not intended by the Legislature, or by her resolutions, to express any desire for the creation of a commission upon the principles proposed by Mr. Forsyth to Mr. Fox, in his letter of 27th April last; and unless they did desire the creation of such a commission, it was not to be expected that it would be invited by the President.

The Senator from Pennsylvania supposes that the resolution of Maine does, in terms, ask such a commission, and if not in terms, it is fairly to be inferred from an omission to negative it, as was done in reference to the conventional line, and to the appointment of a new arbiter. He construes that part of the resolution which says "that if the Government of the United States, either alone, or in conjunction with Great Britain, or the State of Maine, shall not, on or before the 1st of September, establish and appoint a commission for a survey of said boundary line" to mean "the establishment of a joint commission of survey and exploration, upon the basis of the original American proposition and the modifications offered by Her Majesty's Government," as proposed to Mr. Fox by Mr. Forsyth; and so, it would seem, the President must have regarded it, or he would not have ventured to invite it, in contradiction of what had been said to Mr. Fox in the letter of Mr. Forsyth of 7th February last.

The Legislature of Maine has not, as yet, had any opportunity to say whether or not the construction of the Senator, and of the President, is in accordance with their understanding of the resolution; and it remains for the Governor of that State to determine whether the proposition now made, if accepted, "will establish and appoint such a commission for a survey of said boundary line" as will relieve him from the obligation imposed by the resolution "to appoint forthwith suitable commissioners aed surveyors for ascertaining, running, and locating the Northeastern boundary of this State, and to cause the same to be carried into operation." While I would not insist that the Governor may not so regard it, I cannot suppose that, in forming the resolution, the Legislature had in view any such commission as is now proposed, but that the "survey of said boundary line," mentioned in the resolution, was such a survey of the boundary line according to the treaty of 1783, as is mentioned in the bill now before Congress, and as is to be made by the Governor in the event of such a survey not being made in the other modes mentioned in the resolve.

But, suppose the President did understand the resolution and the Governor's letter as desiring the appointment of such a commission, and hence directed the proposition of Mr. Forsyth to Mr. Fox of the 27th April, should that prevent the passage of the proposed bill to authorize the President to run and mark the boundary line according to the treaty of 1783? This may depend upon what that proposition is, and the probability of its leading to any satisfactory result. If it means what the words ordinarily imply, it might lead the commission to such a survey as would make the final settlement of the line more difficult than it now is, especially if such commission should be "instructed to look for highlands which both parties might acknowledge as fulfilling the conditions of the treaty;" and, in that case, produce the condition of things which Mr. Fox, in his note of the 10th January, 1838, describes in these words:

"And if the investigations of the proposed commission should show that there is no reasonable prospect of finding a line strictly conformable with the description contained in the treaty of 1783, the constitutional difficulties which now prevent the United States from agreeing to a conventional line, may possibly be removed; and the way may thus be prepared for the satisfactory settlement of the difference by an equitable division of the disputed territory."

The unexpected information that such a proposition, and the apparent broad terms in which it was made, as are contained in Mr. Forsyth's note to Mr. Fox of 27th April, produced alarm and anxiety for the rights of Maine, and very naturally induced expressions which the Senator from Pennsylvania considers as finding fault with the Administration for doing that which was understood to have been desired by Maine. It is very true that until Mr. Forsyth's letter to me of 26th May I had considered the proposition, according to its natural import, without knowing how it was, or should be, regarded in a diplomatic sense, and was alarmed; but since the explanations and assurances in that letter my fears are allayed, and the people of Maine will have confidence that her rights are not to be put in jeopardy by any thing that shall be admitted into a convention for forming the commission of survey and exploration. As to the probability of such a commission leading to any useful result, the Governments of Great Britain and of the United States have expressed their opinions in their late correspondence, as follows. Mr. Fox, in his note of 10th January, 1838, says:

"In this state of things, the Government of the United States has proposed to the British Cabinet that another attempt should be made to trace the outer boundary according to the letter of the treaty, and that a commission of exploration and survey should be appointed for that purpose. Her Majesty's Government have little expectation that such a commission could lead to any useful result, and on that account would be disposed to object to the measure." "Her Majesty's Government have already stated that they have little expectation that such a commission could lead to any useful result, and that they would on that account be disposed to object to it; and if her Majesty's Government were now to agree to appoint such a commission, it would be only in compliance with the desire so strongly expressed by the Government of the United States, and in spite of doubts which her Majesty's Government still entertain of the efficacy of the measure."

In Mr. Forsyth's reply of 7th February, 1838, speaking of the British proposition, he says: "It merely contemplates a commission of boundary analogous to that appointed under the 5th article of the treaty of Ghent, and would in all probability prove equally unsatisfactory in practice, and that the President will not venture to invite it unless the authorities of the State of Maine shall think it more likely to lead to a final adjustment of the question of boundary than the General Government deems it to be."

Now allow me to ask what possible good can be expected to result from the proposed commission of exploration and survey? Both Governments understand that it can lead to no useful result, and experience proves that it will be so. Then why enter upon it, and suffer the delay, without any prospect of settling the question?

The commissioners under the treaty of Ghent had the power to ascertain and determine the point of the highlands due north from the source of the river St. Croix, designated as the northwestern angle of Nova Scotia, and the northwesternmost head of Connecticut river, in conformity with the provisions of the treaty of 1783, and to survey and mark the boundary; and in case of disagreement, they were to make report of their doings to their respective Governments, and the question was then to be submitted to some friendly sovereign to be decided by him. The commission now proposed is not to have that power, but are to be limited to survey, explore and report. Under the treaty of Ghent, seventeen years were spent in forming the commission, making the survey and reports, agreeing upon the arbiter, and obtaining his advice; and when done, it was rejected, and no useful purpose was obtained by all the time and money which that experiment cost the parties. Can it be hoped that less time, or less money, will be required to test the proposed experiment? or that the border difficulties will be less during the process of this than of the former attempt? or that a satisfactory result will be obtained? The representatives of Maine think not. The British Government claim and insist upon having exclusive possession and jurisdiction of the disputed territory until the question shall be settled; and so long as the settlement can be delayed, they have all the benefits of our territory which they would have if it were their own. This is a state of things so unjust to Maine, so dishonorable to the American nation, that it should not longer be submitted to; and yet we are told that if we will not take the law into our own hands, but "maintain our rights firmly," they will be granted to us by Great Britain "when fairly presented," and "that negotiation is not yet exhausted." Look at the correspondence from 1832 to this day, and see if any thing can be more unfounded than these suggestions. Again we are told that it may be well to make the St. Johns, from its mouth to its source, the line. Has not this already been proposed to Great Britain by our Government, and rejected in no very courteous terms? Still we are regarded by some as wanting in discernment of our true interest, and as recreant of our duty to the General Government, in urging the passage of this bill; that by so doing we are putting at hazard the peace of the country, and the attainment of our rights. It may be so, but we feel confident that the reverse of this is true. By passing the bill, we show to Great Britain that the settlement of the boundary cannot longer be delayed; that the nation will insist upon its establishment according to the terms of the treaty of 1783. It will furnish to the President a strong argument to induce Great Britain to agree to fix the line by negotiation, or to join us in running and marking the boundary according to the treaty; and why shall this be regarded as a hostile measure? It does not propose to take any thing that is not clearly ours; and why should Great Britain be offended at our doing that? The President may, and probably will, ask Great Britain to join in that survey. Why will she not do so? She cannot justify herself to the world if she shall refuse it. It was a maxim of our late venerable President to ask nothing but what is right, and to submit to nothing that is wrong: let us practice it, and if Great Britain will not join in the survey, nor establish the treaty line, then we must do it; and if Great Britain complain, she will do so without cause; and if we will be careful to take no more than by the terms of the treaty we have a right to, she cannot consider it cause for war; but if the General Government will not assume the question, and act with a determination to bring it to a speedy issue, but will leave it to Maine to struggle alone with the neighboring province, it is easy to see that it cannot be long before her citizens, and perhaps her Government, will be in collision with New Brunswick. This must soon lead to border strife, from which war will ensue, and very soon involve both Great Britain and the United States in the controversy. Senators may think that Maine and New Brunswick may fight it out; it will not prove so; each nation must, and will come to the aid of their respective parts, and it may not then be so easy to convince the world that we are right, as it will be if we pass this bill, and under it claim nothing but what is ours.

If, therefore, we would avoid war, which every one should desire, let us pass the bill, and leave the execution of it to the constituted head of the nation, in whose judgment and discretion the people have confidence. By so doing, this irritating and long protracted question of boundary will be brought to an end; and, if it must be that we must fight to maintain it, it will not be the first time that this nation has been driven to that alternative to obtain their liberty and to maintain their rights; and while we regard such an event as greatly to be deplored, we should consider that the dismemberment of our territory, and the usurpation of it by a foreign Government, are much more to be deplored.

PRE-EMPTIONS TO SETTLERS.

SPEECH OF MR. SNYDER,

OF ILLINOIS

In the House of Representatives, June 14, 1838—On the bill granting pre-emptions to settlers on the public lands, on the motion of Mr. LINCOLN to exclude from its benefits those who had heretofore availed themselves of pre-emption rights.

Mr. SNYDER addressed the House as follows:

Mr. SPEAKER: I had not intended to occupy the time of this House with any more remarks on the merits of this bill; but my duty to a very deserving class of my constituents forbids that I should sit here in silence, and permit an amendment which, if adopted, will exclude a great portion of meritorious citizens from the benefits of this pre-emption law. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LINCOLN] proposes, by his amendment, to prohibit any man who has ever availed himself of the benefit of any former pre-emption law from again being entitled to a second pre-emption. It would seem, from the arguments of that gentleman, that the Government, in once granting the right of pre-emption to an actual settler on the public lands, is granting a boon, is giving a liberal donation, for which the person receiving it should for ever be shut out from the benefits of any other provision in favor of occupants on the public lands. Sir, I deny that the Government gives away any thing when it grants a pre-emption right. The sales of the public lands for the last eight years show that but two cents an acre have been realized over the minimum price; one dollar and twenty-seven cents an acre having been the average of the sales of the public domain. When from this you deduct the cost of advertising, and of selling at public sale, it will be found that at public sale the nett price falls below the minimum price at private sale. Suppose though I am mistaken in the amount for which the public lands have been sold within the last eight years—and I believe no man contends the average sales for that time have produced more than one dollar and twenty-eight cents an acre—who would, for that small pittance, exclude the man that, through his enterprise and his labor, had heretofore, under a former pre-emption law, given the Government price, purchased the land, and sold out his labor to some more wealthy man, who was unwilling to encounter the privations and difficulties of making an improvement in the wilderness? I cannot think that the sense of justice of this House will permit so great an act of selfish tyranny to a class of men who merit from us a more enlightened and liberal legislation.

This bill is opposed with as much obstinacy and pertinacity as though it proposed to give the lands of the Government away. Sir, you give nothing to the settler. You receive from him the price you receive from the speculator. Even admitting you gained three cents an acre by non-resident speculators, to whom are you indebted for the pitiful augmentation in price, if not to the resident cultivator? The speculator does not enter into the unsettled wilderness to purchase public lands. The poor man, driven by misfortunes to explore and settle your solitary wastes, unwilling to beg, and unable to buy, the refuse of your populated districts, is forced into the wild woods; builds his log cabin; frequently hunts to sustain him and his family, until, by laborious improvement, he succeeds in getting a patch under cultivation for the sustenance of his family. The first years are passed in toils and privations incident to a frontier life, cheered only by the hope, that, by the time population shall have gathered around him, he shall be enabled to pay the minimum price, still extorted by our unjust and unnecessary laws. These are the pioneers who first make known the relative value of our unsettled and unexplored wastes. These are the men who first give positive value to our Western lands. But, unfortunately for them and for us, the very value bestowed on the adjacent lands by their improvements; the additional value of the public lands resulting from their privations; that very additional value attracts the speculator from your moneyed States. Sir, you yourselves are the great cause of speculation and of speculators in the public lands, by that provision in your law which prohibits the new States from taxing the land for five years after you have sold it, and which also prohibits the new States from taxing the land of a non-resident higher than that of a resident. Remove those prohibitions: allow the new States to tax the lands as soon as they are sold, and to make a just discrimination between the lands of residents and non-residents, and my word for it we would soon be rid of the curse of non-resident speculators.

But, sir, let us look at the beneficial results of our previous pre-emption laws. How many millions of dollars have the actual settlers paid into the Treasury during the last twenty years. Since the enactment of the pre-emption law of 1830, continued up to June 1836, upwards of fifty-seven millions of dollars has been received from the sales of the public lands: although all this sum was not received from actual settlers, it was received during the existence of pre-emption laws. At no former period did the sales ever amount to this sum. Since the pre-emption expired in June 1836, the sales of the public lands have very sensibly diminished: in 1836, during the existence of the pre-emption law, the proceeds of the sales of the public lands was upwards of twenty-four millions of dollars; in 1837, after the pre-emption law had expired, the sales amounted to about five millions six hundred and forty-four thousand dollars. In a pecuniary point of view, then there can be no objection to the passage of this bill, neither can there be found any objection extending its provisions to a man who before has availed himself of the benefits of a former law. The argument would show, if it showed any thing, that the Government would sell two quarters of land in place of one. No, sir, that is not the objection; there are other motives which operate on the minds of those gentlemen who oppose this bill. Sir, we have heard on this floor that the facilities given to acquire lands in the new States, act as a drain to the population of the old States! How long is that selfish and illiberal policy to continue? This Government is the only really free one on earth, yet it is the only one that ever demanded from its citizens a sordid price for its waste lands. How many of our citizens has this cruel and heartless policy driven from their country? When Louisiana was purchased from the French Government, near one-half of its citizens were Americans who had emigrated from the United States, and had contributed to the glorious Independence of their country. In 1789, but a few years after the Independence of this country, and at a time our Government was preparing and adopting the system of selling its Western lands at two dollars an acre, how different was the policy of the provincial Government of Louisiana! We find at that time this letter published in the United States. It is signed by Estaven Miro, Spanish Governor at New Orleans, in the province of Louisiana, dated September 16th, 1789, addressed to Benjamin Sebastian, esq. of Kentucky. Extract:

"In order to populate the province, his Majesty has been graciously pleased to authorize me to grant to the emigrants, free of all expense, tracts of from two hundred and forty to eight hundred acres, in proportion to their property, and in particular cases of men of influence, who may aid these views, I shall extend the grant as far as three thousand acres. You will be exempt from all taxation, and will be allowed the private exercise of your religion, without molestation from any person whatever, and will enjoy all the rights, privileges, and immunities of his Majesty's other subjects."

I need not produce authorities to satisfy this House that the French Government was equally liberal with the waste lands of her colonies in America, and, like the Spanish, donated the land to the actual settler free of all expense. Neither need I trouble the House to produce documents to show that Great Britain gave not only donations of land in the Canadas to emigrants, but even furnished them with the implements of husbandry for cultivation, and, in some instances, provisions to sustain the emigrant and his family one year. How many of our countrymen, induced by the liberal policy of the Republic of Mexico, have emigrated to Texas, receiving four thousand acres of the finest soil, in the most genial climate, for the bare cost of surveying and recording the titles. The character of those men who were driven by the parsimony and selfishness of the Legislature of this country to another, require from me no eulogy. Their defence of the Alamo, and their gallant valor at the battle of St. Jacinto, has shown them worthy of the free country of their birth, and has won for them lasting and imperishable glory. Their success, and the liberal policy extended by them to persons emigrating there, is now constantly draining from all the States, and particularly the Southern, many of our best and wealthiest citizens. They will not only populate Texas and develope her resources, but the same spirit of enterprise, the same narrow and mistaken policy of this Government, in regard to the mode and manner of disposing of her public lands, will cause our countrymen to wrest from the imbecile and feeble hands of the Mexican Government other and fairer provinces. How long, with these facts staring us in the face, will this Shylock land system continue to weaken, in place of strengthening, us; to drive away, in place of retaining, our own citizens?

Thus have I contrasted the policy of other Governments that are now, or were, the proprietors of unappropriated waste lands adjoining the United States. I will adduce one other example which has occurred to me; it is from a most numerous, though distant and semi-civilized people—page 354, History of China, by J. F. Davis:

"The Provincial Government of Canton, in 1833, obtained the sanction of the Emperor to a very sensible plan for inviting the poorest people to settle down on waste spots of land wherever they might find them, cultivating them in the best way they could for their own sole benefit, without any tax or other charge whatever. The land thus entered on might hereafter become liable to the land tax, but it was made the freehold property of the first cultivator, with a deed of grant from the Government, and as the object was the relief of the poor, no rich person was permitted to apply."

The edict by which the foregoing regulation was promulgated observed that, "in Government there is nothing so important as a sufficient supply of food for the people; and, in order to do this, the means should be provided them."

What a commentary on the civilized, enlightened, and free Government of the United States. Is it not humiliating that an idolatrous, half-civilized Government should be so much in advance of us in liberality, humanity, and true national policy.

[Here Mr. LINCOLN observed that the people of China belonged to the Emperor.]

Mr. SNYDER replied, so do the poor belong to the wealthy manufacturer in your States; and you propose to keep them not only poor, but under your control, without doing as the Emperor of China does—provide lands for them. The poor of this country are our equals, our fellow-citizens. It should be the first consideration, the first duty, of every philanthropic man, either in or out of this House, to legislate, to provide for the poor. They should be the first objects of our legislation. The rich require none of our solicitude; they will take care of themselves only too well, sir. How many thousands of poor are crowding your cities and your villages, suffering all the horrors of indigence and misery! How often have we heard on this floor the most eloquent appeals to our sympathies in their favor! How often, too, in this hall, have we heard the Administration denounced, alleging that its policy closed the workshops and manufactories of the country, and shut the doors of the banks, throwing thousands of poor out of employment! Let us now see whether gentlemen are serious in their sympathies for that class of our fellow-citizens.

It is from the opposition to this Administration that we have heard these soul-stirring appeals. The Administration has recommended this measure; it is a measure for the enterprising poor man. We propose this measure first. We have, also, another before this House, which graduates the price of the public land according to the time it has been in market, according to quality, to enable poor men to procure homes to better their condition, to elevate their moral character by raising them to the proud condition of freeholders. Yes, sir, to better their condition, to gladden the hearts of thousands, to make the West the promised land of the needy. Will those gentlemen who have shown such sympathy for the poor, aid us now in this benevolent design; we present you an opportunity to evidence your faith by your works. I listened with riveted attention to the eloquent speech of the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SERGEANT,] when he so feelingly portrayed the wants of the poor, so eloquently told the tale of their sufferings during the inclemencies of the winter. That gentlemen subsequently introduced petitions from mechanics and laborers of Philadelphia, praying Congress to finish certain ships now on the stocks, in order that they might get employment, and thereby save themselves and their families from suffering.

This Government, these people—I mean the whole people of the United States—have at their disposal more than one hundred millions of acres of unappropriated waste, wild land. Why not give those suffering poor these lands to cultivate? Why do you force them to remain in their starving homes, when, in the wide West, we have room and land enough for them all? Perhaps that selfish policy which prevents those lands from being given to the actual settler, will be well understood by your poor constituents. May they not ask you, who are their representatives, what right or justice have you to oppose our free settlement on the public lands in the West; we protest against your tyrannical restrictions, intended to prevent our emigration to better homes. If you wish to retain our laborious hands on your sterile soil, stimulate us with bounties, but dare not bind us with chains. The Middle and Eastern States, who have offered premiums for the encouragement of the culture of the mulberry and the sugar beet, have pursued the only policy admissible, under our free institutions, to retain their free citizens within their bounds. So long as our public lands were pledged for the public debt, so long did we continue to pay cheerfully the price set on the public lands. That debt is paid: this nation is out of debt. Why any longer withhold those lands? Why prevent us from resuming our right to the free cultivation of the national soil?

The friends of this bill have been told that to pass it in this shape is giving a credit of two years to the settler to pay for his land, and therefore it should be so amended as to confine its provisions to lands not now in market. I hope it will receive no such amendment. If you pass the bill as it came from the Senate, and as it was reported from the Committee on Public Lands of this House, it does give a credit on all lands, whether in market or not, whether subject to private entry or not, to all who are occupants on them at the passage of this bill. Is there any thing wrong in this? I had always supposed, at least before I was honored with a seat here, that the settlers on the public lands were within the legitimate sphere of Congressional legislation, and entitled to legislative protection. How much of the time of this House has been consumed in giving relief to every other class of citizens? It is certainly fresh in the recollection of every gentleman, that, notwithstanding the banks had received the money of the Government, loaned it out to individuals at an interest, banked upon it, and instead of returning it when wanted by the Government, they shut their doors, suspended specie payment, refused to give up that which was not theirs, which common honesty and good faith required them to return when demanded, yet, notwithstanding this breach of their contracts, of their faith, one of the first acts of our legislation at the special session was to give these banks time to pay; to extend relief to the poor suffering banks. It is true I did not vote to give them that relief; a majority of this House did, and a long time, a long credit, was given them to restore that money which did not belong to them, and which they so improperly withheld. The same session we extended a credit to the merchants to the amount of upwards of three millions of dollars. A large sum was given to those of them who suffered by the great fire in the city of New York. Sir, I have not been taught to believe that the banks and merchants were more deserving of the patronage, of the lenity and beneficence of Congress, than the honest, though poor, pioneer of the West. Some gentlemen urge on this floor as a reason that they will not give countenance to occupants on the public lands, because there is a law prohibiting persons from settling on the lands of the Government. I know there is such a law, which disgraces the pages of our statute book, passed in 1807. I tell you now that you never can enforce that law. It has lain as a dead letter on your statute book. It is unjust. The public sentiment of the West never has, and never will, regard it as a law. It is, in fact, long since obsolete. But suppose the law was violated by these settlers, did not the banks violate their contracts with the Government? Did not common honesty require them to pay their debts; to return the money given them to keep? Yet to them you gave all the relief they required; as much as they or their friends asked for, and as much at least as their conduct deserved. Will you not apply the same rule to the settler on your lands? Why is he less entitled to have credit? It is a fact that the policy of this Government for many years has been to reduce the price of every article which we import, which we have to consume. We have reduced the tariff so as to afford articles that supply our wants at a cheap and reduced rate. Even the articles of luxury are afforded cheaper. All are reduced but the price of your public lands; they remain the same; no reduction there, no change of policy toward the people of the new States; no liberality, no justice, for the cultivators and occupants of the waste lands of the West.

Mr. Speaker I have already detained this House longer than my health justifies: I will conclude by urging the friends of this bill in the language of my honorable colleague [Gov. CASEY,] when he addressed you on this subject to vote down all amendments, to give us a liberal pre-emption act, or give us none: if the bill is to be lost, let it be without amendment; it proposes no new principle. This Government granted pre-emptions as early as 1798; it has from time to time granted them ever since; this bill proposes only to give a quarter section to each settler, who may pay for the same in two years. I will go as far as those gentlemen who say it is proper to guard it against speculation. It is far from being the interest of the people I represent to have lands owned by non-resident speculators. The policy and wishes of the people of the new States is to have as many resident cultivators as they can. The strongest protection against speculation in the public lands is a pre-emption law; it should be prospective; such law should never be permitted to expire; then indeed would we secure the labor of the honest cultivator of the public land against the rapacity of the wealthy.

I look forward with pleasure to the time, (and it is very near,) when the destinies of this great Republic will be in the hands of the people west of the Alleghany mountains, when the representatives of the great West shall stand in numbers on this floor doing themselves justice. The new States have not justice done them. More than two-thirds of the lands within the limits of the State I have the honor in part to represent, is in the hands of the General Government; less than one-fourth is taxable; yet with all this, that State is engaged in a most gigantic system of internal improvement, which, if completed, will benefit more acres of land for the General Government than for her own citizens, although the whole cost is borne alike by the people of Illinois, without having the power to tax all the lands within her limits. This inequality between the new and old States cannot long exist, and will not, when the representatives of the new States will stand here in numbers to do themselves justice; then, and not until then, do I look for that legislation which will place all the States of this confederacy on an equal footing, and place within the reach of every family a home on the public domain.

COLLECTION OF THE REVENUE.

REMARKS OF MR. BUCHANAN, OF PENNSYLVANIA.

In Senate, Wednesday, June 27, 1838—On offering his substitute for Mr. WEBSTER's proposition.

Mr. BUCHANAN said that as the session was rapidly approaching its close, and time was now precious, he should endeavor to be as brief as possible in explaining the nature of his amendment. The whole subject had been amply discussed, and was well understood by every member of the Senate. It was, therefore, incumbent on him to do no more than simply to state his propositions as clearly as he could.

But, in the first place, said Mr. B. allow me to make one or two remarks in regard to the bill of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER.] It proposes neither more nor less than that the Government shall return to the deposite bank system, which has so utterly failed. If adopted, it will re-establish, more closely and intimately, the connection between Bank and State, than it has ever heretofore existed. Under the deposite law, the Secretary of the Treasury could not select any bank as a depository which issued or paid out notes of a less denomination than five dollars. The Senator's bill removes this restriction altogether. Banks may be selected as depositories which issue and pay out notes of the lowest denominations, even down to six and a quarter cents; and the notes of such banks are directed to be received in payment of the public dues, not for a limited period, but indefinitely. The expression is, "until the further order of Congress." Nay, more: as if our existing banks were not sufficient in number for depositories, the Senator has provided for those which are now in embryo, and may or may not be called into life under the great banking law of New York. No bank has yet, I believe, been established under it. As associations under this law could not be considered incorporated banks within the meaning of the deposite act, the Senator has extended its provisions so as to embrace all such banking associations as may hereafter be established by any State.

Now, sir, for myself, I am utterly opposed to ever again returning to the use of State banks as general depositories. I shall not again consent that the money of the Government may be employed in the business of banking. I think experience ought to have taught us a lesson upon this subject which we should never forget. It is my fixed opinion that the former connection between the Government and the banks has proved equally injurious to both parties, and ruinous to the country. I trust it may cease for ever.

I proceed now to offer a few observations in favor of my own amendment; and here permit me to say that, under my instructions from the Legislature of Pennsylvania, I felt myself bound to present some proposition of this nature. They directed me to vote against the Sub-Treasury bill. In this I have obeyed them fairly; yet, although I was directed to vote against that bill, I was also instructed "to vote for such a mode of receiving, keeping, and disbursing the public moneys, as will separate, as far as practicable, the banks from the Government. Thus, whilst I was instructed to vote against the Sub-Treasury bill, I was equally instructed to vote for some other measure distinct from the creation of Sub-Treasuries, which would separate the banks from the Government as far as practicable. This is what my amendment proposes; but candor compels me to confess that, without any instructions upon the subject, I should have felt myself bound to move this amendment after the defeat of the Sub-Treasury bill in the House, because I think Congress ought not to adjourn and leave the Treasury Department without any law whatever to shield and to direct its proceedings.

What is the present state of the case? At the called session in September last, the Sub-Treasury bill was passed by the Senate. Whilst it was under discussion here, I made a speech in its favor, and exerted myself to the utmost of my feeble abilities to secure its passage. What was, at that time, its fate in the House? It was laid upon the table by a majority of twelve votes.

My opinions then upon the subject are my opinions now. They have not changed in any particular. I should have again, at the present session, advocated and supported the passage of the Sub-Treasury bill, had I not been prevented by my instructions.

It passed the Senate a second time, without the specie restriction, and was again laid upon the table of the House. The House have since considered their own bill, which contained the specie clause originally introduced on the motion of the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] and it has been directly negatived by a majority of fourteen votes. We cannot, therefore, hope that this or any other similar bill will become a law during the existence of the present Congress, which will not expire until the fourth of March next. The subject is, therefore, necessarily postponed until the meeting of the next Congress, which will not take place until December, 1839.

The question, then, is, shall the friends of the Administration (and I profess myself to be one of the most decided amongst them) do nothing at all, because we have been defeated in our favorite measure? Shall we, because we have lost this measure, make no attempt to pass any other, but leave all the public money for the next eighteen months to be managed without law, at the mere discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury? I am not one of those who can arrive at any such conclusion. The people of this country expect that Congress will, before its adjournment, adopt some measure to separate the money of the Government from the business of banks; and at the same time direct by law in what manner it shall be kept and disbursed by the Secretary of the Treasury. It would, in my judgment, be suicidal, in a party point of view, to go home without making any further effort to settle this perplexing question. The President, in his Message at the commencement of the present session, after again expressing his preference for the Sub-Treasury system, says:

"It is obviously important to this branch of the public service, and to the business and quiet of the country, that the whole subject should in some way be settled and regulated by law; and, if possible, at your present session. Besides the plans above referred to, I am not aware that any one has been suggested, except that of keeping the public money in the State banks in special deposite. This plan is, to some extent, in accordance with the practice of the Government, and with the present arrangement of the Treasury Department, which, except, perhaps, during the operation of the late deposite act, has always been allowed, even during the existence of a National Bank, to make a temporary use of the State banks, in particular places, for the safe-keeping of portions of the revenue. This discretionary power might be continued, if Congress deem it desirable, whatever general system may be adopted. So long as the connection is voluntary, we need, perhaps, anticipate few of those difficulties, and little of that dependence on the banks, which must attend every such connection when compulsory in its nature, and when so arranged as to make the banks a fixed part of the machinery of Government. It is undoubtedly in the power of Congress so to regulate and guard it as to prevent the public money from being applied to the use, or intermingled with the affairs, of individuals. Thus arranged, although it would not give to the Government that entire control over its own funds which I desire to secure to it by the plan I have proposed, it would, it must be admitted, in a great degree, accomplish one of the objects which has recommended that plan to my judgment—the separation of the fiscal concerns of the Government from those of individuals or corporations. With these observations, I recommend the whole matter to your dispassionate reflection; confidently hoping that some conclusion may be reached by your deliberations, which, on the one hand, shall give safety and stability to the fiscal operations of the Government, and be consistent, on the other, with the genius of our institutions, and with the interests and wishes of the great mass of our constituents."

Now, what is the plain meaning of this extract from the President's message? He prefers the Sub-Treasury system; but if that should not succeed, he still urgently recommends the settlement of the question, if possible, at the present session. He then suggests the keeping of the public money in the State banks on special deposite, as the next alternative, and states that it is, to some extent, in accordance with the practice of the Government and the present arrangement of the Treasury Department. Although the Sub-Treasury plan is his first choice, yet he says, it must be admitted that the special deposite system would, in a great degree, accomplish the separation of the fiscal concerns of the Government from those of individuals or corporations. Now, my amendment is based upon these very principles thus recommended by the President.

Most heartily do I concur with him in these opinions; and I entirely dissent from those who believe it to be our best and wisest policy to separate and go home, leaving the entire subject under the control of the Secretary of the Treasury, without any regulation by law. There may be a difference of opinion on this question among the friends of the Administration. The alternative presented is, shall we now do nothing—shall we go before the people and agitate the Sub-Treasury question, until the commencement of the next Congress, in December, 1839, or shall we enact some temporary measure which will secure the great principle of separation, and put the question at rest for the present? There are some convictions upon my mind so strong, that I almost feel them to be intuitive truths. This one is among the number. I feel that the most dangerous course we can pursue, is to fold our arms and determine to do nothing; merely because we have not been able to do every thing. To announce to the American people, that, although we have been placed by them at the helm, and are responsible to the country for the management of the vessel, yet that we will not consent to gain the haven of safety, unless we can reach it by one predetermined course. Shall we ask nothing; shall we accept nothing; because we cannot obtain all we desire? Other gentlemen may wish to frame such an issue, and go before the people with it for their determination. I feel confident it would not be favorably responded to by the sober and reflecting citizens of Pennsylvania.

What is now the law in regard to the safe-keeping of the public money? The old act of the 2d September, 1789, to establish the Treasury Department, passed nearly fifty years ago, is the only law upon that subject now in full force. It simply provides, in general terms, that the Treasurer of the United States shall receive, keep, and disburse the public money. This act was passed in hard money times, and evidently contemplated that nothing except current coin was to be received into the Treasury. This is evident from its whole tenor, as well as from a single provision. The Treasurer is obliged at all times to submit to the Secretary of the Treasury, or the Comptroller, the inspection of the moneys in his hands. This act was framed to meet the state of things which existed at the origin of the Government, and is wholly inadequate to the present circumstances of the country.

Under the joint resolution of 1816, the notes of specie paying banks are now receivable in payment of the public dues. When the banks shall resume specie payments, by far the greater portion of our revenue will be collected in bank notes. After they reach the Treasury, what is the Secretary to do with them? There is now no law upon the subject. Every thing is left to his discretion. Ought this to be the case under any free Government? How can those who dread Executive discretion rest contented without attempting to remedy this evil? In my opinion, the enemies of the present Administration ought to desire nothing more ardently than to leave things just as they are. There will then be nothing but agitation throughout the country. As often as the Secretary, in his discretion, shall present these bank notes to be cashed, so often will the banks raise a clamor that it has been done in hostility to them, and without necessity—that it is an abuse of his discretion. Constant complaints against the Administration will be echoed and re-echoed throughout the country. Every sort of attack which political malice can dictate, will be made upon it from some quarter or other. The Secretary will be accused of hostility against some banks, and favoritism towards others. It will be impossible for him to pursue any course whatever without subjecting himself and the Administration to unmerited reproach. Is it right, then, for us who are friends of the Administration to go home, having made no attempt to regulate by law the manner in which the Secretary shall dispose of these bank notes after they reach the Treasury? Will the people rest satisfied with this determination, and consider it a sufficient excuse for our omission of every other duty, that we have not been able to pass the Sub-Treasury bill?

Now, sir, the amendment which I propose amounts to little more than a legal sanction of the present practice of the Treasury Department. The Secretary of the Treasury, for the sake of security, now keeps special deposites of gold and silver in certain banks. The President, in the extract from his Message, which I have already read, gives us this information; and I have since heard it from other sources entitled to all confidence. The Sub-Treasury bill itself provided for such special deposites of gold and silver in State banks every where, except at the five or six points where we had mints, or were to have receivers general. That bill, therefore, as well as the practice of the Treasury, sanctions those special deposites. Why not, then, regulate them, and place them under the protection of law? Why not adopt this alternative, recommended by the President, for the safe-keeping of the public money?

The first section of my amendment is exclusively confined to specie. It simply requires the collectors and receivers, under the direction of the Treasury Department, to make special deposites with the banks, for safe-keeping, of the balances remaining in their hands, at least once in sixty days, and as much oftener as the security of the public money may render necessary. The rest is chiefly detail, and merely regulates the manner in which these banks shall be selected, and their duties performed. It is nothing more than to sanction the use of the vaults of these banks, as being more secure than the private houses of the collectors and receivers. Of course, from the very nature of a special deposite, it is impossible that the banks can ever use this gold and silver for their own benefit, in any manner whatever.

The second section provides first, that the bank notes received in payment of the public dues shall never be placed in banks either on general or special deposite. It is necessary to declare that these notes shall not be placed on general deposite, in order to create an entire and absolute separation of the money of the people from the business of banking. Without such an enactment, the old deposite system will revive in regard to all the banks of the country which have neither issued nor paid out notes of a less denomination than five dollars since the 4th July, 1836; and we should thus have that system in operation in some parts of the Union and not in others. And in what condition would this absurd anomaly place the Treasury Department? In Indiana, in Illinois, in Arkansas, and in Missouri, the banks have not violated this provision of the deposite law. In Georgia and South Carolina, I am informed, there are several banks, and in New York and other States there are some, in the same condition. The Secretary of the Treasury will be imperatively bound to employ these banks as general depositories of the public money as soon as they shall have resumed specie payments. The deposite act leaves him no discretion upon this subject. Thus in some States, and in regard to some banks, this law will be again in force; whilst the public money collected in other large portions of the Union cannot be deposited in their banks. You will then have a law in force in some portions of the Union, whilst it is a dead letter in others. Will the people submit to this inequality? No, sir: they will not. If banks in some sections of the country have a right to trade upon the public money, they will claim the same privilege in other sections. Thus you will have constant agitation. I ask, then, ought Congress to adjourn without even making an attempt to correct this anomaly, and to provide for uniformity, by declaring that no bank whatever shall be a general depository of the public money?

I have always been opposed to a special deposit of bank paper with the banks. Those who are hostile to general deposits of this paper, ought, for the very same reason, to be equally opposed to special deposits. In either case, the banks can discount and make issues upon your deposits, almost with equal facility. For example: A bank is employed as a special depository which has a circulation of half a million. It knows that one fourth of this circulation, belonging to the Government, is, on an average, lying on special deposit in its vaults. A knowledge of this fact will enable it to discount and to issue just as much more as if the same sum were placed on general deposit. If it had kept in circulation half a million before, it could, and it would, increase its circulation one hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars; the amount of the notes which the Government keeps dead in its vaults.
